PREFACE.

THE objects and scope of this work are explained in the Introductory Remarks which follow the Preface. Here it is desired to say a few words as to its history.

The book originated in a correspondence between the present writer, who was living at Palermo, and the late lamented ARTHUR BURNELL, of the Madras Civil Service, one of the most eminent of modern Indian scholars, who during the course of our communications was filling judicial offices in Southern and Western India, chiefly at Tanjore. We had then met only once—at the India Library; but he took a kindly interest in work that engaged me, and this led to an exchange of letters, which went on after his return to India. About 1872—I cannot find his earliest reference to the subject—he mentioned that he was contemplating a vocabulary of Anglo-Indian words, and had made some collections with that view. In reply it was stated that I likewise had long been taking note of such words, and that a notion similar to his own had also been at various times floating in my mind. And I proposed that we should combine our labours.

I had not, in fact, the linguistic acquirements needful for carrying through such an undertaking alone; but I had gone through an amount of reading that would largely help in instances and illustrations, and had also a strong natural taste for the kind of work.

This was the beginning of the portly double-columned edifice which now presents itself, the completion of which my friend has not lived to see. It was built up from our joint contributions till his untimely death in 1882, and since then almost daily additions have continued to be made to the material and to the structure. The subject, indeed, had taken so comprehensive a shape, that it was becoming difficult to say where its limits lay, or why it should ever end, except for the old reason which had received such poignant illustration: Ars longa, vita brevis. And so it has been wound up at last.

The work has been so long the companion of my horæ subcivæ, a thread running through the joys and sorrows of so many years, in the search for material first, and then in their handling and adjustment to the edifice—for their careful building up has been part of my duty from the beginning, and the whole of the matter has, I suppose, been written and re-written with my own hand at least four times—and the work has been one of so much interest to dear friends, of whom not a few are no longer here to welcome its appearance in print,* that I can hardly speak of the work except as mine.

Indeed, in bulk, nearly seven-eighths of it is so. But BURNELL contributed so much of value, so much of the essential; buying, in the search for illustration, numerous rare and costly books which were not otherwise accessible to him in India; setting me, by his example, on lines of research with which I should have else possibly remained unacquainted; writing letters with such fullness, frequency, and interest on the details of the work up to the summer of his death; that the measure of bulk in contribution is no gauge of his share in the result.

In the Life of Frank Buckland occur some words in relation to the church-bells of Ross, in Herefordshire, which may with some aptness illustrate our mutual relation to the book:

“It is said that the Man of Ross” (John Kyrle) “was present at the casting of the tenor, or great bell, and that he took with him an old silver tankard, which, after drinking claret and sherry, he threw in, and had cast with the bell.”

John Kyrle’s was the most precious part of the metal run into the mould, but the shaping of the mould and the larger part of the material came from the labour of another hand.

At an early period of our joint work BURNELL sent me a fragment of an essay on the words which formed our subject, intended as the basis of an introduction. As it stands, this is too incomplete to print, but I have made use of it to some extent, and given some extracts from it in the Introduction now put forward.†

* The dedication was sent for press on 6th January; on the 13th, G. U. Y. departed to his rest.

† Three of the mottoes that face the title were also sent by him.

The alternative title (Hobson-Jobson) which has been given to this book (not without the expressed assent of my collaborator), doubtless requires explanation.

A valued friend of the present writer many years ago published a book, of great acumen and considerable originality, which he called Three Essays, with no Author's name; and the resulting amount of circulation was such as might have been expected. It was remarked at the time by another friend that if the volume had been entitled A Book, by a Chap, it would have found a much larger body of readers. It seemed to me that A Glossary or A Vocabulary would be equally unattractive, and that it ought to have an alternative title at least a little more characteristic. If the reader will turn to Hobson-Jobson in the Glossary itself, he will find that phrase, though now rare and moribund, to be a typical and delightful example of that class of Anglo-Indian argot which consists of Oriental words highly assimilated, perhaps by vulgar lips, to the English vernacular; whilst it is the more fitted to our book, conveying, as it may, a veiled intimation of dual authorship. At any rate, there it is; and at this period my feeling has come to be that such is the book's name, nor could it well have been anything else.

In carrying through the work I have sought to supplement my own deficiencies from the most competent sources to which friendship afforded access. Sir JOSEPH HOOKER has most kindly examined almost every one of the proof-sheets for articles dealing with plants, correcting their errors, and enriching them with notes of his own. Another friend, Professor ROBERTSON SMITH, has done the like for words of Semitic origin, and to him I owe a variety of interesting references to the words treated of, in regard to their occurrence, under some cognate form, in the Scriptures. In the early part of the book the Rev. GEORGE MOULE (now Bishop of Ningpo), then in England, was good enough to revise those articles which bore on expressions used in China (not the first time that his generous aid had been given to work of mine). Among other friends who have been ever ready with assistance I may mention Dr. REINHOLD ROST, of the India Library; General ROBERT MACLAGAN, R.E.; Sir GEORGE BIRDWOOD, C.S.I.; Major-General R. H. KEATINGE, V.C., C.S.I.; Professor TERRIEN DE LA COUPERIE; and Mr. E. COLBORNE BABER, at present Consul-General in Corea. Dr. J. A. H. MURRAY, editor of the great English Dictionary, has also been most kind and courteous in the interchange of communications, a circumstance which will account for a few cases in which the passages cited in both works are the same.

My first endeavour in preparing this work has been to make it accurate ; my next to make it—even though a Glossary—interesting. In a work intersecting so many fields, only a fool could imagine that he had not fallen into many mistakes ; but these, when pointed out, may be amended. If I have missed the other object of endeavour, I fear there is little to be hoped for from a second edition.

H. YULE.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

Words of Indian origin have been insinuating themselves into English ever since the end of the reign of Elizabeth and the beginning of that of King James, when such terms as calico, chintz, and gingham had already effected a lodgment in English warehouses and shops, and were lying in wait for entrance into English literature. Such outlandish guests grew more frequent 120 years ago, when, soon after the middle of last century, the numbers of Englishmen in the Indian services, civil and military, expanded with the great acquisition of dominion then made by the Company; and we meet them in vastly greater abundance now.

Vocabularies of Indian and other foreign words, in use among Europeans in the East, have not unfrequently been printed. Several of the old travellers have attached the like to their narratives; whilst the prolonged excitement created in England, a hundred years since, by the impeachment of Hastings and kindred matters, led to the publication of several glossaries as independent works; and a good many others have been published in later days. At the end of this Introduction will be found a list of those which have come under my notice, and this might no doubt be largely added to.*

Of modern Glossaries, such as have been the result of serious labour, all, or nearly all, have been of a kind purely technical, intended to facilitate the comprehension of official documents by the explanation of terms used in the Revenue department, or in other branches of Indian administration. The most notable examples are (of brief and occasional character), the Glossary appended to the famous Fifth Report of the Select Committee of 1812, which was compiled by Sir Charles Wilkins; and (of a far more vast and comprehensive sort), the late Professor Horace Hayman Wilson's Glossary of Judicial and Revenue Terms (4to, 1855) which leaves far behind every other attempt in that kind.*

That kind is, however, not ours, as a momentary comparison of a page or two in each Glossary would suffice to show. Our work indeed, in the long course of its compilation, has gone through some modification and enlargement of scope; but hardly such as in any degree to affect its distinctive character, in which something has been aimed at differing in form from any work known to us. In its original conception it was intended to deal with all that class of words which, not in general pertaining to the technicalities of administration, recur constantly in the daily intercourse of the English in India, either as expressing ideas really not provided for by our mother-tongue, or supposed by the speakers (often quite erroneously) to express something not capable of just denotation by any English term. A certain percentage of such words have been carried to England by the constant reflux to their native shore of Anglo-Indians, who in some degree imbue with their notions and phraseology the circles from which they had gone forth. This effect has been still more promoted by the currency of a vast mass of literature, of all qualities and for all ages, dealing with Indian subjects; as well as by the regular appearance, for many years past, of Indian correspondence in English newspapers, insomuch that a considerable number of the expressions in question have not only become familiar in sound to English ears, but have become naturalized in the English language, and are meeting with ample recognition in the great Dictionary edited by Dr. Murray at Oxford.

Of words that seem to have been admitted to full franchise, we may give examples in curry, toddy, veranda, cheroot, loot, nabob, tempong, sepoj, cowry; and of others familiar enough to the English ear, though hardly yet received into citizenship, compound, batta, packa, chowry, baboo, mahout, aya, nautch,† first-chop, competition-wallah, griffin, &c. But beyond these two classes of words, received within the last century or so, and gradually, into half or whole recognition, there are a good many others, long since fully assimilated, which really originated in the adoption of an Indian word, or the modification of an Indian proper name. Such words are the three quoted at the beginning of these remarks, chintz, calico, gingham, also shawl, bamboo, pagoda, typhoon, monsoon, mandarin, palanquin,‡ &c., and I may mention among * Professor Wilson's work may perhaps bear re-editing, but can hardly, for its purpose, be superseded. The late eminent Telugu scholar, Mr. C. P. Brown, interleaved, with criticisms and addenda, a copy of Wilson, which is now in the India Library. I have gone through it, and borrowed a few notes, with acknowledgment by the initials C. P. B. The amount of improvement does not strike me as important.

† Nautch, it may be urged, is admitted to full franchise, being used by so eminent a writer as Mr. Browning. But the fact that his use is entirely misus, seems to justify the classification in the text (see GLOSS., s. v.). A like remark applies to compound. See for the tremendous fiasco made in its intended use by a most intelligent lady novelist, the last quotation s. v. in GLOSS.

‡ GLOSS., s. v. (note p. 502, col. b, and p. 503, col. a), contains quotations from the Vulgate of the passage in Canticles iii. 9, regarding King Solomon's perulum of Lebanon cedar. I have to thank an old friend for pointing out that the word palanquin has, in this passage, received solemn sanction by its introduction into the Revised Version.

further examples which may perhaps surprise my readers, the names of three of the boats of a man-of-war, viz. the cutter, the jolly-boat, and the dingy, as all (probably) of Indian origin.* Even phrases of a different character—slang indeed, but slang generally supposed to be vernacular as well as vulgar—e.g., ‘that is the cheese ;’* or supposed to be vernacular and profane—e.g., ‘I don’t care a dam’*—are in reality, however vulgar they may be, neither vernacular nor profane, but phrases turning upon innocent Hindustani vocables.

We proposed also, in our Glossary, to deal with a selection of those administrative terms, which are in such familiar and quotidian use as to form part of the common Anglo-Indian stock, and to trace all (so far as possible) to their true origin—a matter on which, in regard to many of the words, those who hourly use them are profoundly ignorant—and to follow them down by quotation from their earliest occurrence in literature.

A particular class of words are those indigenous terms which have been adopted in scientific nomenclature, botanical and zoological. On these Mr. Burnell remarks :—

“The first Indian botanical names were chiefly introduced by Garcia de Orta (Colloquios, printed at Goa in 1563), C. d’Acosta (Tractado, Burgos, 1578), and Rhede van Drakenstein (Hortus Malabaricus, Amsterdam, 1682). The Malay names were chiefly introduced by Rumphius (Herbarium Amboinense, completed before 1700, but not published till 1741). The Indian zoological terms were chiefly due to Dr. F. Buchanan, at the beginning of this century. Most of the N. Indian botanical words were introduced by Roxburgh.”

It has been already intimated that, as the work proceeded, its scope expanded somewhat, and its authors found it expedient to introduce and trace many words of Asiatic origin which have disappeared from colloquial use, or perhaps never entered it, but which occur in old writers on the East. We also judged that it would add to the interest of the work, were we to investigate and make out the pedigree of a variety of geographical names which are or have been in familiar use in books on the Indies; take as examples Bombay, Madras, Guardafui, Malabar, Moluccas, Zanzibar, Pegu, Sumatra, Quilon, Seychelles, Ceylon, Java, Ava, Japan, Doab, Punjab, &c., illustrating these, like every other class of word, by quotations given in chronological series.

Other divagations still from the original project will probably present themselves to those who turn over the pages of the work, in which we have been tempted to introduce sundry subjects which may seem hardly to come within the scope of such a glossary.

The words with which we have to do, taking the most extensive view of the field, are in fact organic remains deposited under the various currents of external influence that have washed the shores of India during twenty centuries and more. Rejecting that derivation of elephant† which would connect it with the Ophir trade of Solomon, we find no existing western term traceable to that episode of communication; but the Greek and Roman commerce of the later centuries has left its fossils on both sides, testifying to the intercourse that once subsisted. Agallo-

chum, carbasus, camphor, sandal, musk, nard, pepper (πέπερι, from Skt. pippali, 'long pepper'), ginger (ζιγγίβερις, see under Ginger), lac, costus, opal, malabathrum or folium indicum, beryl, sugar (σάκχαρ, from Skt. sarkara, Prāk. sakkara), rice (ῥυζα, but see s.v.), were products or names, introduced from India to the Greek and Roman world, to which may be added a few terms of a different character, such as Ἐραμίανες, Σαρμάνες (śramaṇas, or Buddhist ascetics), ξύλα σαγαλίνα καὶ σασαμίνα (logs of teak and śīṣham), the σάγγαρα (rafts) of the Periplus (see Jangar in GLOSS.) ; whilst dīnāra, dramma, perhaps kastūra ('tin,' κασσίτερος), kastūrī ('musk,' καστόριον, properly a different, though analogous animal product), and a very few more, have remained in Indian literature as testimony to the same intercourse.*

The trade and conquests of the Arabs both brought foreign words to India and picked up and carried westward, in form more or less corrupted, words of Indian origin, some of which have in one way or other become part of the heritage of all succeeding foreigners in the East. Among terms which are familiar items in the Anglo-Indian colloquial, but which had, in some shape or other, found their way at an early date into use on the shores of the Mediterranean, we may instance bazaar, cazee, hummaul, brinjaul, gingely, safflower, grab, maramut, dewaun (dogana, douane, &c.). Of others which are found in medieval literature, either West-Asiatic or European, and which still have a place in the Anglo-Indian or English vocabulary, we may mention amber-gris, chank, junk, jogy, kincob, kedgerie, fanam, calay, bankshall, mudliar, tindal, cranney.

The conquests and long occupation of the Portuguese, who by the year 1540 had established themselves in all the chief ports of India and the East, have, as might have been expected, bequeathed a large number of expressions to the European nations who have followed, and in great part superseded them. We find instances of missionaries and others at an early date who had acquired a knowledge of Indian languages, but these were exceptional.† The natives in contact with the Portuguese learned a bastard variety of the language of the latter, which became the lingua franca of intercourse, not only between European and native, but occasionally between Europeans of different nationalities. This Indo-Portuguese dialect continued to serve such purposes down to a late period in the last century, and has in some localities survived down nearly to our own day.‡ The number of people in India claiming to be of Portuguese descent was, in the 17th century, very large. Bernier, about 1660, says:—

"For he (Sultan Shujā', Aurangzeb's brother) much courted all those Portugal Fathers, Missionaries, that are in that Province. . . . And they were indeed capable to serve him, it being certain that in the kingdom of Bengale there are to be found not less than eight or nine thousand families of Franquais, Portugals, and these either Natives or Mesticks." (Bernier, E. T. of 1684, p. 27.)

* See A. Weber, in Indian Antiquary, ii. 143 segg. Most of the other Greek words, which he traces in Sanskrit, are astronomical terms derived from books.

† Varthema, at the very beginning of the 16th century, shows some acquaintance with Malayālam, and introduces pieces of conversation in that language. Before the end of the 16th century, printing had been introduced at other places besides Goa, and by the beginning of the 17th, several books in Indian languages had been printed at Goa, Cochin, and Ambalakkadu.—(A. B.)

A. Hamilton, whose experience belonged chiefly to the end of the same century, though his book was not published till 1727, states:—

"Along the Sea-coasts the Portuguese have left a Vestige of their Language, tho' much corrupted, yet it is the Language that most Europeans learn first to qualify them for a general Converse with one another, as well as with the different inhabitants of India." (Preface, p. xii.)

Lockyer, who published 16 years before Hamilton, also says:—

"This they (the Portuguese) may justly boast, they have established a kind of Lingua Franca in all the Sea Ports in India, of great use to other Europeans, who would find it difficult in many places to be well understood without it." (An Account of the Trade in India, 1711, p. 286.)

The early Lutheran Missionaries in the South, who went out for the S.P.C.K., all seem to have begun by learning Portuguese, and in their diaries speak of preaching occasionally in Portuguese.* The foundation of this lingua franca was the Portuguese of the beginning of the 16th century; but it must have soon degenerated, for by the beginning of the present century it had lost nearly all trace of inflexion.†

It may from these remarks be easily understood how a large number of our Anglo-Indian colloquialisms, even if eventually traceable to native sources (and especially to Mahratti, or Dravidian originals) have come to us through a Portuguese medium, and often bear traces of having passed through that alembic. Not a few of these are familiar all over India, but the number current in the south is larger still. Some other Portuguese words also, though they can hardly be said to be recognized elements in the Anglo-Indian colloquial, have been introduced either into Hindustani generally, or into that shade of it which is in use among natives in habitual contact with Europeans. Of words which are essentially Portuguese, among Anglo-Indian colloquialisms, persistent or obsolete, we may quote goglet, gram, plantain, muster, caste, peon, padre, mistry or maistry, almyra, aya, cobra, mosquito, pomfret, cameez, palmyra, still in general use; picotta, rolong, pial, fogass, margosa, preserved in the south; batel, brab, foras, oart, vellard in Bombay; joss, comprador, linguist in the ports of China; and among more or less obsolete terms, Moor, for a Mohammedan, still surviving under the modified form Moorman, in Madras and Ceylon; Gentoo, still partially kept up, I believe, at Madras in application to the Telugu language, mustees, castees, bandeja ('a tray'), Kittysol 'an umbrella,' and this survived ten years ago in the Calcutta customs tariff), cuspadore ('a spittoon'), and covid ('a cubit or ell'). Words of native origin which bear the mark of having come to us through the Portuguese may be illustrated by such as palanquin, man-

* See "Notices of Madras and Cuddalore, &c., by the earlier Missionaries." Longman, 1858, passim. See also Manual, &c. in BOOK-LIST, infra, p. xxxviii. Dr. Carey, writing from Serampore as late as 1800, says that the children of Europeans by native women, whether children of English, French, Dutch, or Danes, were all called Portuguese. Smith's Life of Carey, 152.

† See Note B. at end of Introductory Remarks. "Mr. Beames remarked some time ago that most of the names of places in South India are greatly disfigured in the forms used by Europeans. This is because we have adopted the Portuguese orthography. Only in this way it can be explained how Kolladam has become Coleroon, Solaman-dalam, Coromandel, and Tuttukkuḍi, Tuticorin." (A. B.) Mr. Burnell was so impressed with the excessive corruption of S. Indian names, that he would hardly ever willingly venture any explanation of them, considering the matter all too uncertain.

The Dutch language has not contributed much to our store. The Dutch and the English arrived in the Indies contemporaneously, and though both inherited from the Portuguese, we have not been the heirs of the Dutch to any great extent, except in Ceylon, and even there Portuguese vocables had already occupied the colloquial ground. Peter-silly, the word in general use in English families for 'parsley,' appears to be Dutch. An example from Ceylon that occurs to memory is burgher. The Dutch admitted people of mixt descent to a kind of citizenship, and these were distinguished from the pure natives by this term, which survives. Burgher in Bengal means 'a rafter,' properly bargā. A word spelt and pronounced in the same way had again a curiously different application in Madras, where it was a corruption of Vadagar, the name given to a tribe in the Nilgherry hills;—to say nothing of Scotland, where Burghers and Antiburghers were Northern tribes (veluti Gog et Magog!) which have long been condensed into elements of the United Presbyterian Church——!

Southern India has contributed to the Anglo-Indian stock words that are in hourly use also from Calcutta to Peshawur (some of them already noted under another cleavage), e.g. betel, mango, jack, cheroot, mungoose, pariah, bandicoot, teak, patcharee, chatty, catechu, tope ('a grove'), curry, mulligatawny, congee. Mamooty (a digging tool) is familiar in certain branches of the service, owing to its having long had a place in the nomenclature of the Ordnance department. It is Tamil, manvëtti, 'earth-cutter.' Of some very familiar words the origin remains either dubious, or matter only for conjecture. Examples are hackery (which arose apparently in Bombay), florikan, topaz.

As to Hindustani words adopted into the Anglo-Indian colloquial the subject is almost too wide and loose for much remark. The habit of introducing these in English conversation and writing seems to prevail more largely in the Bengal Presidency than in any other, and especially more than in Madras, where the variety of different vernaculars in use has tended to make their acquisition by the English less universal than is in the north that of Hindustani, which is so much easier to learn, and also to make the use in former days of Portuguese, and now of English, by natives in contact with foreigners, and of French about the French settlements, very much more common than it is elsewhere. It is this bad habit of interlarding English with Hindustani phrases which has so often excited the just wrath of high English officials, not accustomed to it from their youth, and which (e.g.) drew forth in orders the humorous indignation of Sir Charles Napier.

* The nasal termination given to many Indian words, when adopted into European use, as in palanquin, mandarin, &c., must be attributed mainly to the Portuguese; but it cannot be entirely due to them. For we find the nasal termination of Achin, in Mahomedan writers (see p. 3), and that of Cochin before the Portuguese time (see p. 173), whilst the conversion of Pasei, in Sumatra, into Pacem, as the Portuguese call it, is already indicated in the Basma of Marco Polo.

One peculiarity in this use we may notice, which doubtless exemplifies some obscure linguistic law. Hindustani verbs which are thus used are habitually adopted into the quasi-English by converting the imperative into an infinitive. Thus to bunow, to lugow, to foozilow, to puckarow, to dumbcow, to sumjow, and so on, almost ad libitum, are formed as we have indicated.*

It is curious to note that several of our most common adoptions are due to what may be most especially called the Oordoo (Urdū) or 'Camp' language, being terms which the hosts of Chinghiz brought from the steppes of North Eastern Asia—e.g., "The old Bukshee is an awful bahadur, but he keeps a first-rate bobachee." That is a sentence which might easily have passed without remark at an Anglo-Indian mess-table thirty years ago,—perhaps might be heard still. Each of the outlandish terms embraced in it came from the depths of Mongolia in the thirteenth century. Chick (in the sense of a cane-blind), daroga, oordoo itself, are other examples.

With the gradual assumption of administration after the middle of last century, we adopted into partial colloquial use an immense number of terms, very many of them Persian or Arabic, belonging to technicalities of revenue and other departments, and largely borrowed from our Mahomedan predecessors. Malay has contributed some of our most familiar expressions, owing partly to the ceaseless roving among the Eastern coasts of the Portuguese, through whom a part of these reached us, and partly doubtless to the fact that our early dealings and the sites of our early factories lay much more on the shores of the Eastern Archipelago than on those of Continental India. Paddy, godown, compound, bankshall, rattan, durian, a-muck, prow, and cadjan, junk, crease, are some of these. It is true that several of them may be traced eventually to Indian originals, but it seems not the less certain that we got them through the Malay, just as we got words already indicated through the Portuguese.

We used to have a very few words in French form, such as boutique and mort-de-chien. But these two are really distortions of Portuguese words.

A few words from China have settled on the Indian shores and been adopted by Anglo-India, but most of them are, I think, names of fruits or other products which have been imported, such as loquat, leechee, chow-chow, cumquat, ginseng, &c. and (recently) jinnrickshaw. For it must be noted that a considerable proportion of words much used in Chinese ports, and often ascribed to a Chinese origin, such as mandarin, junk, chop, pagoda, and (as I believe) typhoon (though this is a word much debated) are not Chinese at all, but words of Indian languages, or of Malay, which have been precipitated in Chinese waters during the flux and reflux of foreign trade.

Within my own earliest memory Spanish dollars were current in England at a specified value if they bore a stamp from the English mint. And similarly there are certain English words, often obsolete in Europe, which have received in India currency with a special stamp of meaning; whilst in other cases our language has formed in India new compounds applicable to new objects or shades of meaning. To one or other of these classes belong outcry, buggy, home, inter-loper, rogue (-elephant), tiffin, furlough, elk, roundel ('an umbrella,' obsolete), pish-pash, earth-oil, hog-deer, flying-fox, garden-house, musk-rat, nor-wester, iron-wood, long-drawers, barking-deer, custard-apple, grass-cutter, &c.

Other terms again are corruptions, more or less violent, of oriental words and phrases which have put on an English mask. Such are marund, fool's rack, bearer, cot, boy, belly-band, Penang-lawyer, bucks-haw, goddess (in the Malay region, representing Malay gāḍis, 'a maiden'), compound, college-pheasant, chopper, summer-head,* eagle-wood, jackass-copal, bobbery, Uper Roger (used in a correspondence given by Dalrymple, for Yuva Raja, the 'Young King,' or Cæsar, of Indo-Chinese monarchies), Isle-o'-Bats (for Alahābād or Ilahābāz as the natives often call it), hobson-jobson (see Preface), St. John's. The last proper name has at least three applications. There is "St. John's" in Guzerat, viz. Sanjān, the landing-place of the Parsee immigration in the 8th century; there is another "St. John's" which is a corruption of Shang-Chuang, the name of that island off the southern coast of China whence the pure and ardent spirit of Francis Xavier fled to a better world: there is the group of "St. John's Islands" near Singapore, the chief of which is properly Pulo-Sikajang.

Yet again we have hybrids and corruptions of English fully accepted and adopted as Hindustani by the natives with whom we have to do, such as simkin, port-shrāb, brandy-pānī, apīl, rasīd, tumlet (a tumbler), gilās ('glass,' for drinking vessels of sorts), rail-ghārī, lumber-dār, jail-khāna, bottle-khāna, buggy-khāna, 'et omne quod exit in' khāna, including gym-khāna, a very modern concoction (q. v.), and many more.

Taking our subject as a whole, however considerable the philological interest attaching to it, there is no disputing the truth of a remark with which Burnell's fragment of intended introduction concludes, and the application of which goes beyond the limit of those words which can be considered to have 'accrued as additions to the English language': "Considering the long intercourse with India, it is noteworthy that the additions which have thus accrued to the English language are, from the intellectual standpoint, of no intrinsic value. Nearly all the borrowed words refer to material facts, or to peculiar customs and stages of society, and, though a few of them furnish allusions to the penny-a-liner, they do not represent new ideas."

It is singular how often, in tracing to their origin words that come within the field of our research, we light upon an absolute dilemma, or bifurcation, i.e., on two or more sources of almost equal probability, and in themselves entirely diverse. In such cases it may be that, though the use of the word originated from one of the sources, the existence of the other has invigorated that use, and contributed to its eventual diffusion.

An example of this is boy, in its application to a native servant. To this application have contributed both the old English use of boy (analogous to that of puer, garçon, Knabe) for a camp-servant, or for a slave, and the Hindi-Marāṭhī bhoī, the name of a caste which has furnished palanquin and umbrella-bearers to many generations of Europeans in India. The habitual use of the word by the Portuguese, for many years before any English influence had touched the shores of India (e.g., bôy de sombrero, bôy d'aguaa, boy de palanquy), shows that the earliest source was the Indian one.

Cooly, in its application to a carrier of burdens, or performer of inferior labour, is another example. The most probable origin of this is from a nomen gentile, that of the Kolis, a hill-people of Guzerat and the Western Ghats (compare the origin of slave). But the matter is perplexed by other facts which it is difficult to connect with this. Thus, in S. India, there is a Tamil word kūli, in common use, signifying 'daily hire or wages,' which H. H. Wilson regards as the true origin of the word which we call cooly. Again, both in oriental and Osmanli Turkish, kol is a word for a slave, and in the latter also there is kūleh, 'a male slave, a bondsman.' Khol is, in Tibetan also, a word for a slave or servant.

Tank, for a reservoir of water, we are apt to derive without hesitation, from stagnum, whence Sp. estanc, old Fr. estang, old Eng. and Lowland Scotch stank, Port. tanque, till we find that the word is regarded by the Portuguese themselves as Indian, and that there is excellent testimony to the existence of tānkā in Guzerat and Rajputana as an indigenous word, and with a plausible Sanskrit etymology.

Veranda has been confidently derived by some etymologists (among others by M. Defréméry, a distinguished scholar), from the Pers. bar-āmada, 'a projection,' a balcony; an etymology which is indeed hardly a possible one, but has been treated by Mr. Beames (who was evidently unacquainted with the facts that do make it hardly possible) with inappropriate derision, he giving as the unquestionable original a Sanskrit word baranda, 'a portico.' On this Burnell has observed that the word does not belong to the older Sanskrit, but is only found in comparatively modern works. Be that as it may, it need not be doubted that the word veranda, as used in England and France, was imported from India, i.e., from the usage of Europeans in India: but it is still more certain that either in the same sense, or in one closely allied, the word existed, quite independent of either Sanskrit or Persian, in Portuguese and Spanish, and the manner in which it occurs in the very earliest narrative of the Portuguese adventure to India (Roteiro do Viagem de Vasco da Gama, written by one of the expedition of 1497), confirmed by the Hispano-Arabic vocabulary of Pedro de Alcalà, printed in 1505, preclude the possibility of its having been adopted by the Portuguese from intercourse with India.

Mangrove, John Crawford tells us, has been adopted from the Malay manggi-manggi, applied to trees of the genus Rhizophora. But we learn from Oviedo, writing early in the sixteenth century, that the name mangle was applied by the natives of the Spanish Main to trees of the same, or a kindred genus, on the coast of S. America, which same mangle is undoubtedly the parent of the French manglier, and not improbably therefore of the English form mangrove.*

The words bearer, mate, cotual, partake of this kind of dual or doubtful ancestry, as may be seen by reference to them in the Glossary.

Before concluding, a word should be said as to the orthography used in the Glossary.

My intention has been to give the headings of the articles under the most usual of the popular, or, if you will, vulgar quasi-English spellings, whilst the oriental words, from which the headings are derived or corrupted, are set forth under precise transliteration, the system of which is given in a following "Nota Bene." When using the words and names in the course of discursive elucidation, I fear I have not been consistent in sticking either always to the popular or always to the scientific spelling, and I can the better understand why a German critic of a book of mine, once upon a time, remarked upon the etwas schwankende jüdische Orthographie. Indeed it is difficult, it never will for me be possible, in a book for popular use, to adhere to one system in this matter without the assumption of an ill-fitting and repulsive pedantry. Even in regard to Indian proper names, in which I once advocated adhesion, with a small number of exceptions, to scientific precision in transliteration, I feel much more inclined than formerly to sympathise with my friends Sir William Muir and General Maclagan, who have always favoured a large and liberal recognition of popular spelling in such names. And when I see other good and able friends following the scientific Will-o'-the-Wisp into such bogs as the use in English composition of sipāhī and jangal, and verandah—nay, I have not only heard of bagi, but have recently seen it—instead of the good English words 'sepo,' and 'jungle,' 'veranda,' and 'buggy,' my dread of pedantic usage becomes the greater.*

For the spelling of Mahratta, Mahrattī, I suppose I must apologize (though something is to be said for it), Marāṭhī having established itself as orthodox.

NOTE A.—LIST OF GLOSSARIES.

1. Appended to the Roteiro de Vasco da Gama (see Book-list, p. xlii.) is a Vocabulary of 138 Portuguese words with their corresponding word in the Lingua de Calicut, i.e. in Malayālam.

2. Appended to the Voyages, &c., du Sieur de la Boullaye-le-Gouz (Book-list, p. xxxiii.), is an Explication de plusieurs mots dont l'intelligence est nécessaire au Lecteur (pp. 27).

3. Fryer's New Account (Book-list, p. xxxiv.) has an Index Explanatory, including Proper Names, Names of Things, and Names of Persons (12 pages).

4. "Indian Vocabulary, to which is prefixed the Forms of Impeachment." 12mo, Stockdale, 1788 (pp. 136).

5. "An Indian Glossary, consisting of some Thousand Words and Forms commonly used in the East Indies . . . extremely serviceable in assisting Strangers to acquire with Ease and Quickness the Language of that Country." By T. T. Roberts, Lieut., &c., of the 3rd Regt. Native Infantry, E.I. Printed for Murray & Highley, Fleet Street, 1800. 12mo. (not paged).

6. "A Dictionary of Mohammedan Law, Bengal Revenue Terms, Shanscrit, Hindoo, and other words used in the East

* 'Buggy' of course is not an oriental word at all, except as adopted from us by orientals. I call sepo, jungle, and veranda, good English words; and so I regard them, just as good as alligator, or hurricane, or canoe, or Jerusalem artichoke, or cheroo. What would my friends think of spelling these in English books as alagarto, and huracan, and canoa, and girasole, and shuruttu?

Indies, with full explanations, the leading word used in each article being printed in a new Nustaluk Type," &c. By S. Rousseau, London, 1802. 12mo. (pp. lxiv.-287). Also 2nd ed. 1805.

7. Glossary prepared for the Fifth Report (see Book-list, p. xxxv.), by Sir Charles Wilkins. This is dated in the preface "E. I. House, 1813." The copy used is a Parliamentary reprint, dated 1830.

8. The Folio compilation of the Bengal Regulations, published in 1828-29, contains in each volume a Glossarial Index, based chiefly upon the Glossary of Sir C. Wilkins.

9. In 1842 a preliminary "Glossary of Indian Terms," drawn up at the E. I. House by Prof. H. H. Wilson, 4to, unpublished, with a blank column on each page "for Suggestions and Additions," was circulated in India, intended as a basis for a comprehensive official Glossary. In this one the words are entered in the vulgar spelling, as they occur in the documents.

10. The only important result of the circulation of No. 9, was "Supplement to the Glossary of Indian Terms, A—J. By H. M. Elliot, Esq., Bengal Civil Service. Agra, 1845. 8vo. (pp. 447).

This remarkable work has been revised, re-arranged, and re-edited, with additions from Elliot's notes and other sources, by Mr. John Beames, of the Bengal Civil Service, under the title of "Memoirs on the Folk-Lore and Distribution of the Races of the North-Western Provinces of India, being an amplified edition of" (the above). 2 vols. 8vo. Trübner, 1869.

11. To "Morley's Analytical Digest of all the Reported Cases Decided in the Supreme Courts of Judicature in India," Vol. I., 1850, there is appended a "Glossary of Native Terms used in the Text" (pp. 20).

12. In "Wanderings of a Pilgrim" (Book-list, p. xlv.), there is a Glossary of some considerable extent (pp. 10 in double columns).

13. "The Zillah Dictionary in the Roman character, explaining the Various Words used in Business in India." By Charles Philip Brown, of the Madras Civil Service, &c. Madras, 1852. Imp. 8vo. (pp. 132).

14. "A Glossary of Judicial and Re- venue Terms, and of Useful Words occurring in Official Documents, relating to the Administration of the Government of British India, from the Arabic, Persian, Hindústání, Sanskrit, Hindí, Bengálí, Uriyá, Maráthí, Guzaráthí, Telugu, Karnáta, Támil, Malayálam, and other Languages. By H. H. Wilson, M.A., F.R.S., Boden Professor, &c. London, 1855. 4to. (pp. 535, besides copious Index).

15. A useful folio Glossary published by Government at Calcutta between 1860 and 1870, has been used by me and is quoted in the present Gloss. as "Calcutta Glossary." But I have not been able to trace it again so as to give the proper title.

16. Ceylonese Vocabulary, see Book-list, p. xxxii.

17. "Kachahri Technicalities, or A Glossary of Terms, Rural, Official, and General, in Daily Use in the Courts of Law, and in Illustration of the Tenures, Customs, Arts, and Manufactures of Hindustan." By Patrick Carnegie, Commissioner of Rai Bareli, Oudh. 8vo. 2nd ed. Allahabad, 1877 (pp. 361).

18. "A Glossary of Indian Terms, containing many of the most important and Useful Indian Words. Designed for the Use of Officers of Revenue and Judicial Practitioners and Students." Madras, 1877. 8vo. (pp. 255).

19. "A Glossary of Reference on Subjects connected with the Far East" (China and Japan). By H. A. Giles. Hong-Kong, 1878, 8vo. (pp. 182).

20. "Glossary of Vernacular Terms used in Official Correspondence in the Province of Assam." Shillong, 1879. (Pamphlet).

21. "Anglo-Indian Dictionary. A Glossary of such Indian Terms used in English, and such English or other non-Indian Terms as have obtained special meanings in India." By George Clifford Whitworth, Bombay Civil Service. London, 8vo, 1885 (pp. xv.—350).

Also the following minor Glossaries contained in Books of Travel or History:—

22. In "Cambridge's Account of the War in India," 1761 (Book-list, p. xxxii.); 23. In "Grose's Voyage," 1772 (Book-list, p. xxxvi.); 24. In Carraccioli's "Life of Clive" (Book-list, p. xxxi.); 25. In "Bp. Heber's Narrative" (Book-list, p. xxxvi.); 26. In Herklot's "Qanoon-e-Islam (Book-list, p. xxxvii.).

NOTE B.—THE INDO-PORTUGUESE PATOIS.

(By A. C. BURNELL.)

The phonetic changes of Indo-Portuguese are few. r is substituted for p; whilst the accent varies according to the race of the speaker.* The vocabulary varies, as regards the introduction of native Indian terms, from the same cause.

Grammatically, this dialect is very singular :

1. All traces of genders are lost—e.g. we find sua povo (Mat. i. 21); sua nome (Id. i. 23); sua filho (Id. i. 25) : sua filhos (Id. ii. 18); sua olhos (Acts, ix. 8); o dias (Mat. ii. 1); o rey (Id. ii. 2); hum voz tinha ouvido (Id. ii. 18).

2. In the plural, s is rarely added; generally, the plural is the same as the singular.

3. The genitive is expressed by de, which is not combined with the article—e.g. conforme de o tempo (Mat. ii. 16); Depois de o morte (Id. ii. 19).

4. The definite article is unchanged in the plural: como o discipulos (Acts, ix. 19).

5. The pronouns still preserve some inflexions: Eu, mi; nos, nossotros; minha, nossos, &c.; tu, ti, vossotros; tua, vossos; Elle, ella, ellotros, elles, sua, suas, lo, la.

6. The verb substantive is (present) tem, (past) timha, and (subjunctive) seja.

7. Verbs are conjugated by adding, for the present, te to the only form, viz., the infinitive, which loses its final r. Thus, te falla; te faze; te vi. The past is formed by adding ja—e.g. ja falla; ja olha. The future is formed by adding ser. To express the infinitive, per is added to the Portuguese infinitive deprived of its r.

* Unfortunately, the translators of the Indo-Portuguese New Testament have, as much as possible, preserved the Portuguese orthography.

NOTA BENE—IN THE USE OF THE GLOSSARY.

(A.) The bulk which the volume has already attained, has been a hindrance to the introduction of a full Index, which had been intended. It must be noted, therefore, that the examination of many subjects will be incomplete without reference to the SUPPLEMENT, and I append, for this reason, a list of articles dealt with in the Supplement.

(B.) The dates attached to quotations are not always quite consistent. In beginning the compilation, the dates given were those of the publication quoted; but as the date of the composition, or of the use of the word in question, is often much earlier than the date of the book or the edition in which it appears, the system was changed, and, where possible, the date given is that of the actual use of the word. But obvious doubts may sometimes rise on this point.

The dates of publication of the works quoted will be found, if required, from the Book List, following this Nota bene.

(C.) The system of transliteration used is substantially the same as that modification of Sir William Jones's which is used in Shakespear's Hindustani Dictionary. But—

The first of the three Sanskrit sibilants is expressed by (ś). And, as in Wilson's Glossary, no distinction is marked between the Indian aspirated k, g, and the Arabic gutturals kh, gh. Also, in words transliterated from Arabic, the sixteenth letter of the Arabic alphabet is expressed by (ṭ). This is the same type that is used for the cerebral Indian (ṭ). Though it can hardly give rise to any confusion, it would have been better to mark them by distinct types. The fact is, that it was wished at first to make as few demands as possible for distinct types, and, having begun so, change could not be made.

The fourth letter of the Arabic alphabet is in several cases represented by (ṭh) when Arabic use is in question. In Hindustani it is pronounced as (s).

Also, in some of Mr. Burnell's transliterations from S. Indian languages, he has used (ṛ) for the peculiar Tamil hard (ṛ), elsewhere (r), and (ṛ) for the Tamil and Malayālam (ḷ) when preceded and followed by a vowel.

- Barbosa. Also in tom. ii. of Ramusio.
- Barretto, Relation de la Province de Malabar. Fr. tr., 8vo. Paris, 1646. Originally pub. in Italian. Roma, 1645.
- Barros, João de. Decadas da Asia, Dos feitos que os Portuguezes fizeram na Conquista e Descobrimento das Terras e Mares do Oriente. Most of the quotations are taken from the edition in 12mo. Lisboa, 1778, issued along with Couto in 24 vols. The first Decad was originally printed in 1552, the 2nd in 1553, the 3rd in 1563; the 4th as completed by Lavanha in 1613 (Barbosa-Machado, Bibl. Lusit. ii. pp. 606-607, as corrected by Fignanière, Bibliogr. Hist. Port. p. 169). A. B. In some of Burnell's quotations he uses the 2nd ed. of Decs. i. to iii. (1628), and the 1st ed. of Dec. iv. (1613). In these there is apparently no division into chapters, and I have transferred the references to the edition of 1778, from which all my own quotations are made, whenever I could identify the passages, having myself no convenient access to the older editions.

- It is not certain who wrote this ignoble book, but the author must have been in India.
- Castanheda, Fernão Lopez de. Historia do descobrimento e conquista da India. The original edition appeared at Coimbra, 1551-1561 (in 8 vols. 4to and folio), and was reprinted at Lisbon in 1833 (8 vols. sm. 4to.). This last ed. is used in quotations of the Port. text.
- Castanheda was the first writer on Indian affairs (Barbosa-Machado, Bibl. Lusit., ii. p. 30. See also Figinière, Bibliographia Hist. Port., pp. 165-167). He went to Goa in 1528, and died in Portugal in 1559.
- Castañeda. The First Booke of the Historie of the Discoverie and Conquest of the East Indias. . . . Transid. into English by N. L. (Litchfield), Gentleman. London, 1582. 4to.
- The translator has often altered the spelling of the Indian words, and his version is very loose, comparing it with the printed text of the Port. in the ed. of 1833. It is possible, however, that Litchfield had the first ed. of the first book (1551) before him, whereas the ed. of 1833 is a reprint of 1554. (A.B.).

- Correa, Gaspar, Lendas da India por. This most valuable, interesting, and detailed chronicle of Portuguese India was not published till in our own day it was issued by the Royal Academy of Lisbon—4 vols. in 7, in 4to, 1858-1864. The author went to India apparently with Jorge de Mello in 1512, and at an early date began to make notes for his history. The latest year that he mentions as having in it written a part of his history is 1561. The date of his death is not known.
- Most of the quotations from Correa, begun by Burnell and continued by me, are from this work published in Lisbon. Some are, however, taken from "The Three Voyages of Vasco da Gama and his Viceroyalty, from the Lendas da India of Gaspar Correa," by the Hon. E. J. Stanley (now Lord Stanley of Alderley). HAK. Soc. 1869.
- Coryat, T. Crudities. Reprinted from the ed. of 1611. 3 vols. 8vo. 1776.
- Couto, Diogo de. The edition of the Decadas da Asia quoted habitually is that of 1778 (see Barros). The 4th Decade (Couto's first) was published first in 1602, fol.; the 5th, 1612; the 6th, 1614; the 7th, 1616; the 8th, 1673; 5 books of the 12th, Paris, 1645. The 9th was first published in an edition issued in 1736; and 120 pp. of the 10th (when, is not clear). But the whole of the 10th, in ten books, is included in the publication of 1778. The 11th was lost, and a substitute by the editor is given in the ed. of 1778. Couto died 10th Dec. 1616.

Also sometimes quoted from the French version, viz. —
- Roger, Abraham. La Porte Ouverte. . . ou la Vraye Representation, &c. 4to. Amsterdam, 1670.
The author was the first Chaplain at Pulicat (1631-1641), and then for some years at Batavia (see Havart, p. 132). He returned home in 1647 and died in 1649, at Gouda (Pref. p. 3). The book was brought out by his widow. Thus, at the time that the English Chaplain Lord (q. v.) was studying the religion of the Hindus at Surat, the Dutch Chaplain Roger was doing the same at Pulicat. The work of the last is in every way vastly superior to the former. It was written at Batavia (see p. 117), and, owing to its publication after his death, there are a few misprints of Indian words. The author had his information from a Brahman named Padmanaba (Padmanābha), who knew Dutch, and who gave him a Dutch translation of Bhartihari's Satakas, which is printed at the end of the book. It is the first translation from Sanskrit into an European language (A. B.).

- This is the edn. quoted, with a few exceptions. Mr. Burnell writes:
- "We have also used the second edition of the original (?) Italian text (12mo, Venice, 1517). A third edition appeared at Milan in 1523 (4to), and a fourth at Venice in 1535. This interesting Journal was translated into English by Eden in 1576 (Svo), and Purchas (ii., pp. 1483-1494) gives an abridgment; it is thus one of the most important sources."
- Neither Mr. Winter Jones nor my friend Dr. Badger, in editing Varthema, seem to have been aware of the disparagement cast on his veracity in the famous Colloquios of Garcia de Orta (f. 29 v. and f. 30). These affect his statements as to his voyages in the further East; and deny his ever having gone beyond Calicut and Cochín; a thesis which it would not be difficult to demonstrate out of his own narrative.

A GLOSSARY

ABADA.

Abada, s. A word used by old Spanish and Portuguese writers for a 'rhinoceros,' and adopted by some of the older English narrators. The origin is a little doubtful. If it were certain that the word did not occur earlier than c. 1530-40, it would most probably be an adoption from the Malay badak, 'a rhinoceros.' The word is not used by Barros where he would probably have used it if he knew it (see quotation under Ganda); and we have found no proof of its earlier existence in the language of the Peninsula; if this should be established we should have to seek an Arabic origin, in such a word as ābid, fem. ābida, of which one meaning is (v. Lane) 'a wild animal.' The usual form abada is certainly somewhat in favour of such an origin.

It will be observed that more than one authority makes it the female rhinoceros, and in the dictionaries the word is feminine. But so Barros makes Ganda.

1541. "Mynes of Silver, Copper, Tin, and Lead, from whence great quantities thereof were continually drawn, which the Merchants carried away with Troops of Elephants and Rhinoceroses (em casilhas de elefantes e badas) for to transport into the Kingdoms of Sornau, by us called Siam, Passiloco, Sarady, (Savady in orig.), Tangu, Prom, Calaminham and other Provinces . . . ."—Pinto (orig. cap. xli.) in Cogan, p. 49.

The kingdoms named here are Siam (see under Sarnau); Pitchalok and Sawatti (now two provinces of Siam); Taungu and Frome in B. Burma; Calaminham, in the interior of Indo-China, more or less fabulous.

1544. "Now the King of Tartary was fallen upon the City of Pequin with so great an army as the like had never been seen since Adam's time; in this army . . . were seven and twenty Kings, under whom marched 1,800,000 men . . . with four scorethousand Rhinoceroses" (dondepartirão com oitenta mil badas).—Ib. (orig. cap. cvii.) in Cogan, p. 149.

1585. "It is a very fertile country, with great store of provisions; there are elephants in great number and abadas, which is a kind of beast so big as two great bulls, and hath upon his snout a little horn."—Mendoza, ii. 311.

1592. "We sent commodities to their king to barter for Amber-grease, and for the horns of Abath, whereof the King only hath the traffique in his hands. Now this Abath is a beast which hath one horn only in her forehead, and is thought to be the female Vnicorne, and is highly esteemed of all the Moores in those parts as a most sovereign remedie against poyson."—Barker in Hak. ii. 591.

1598. "The Abada, or Rhinoceros is not in India,* but only in Bengala and Patane."—Linschoten, 88.

"Also in Bengala we found great numbers of the beasts which in Latin are called Rhinocerosotes, and of the Portingalles Abadas."—Ib. 28.

c. 1606. ". . . ove portano le loro mercanzie per venderle a' Cinesi, particolarmente . . . molti corni della Bada, detto Rinoceronte. . ."—Carletti, p. 199.

1611. "Bada, a very fierce animal, called by another more common name Rhinoceros. In our days they brought to the King Philip II., now in glory, a Bada which was long at Madrid, having his horn sawn off, and being blinded, for fear he should hurt any body. . . . The name of Bada is one imposed by the Indians themselves; but assuming that there is no language but had its origin from the Hebrew in the confusion of tongues . . . it will not be out of the way to observe that Bada is an Hebrew word, from Badad, 'solus, solitarius,' for this animal is produced in desert and very solitary places."—Cobarruvias, s. v.

1613. "And the woods give great timber,

1618. “A China brought me a present of a cup of abado (or black unecorns horne) with sugar cakes.”—Cocks's Diary, ii. 56.

1626. On the margin of Pigafetta's Congo, as given by Purchas (ii. 1001) we find: “Rhinoceros or Abadas.”

1726. “Abada, s. f. La hembra del Rhinoceronte.”—Dicc. de la Lengua Castellana.

Abcáree, Abkary. Hind. from Pers. áb-kārī, the business of distilling or selling (strong) waters, and hence elliptically the excise upon such business. This last is the sense in which it is used by Anglo-Indians. In every district of India the privilege of selling spirits is farmed to contractors, who manage the sale through retail shop-keepers. This is what is called the ‘Abkary System.’ The system has often been attacked as promoting tippling, and there are strong opinions on both sides. We subjoin an extract from a note on the subject, too long for insertion in integrity, by one of much experience in Bengal.*

June, 1879. “Natives who have expressed their views are, I believe, unanimous in ascribing the increase of drinking to our Abkaree system. I don't say that this is putting the cart before the horse, but they are certainly too forgetful of the increased means in the country, which, if not the sole cause of the increased consumption, has been at least a very large factor in that result. I myself believe that more people drink now than formerly: but I knew one gentleman of very long and intimate knowledge of Bengal, who held that there was as much drinking in 1820 as in 1860.”

In any case exaggeration is abundant. All Sanskrit literature shows that tippling is no absolute novelty in India.

1797. “The stamps are to have the words ‘Abcaree licenses’ inscribed in the Persian and Hindes languages and character.”—Bengal Regulations, x. 33.

Abihówa. Properly (Pers.) áb-o-hawā, ‘water and air.’ The usual Hindustani expression for ‘climate.’

1786. “What you write concerning the death of 500 Koorgs from small-pox is understood . . . they must be kept where the climate [áb-o-hawā] may best agree with them.”—Tippoo's Letters, 269.

Achánoek, n.p. Hind. Chānak and Achānak. The name by which the station of Barrackpore (q.v.) is commonly known to sepoys and other natives. Some have connected the name with that of Job Charnock, or, as A. Hamilton calls him, Channock, the founder of Calcutta, and the quotations render this probable. Formerly the Cantonment of Secrole at Benares was also known, by a transfer no doubt, as Chotā (or Little) Achānak.

1726. “'t stedecken Tsjannock.”—Valentijn, v. 153. In Val's map of Bengal also, we find opposite to Oegli (Hoogly), Tsjannok, and then Collecatte, and Calcuta.

1758. “Notwithstanding these solemn assurances from the Dutch it was judged expedient to send a detachment of troops . . . to take possession of Tanna Fort and Charnoc's Battery opposite to it.”—Narrative of Dutch attempt in the Hoogly, in Malcolm's Life of Clive, ii. 76.

1810. “The old village of Achanock stood on the ground which the post of Barrackpore now occupies.”—M. Graham, 142.

1848. “From an oral tradition still prevalent among the natives at Barrackpore . . . we learn that Mr. Charnock built a bungalow there, and a flourishing bazar arose under his patronage, before the settlement of Calcutta had been determined on. Barrackpore is at this day best known to the natives by the name of Chanock.”—The Bengal Obituary, Calc. p. 2.

Achár, s. Pers. achār, adopted in nearly all the vernaculars of India for acid and salt relishes. By Europeans it is used as the equivalent of ‘pickles,’ and is applied to all the stores of Crosse and Blackwell in that kind. We have adopted the word through the Portuguese; but it is not impossible that Western Asiatics got it originally from the Latin acetaria.—(See Plin. Hist. Nat. xix. 19).

1563. “And they prepare a conserve of it (Anacardium) with salt, when it is green (and this they call Achar), and this is sold in the market just as olives are with us.”—Garcia de O. f. 17.

1596. Linschoten in the Dutch gives the word correctly, but in the English version (1598) it is printed Machar.

1616. “Our jurebasso's* wife came and brought me a small jar of achar for a present, desyring me to exskews her husband in that he abcented hymselfe to take phisik.”—Cocks, i. 135.

1623. “And all these preserved in a way that is really very good, which they call acciao."—Della Valle, ii. 708.

* Sir G. U. Yule.

1683. "Achar est vn nom Indistanni, ou Indien, que signifie des mangues, ou autres fruits confis avec de la moutarde, de l'ail, du sel, et du vinaigre à l'Indienne."—De la Boullaye, 531.

1687. "Achar I presume signifies sauce. They make in the East Indies, especially at Siam and Pegu, several sorts of Achar, as of the young tops of Bamboes, &c. Bambo-Achar and Mango-Achar are most used."—Dampier, i. 391.

1727. "And the Soldiery, Fishers, Peasants, and Handicrafts (of Goa) feed on a little Rice boiled in Water, with a little bit of Salt Fish, or Atchaar, which is pickled Fruits or Roots."—A. Hamilton, i. 252.

1783. We learn from Forrest that limes, salted for sea-use against scurvy, were used by the Chulias (v. Choolia), and were called atchar (Voyage to Mergui, 40). Thus the word passed to Java, as in next quotation:

1768-71. "When green it (the mango) is made into attjar; for this the kernel is taken out, and the space filled in with ginger, pimento, and other spicy ingredients, after which it is pickled in vinegar."—Stavorinus, i. 237.

Acheen, n.p. (Pers. Āchīn.) The name applied by us to the state and town at the N.W. angle of Sumatra, which was long, and especially during the 16th & 17th centuries, the greatest native power on that Island. The proper Malay name of the place is Aché. The Portuguese generally called it Achem (or frequently, by the adhesion of the genitive preposition, Dachem, so that Sir F. Greville below makes two kingdoms), but our Acheen seems to have been derived from the mariners of the P. Gulf or W. India, for we find the name so given (Āchīn) in the Āin-i-Akbari, and in the Geog. Tables of Ṣāḍik Isfahāni. This form may have been suggested by a jingling analogy, such as Orientalis love, with Māchin (q.v.). See also under Looty.

1549. "Piratarum Acenorum nec periculum nec suspicio fuit."—S. Fr. Xav. Epist. 337.

1552. "But after Malacca was founded, and especially at the time of our entry into India, the Kingdom of Pacem began to increase in power, and that of Pedir to diminish. And that neighbouring one of Achem, which was then insignificant, is now the greatest of all."—Barros, III. v. 8.

c. 1590. "The zabād (civet), which is brought from the harbour-town of Sumatra, from the territory of Achīn, goes by the name of Sumatra-zabād, and is by far the best."—Āin, i. 79.

1597. "... do Pegu como do Dachem."—King's Letter, in Arch. Port. Or. fasc. 3, 669.

1599. "The island of Sumatra, or Taprobuna, is possessed by many Kynges, enemies to the Portugals; the cheif is the Kinge of Dachem, who besieged them in Malacca. . . The Kinges of Acheyn and Tor (read Jor for Johore) are in lyke sorte enemies to the Portugals."—Sir Fulke Greville to Sir F. Walsingham (in Bruce, i. 125).

c. 1635. "Achīn (a name equivalent in rhyme or metre to 'Māchīn'), is a well known island in the Chinese Sea, near to the equinoctial line."—Ṣāḍik Isfahāni (Or. Tr. F.) p. 2.

1820. "In former days, a great many junks used to frequent Achin. This trade is now entirely at an end."—Crawford, H. Ind. Arch. iii. 182.

Adam's Apple. This name (Pomo d'Adamo) is given at Goa to the fruit of the Mimusops Elengi, Linn. (Birdwood); and in the 1635 ed. of Gerarde's Herball it is applied to the Plantain. But in earlier days it was applied to a fruit of the Citron kind.—(See Marco Polo, 2nd ed., i. 101), and the following:

c. 1580. "In his hortis (of Cairo) ex arboribus virescunt mala citria, aurantia, limonia sylvestria et domestica poma Adami vocata."—Prosop. Alpinus, i. 16.

c. 1712. "It is a kind of lime or citron tree . . . it is called Pomum Adami, because it has on its rind the appearance of two bites, which the simplicity of the ancients imagined to be the vestiges of the impression which our forefather made upon the forbidden fruit." . . . Bluteau, quoted by Tr. of Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. i. 100.

The fruit has nothing to do with zambo, with which Bluteau and Mr. Birch connect it. See Jambu.

Adati, s. A kind of piece goods exported from Bengal. We do not know the proper form or etymology. It may have been of half-width (from Hind. adhā, 'half').

* This alludes to the mistaken notion, as old as N. Conti (c. 1440), that Sumatra = Taprobane.

1726. "Casseri [probably Kasiari in Midnapur Dist.] supplies many Taffat-shelas,* Ginggangs, Allegias, and Adathays, which are mostly made there."—Valentiyn, v. 159.

1813. Among Bengal piece-goods: "Ad-daties, Pieces 700" (i.e. pieces to the ton).—Milburn, ii. 221.

Adawlut, s. Ar.—H.—'adālat, 'a Court of Justice,' from 'adl, 'doing justice.' Under the Mahommedan government there were 3 such courts, viz., Nizāmat 'Adālat, Dīvānī 'Adālat, and Faujdarī 'Adālat, so-called from the respective titles of the officials who nominally presided over them. The first was the chief Criminal Court, the second a Civil Court, the third a kind of Police Court. In 1793, regular Courts were established under the British Government, and then the Sudder Adawlut (Ṣadr 'Adālat) became the chief Court of Appeal for each Presidency, and its work was done by several European (Civilian) Judges. That court was, on the criminal side, termed Nizāmut Adawlat, and on the civil side Devanny Ad. At Madras and Bombay, Foujdarry was the style adopted in lieu of Nizāmut. This system ended in 1863, on the introduction of the Penal Code, and the institution of the High Courts on their present footing.

On the original history and constitution of the Courts see Fifth Report, 1812, p. 6.

1826. "The adawlut or Court-house was close by."—Pand. Hari, 271.

Adigar, s. Properly adhikār, from Skt. adhikārin, one possessing authority; Tam. adhikāri, or -kāren. The title was formerly in use in South India, and perhaps still is in the native states of Malabar, for a rural headman. It was also in Ceylon (adikārama, adikār) the title of a chief minister of the Candyan Kings.

1544. "Fac te comem et humanum cum isti Gentī praebeas, tum praesertim magistratibus eorum et Praefectis Pagorum, quos Adigares vocant."—S. Fr. Xav. Epist. 113.

1681. "There are two who are the greatest and highest officers in the land. They are called Adigars, I may term them Chief Judges."—Knox, 48.

1726. Adigaar. This is as it were the Second of the Dessave.—Valentiyn (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 9.

1796. "In Malabar esiste oggidì l'uffizio

... molti Kāriakār o ministri; molti Adhigāri o ministri d'un distretto..."—Fra Paolino, 237.

1803. "The highest officers of State are the Adigars or Prime Ministers. They are two in number."—Percival's Ceylon, 256.

Adjutant, s. A bird so called (no doubt) from its comical resemblance to a human figure in a stiff dress pacing slowly on a parade-ground. It is the (Hind.) hargilā, or gigantic crane, and popular scavenger of Bengal, the Leptoptilus argala of Linnæus. The Hind. name is by some dictionaries derived from a supposed Sansk. word hadda-gilā, 'bone-swallower.' The compound, however appropriate, is not to be found in Bohtlingk and Roth's great Dictionary. The bird is very well described by Aelian, under the name of Kṛṇa, which is perhaps a relic of the still preserved vernacular one. It is described by another name, as one of the peculiarities of India, by Sultan Baber.

"The feathers known as Marabou or Comercolly feathers, and sold in Calcutta, are the under tail-coverts of this, and the Lept. Javanica, another and smaller species" (Jerdon). The name marabout (from the Ar. murābit, 'quiet,' and thence 'a hermit,' through the Port. marabuto) seems to have been given to the bird in Africa on like reason to that of adjutant in India.

c. A.D. 250. "And I hear that there is in India a bird Kēla, which is 3 times as big as a bustard; it has a mouth of a frightful size, and long legs, and it carries a huge crop which looks like a leather bag; it has a most dissonant voice, and whilst the rest of the plumage is ash-coloured, the tail-feathers are of a pale (or greenish) colour."—Aelian, de Nat. Anim. xvi. 4.

c. 1530. "One of these (fowls) is the dīng, which is a large bird. Each of its wings is the length of a man; on its head and neck there is no hair. Something like a bag hangs from its neck; its back is black, its breast white; it frequently visits Kābul. One year they caught and brought me a dīng, which became very tame. The flesh which they threw it, it never failed to catch in its beak, and swallowed without ceremony. On one occasion it swallowed a shoe well shod with iron; on another occasion it swallowed a good-sized fowl right down, with its wings and feathers."—Baber, 321.

1754. "In the evening excursions... we had often observed an extraordinary species of birds, called by the natives Argill or Hargill, a native of Bengal. They would majestically stalk along before us, and at first we took them for Indians naked... The following are the exact marks and dimensions... The wings extended 14 feet and 10 inches. sured 7 feet 6 inches . . . In the craw was a Terapin or land-tortoise, 10 inches long; and a large black male cat was found entire in its stomach."—Ives, 183-4.

1798. "The next is the great Heron, the Argali or Adjutant, or Gigantic Crane of Latham . . . It is found also in Guinea."—Pennant's View of Hindostan, ii. 156.

1810. "Every bird saving the vulture, the adjutant (or argeelah), and kite, retires to some shady spot."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 3. See also s. v. Pelican.

Afghân, n.p. P.—H.—Afghân. The most general name of the predominant portion of the congeries of tribes beyond the N.W. frontier of India, whose country is called from them Afghânistân.

In England one often hears the country called Afgunist-un, which is a mispronunciation painful to an Anglo-Indian ear, and even Afgann, which is a still more excruciating solecism.

c. 1020. "... Afghâns and Khiljis . . ."—Utbi in Elliot, ii. 24; see also 50, 114.

c. 1265. "He also repaired the fort of Jalâlî, which he garrisoned with Afghâns."—Tarîk-i-Firozshâhî in do., iii. 106.

14th cent. The Afghans are named by the continuator of Rashiduddin among the tribes in the vicinity of Herat (see N. & E. xiv. 494).

1609. "Agwans and Potans."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 521.

1676. "The people called Augans who inhabit from Candahar to Caboul . . . a sturdy sort of people, and great Robbers in the night-time."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 44.

1838. "Professor Dorn . . . discusses severally the theories that have been maintained of the descent of the Afghauns: 1st, from the Copts; 2nd, the Jews; 3rd, the Georgians; 4th, the Toorks; 5th, the Moguls; 6th, the Armenians; and he mentions more cursorily the opinion that they are descended from the Indo-Scythians, Medians, Sogdians, Persians, and Indians: on considering all which, he comes to the rational conclusion, that they cannot be traced to any tribe or country beyond their present seats and the adjoining mountains."—Elphinstone's Caubool, ed. 1839, i. 209.

1682. "Here we met with y<sup>e</sup> Barbadoes Merchant . . . James Cock, Master, laden with Salt, Mules, and Africos."—Hedges, Journal, Feb. 27.

Agar-agar, s. The Malay name of a kind of sea-weed (Spherococcus lichenoïdes). It is succulent when boiled to a jelly; and is used by the Chinese with birdnest in soup. They also employ it as a glue, and apply it to silk and paper intended to be transparent. It grows on the shores of the Malay Islands, and is much exported to China.—(See Crawford, Dict. Ind. Arch., and Milburn, ii. 304).

Agun-boat, s. A hybrid word for a steamer, from Hind. Agan, 'fire,' and Eng. boat. In Bombay Ag-bôt is used.

1853. . . . "Agin boat."—Oakfield, i. 84.

Ak, s. H. āk (and ark, in Sindi āk) the prevalent name of the madār (v. Muddār) in Central and Western India. It is said to be a popular belief (of course erroneous) in Sind, that Akbar was so-called after the āk, from his birth in the desert. The word appears in the following popular rhyme quoted by Tod (Rajasthan, i. 699).

Phok-rā bār,
Bajra-rā rotī,
Moth-rā dāl :

Dekho Rājā teri Mārwar !

(For houses hurdles of madār,
For hedges heaps of withered thorn,
Millet for bread, horse-peas for pulse :
Such is thy kingdom, Rājā of Mārwar !)

Akyâb, n.p. The European name of the seat of administration of the British province of Arakan, which is also a port exporting rice largely to Europe. The name is never used by the natives of Arakan (of the Burmese race), who call the town Tsit-tiwé, 'Crowd (in consequence of) War.' This indicates how the settlement came to be formed in 1825, by the fact of the British force encamping on the plain there, which was found to be healthier than the site of the ancient capital of the kingdom of Arakan, up the valley of the Arakan or Kaladyne R. The name Akyâb had been applied, probably by the Portuguese, to a neighbouring village, where there stands, about 1½ m. from the present town, a pagoda covering an alleged relique of Gautama (a piece of the lower jaw, or an induration of the throat), the name of which pagoda, taken from the description of relique, is Au-kyait-dau, and of this, Akyâb was probably a corruption. The present town and cantonment occupy dry land of very recent formation, and the high ground on which the pagoda stands must have stood on the shore at no distant date, as appears from the finding of a small anchor there about 1835. The village adjoining the pagoda must then have stood at the mouth of the Arakan R., which was much frequented by the Portuguese and the Chittagong people in the 16th and 17th centuries, and thus probably became known to them by a name taken from the pagoda.—(From a note by Sir Arthur Phayre.)

Albacore, s. A kind of rather large sea-fish, of the Tunny genus (Thynnus albacora, Lowe, perhaps same as Thynnus macropterus, Day). From the Portuguese Albacor or Albecora. The quotations from Ovington and Grose below refer it to albo, but the word is, from its form, almost certainly Arabic, though Dozy says he has not found the word in this sense in Arabic dictionaries, which are very defective in the names of fishes (p. 61). The word albacora in Sp. is applied to a large early kind of fig, from Ar. al-bākūr, 'præcox' (Dozy), Heb. bikkūra, in Micah vii. 1. —See Cobarruvias s. v. Albacora.

1579. "These (flying fish) have two enemies, the one in the sea, the other in the air. In the sea the fish which is called Albocore, as big as a salmon."—Letter from Goa, by T. Stevens, in Hakl. ii. 583.

1592. "In our passage over from S. Laurence to the maine, we had exceeding great store of Bonitos and Albocores."—Barker, in Hakl. ii. 592.

1696. "We met likewise with Shoals of Albicores (so call'd from a piece of white Flesh that sticks to their Heart) and with multitude of Bonettes, which are named from their Goodness and Excellence for eating; so that sometimes for more than twenty Days the whole Ship's Company have feasted on these curious fish."—Ovington, p. 48.

c. 1760. "The Albacore is another fish of much the same kind as the Bonito . . . from 60 to 90 pounds weight and upward. The name of this fish too is taken from the Portuguese, importing its white color."—Grose, i. 5.

Albatross, s. The great sea-bird (Diomedea exulans, L.), from the Port. alcaturaz, to which the forms used by Hawkins and Dampier, and by Flacourt (according to Marcel Devic) closely approach. The Port. word properly means 'a pelican.' A reference to the latter word in our Glossary will show another curious misapplication. Devic states that alcaturaz in Port. means 'the bucket of a Persian wheel,'* representing the Ar. al-kādūs, which is again from kādos. He supposes that the pelican may have got this name in the same way that it is called in ordinary Ar. sakka, 'a water-carrier.'

It has been pointed out by Dr. Murray, that the alcaturaz of some of the early voyagers, e.g., of Davis below, is not the Diomedea, but the Man-of-War (or Frigate) Bird (Fregatus aquilus). Hawkins, at p. 187 of the work quoted, describes without naming, a bird which is evidently the modern albatross. In the quotation from Mocquet again, alcaturaz is applied to some smaller sea-bird. The passage from Shelvocke is that which suggested to Coleridge "The Ancient Mariner."

1564. "The 8th December we ankered by a small Island called Alcatrarsa, wherein at our going a shoare, we found nothing but sea-birds, as we call them Ganets, but by the Portugals called Alcatrarses, who for that cause gave the said Island the same name."—Hawkins (Hak. Soc.), 15.

1593. "The dolphins and bonitoes are the houndes, and the alcatrarces the hawkes, and the flying fishes the game."—Id. 152.

1604. "The other foule called Alcatrarzi is a kind of Hawke that liueth by fishing. For when the Bonitos or Dolphines doe chase the flying fish vnder the water . . . this Alcatrarzi flyeth after them like a Hawke after a Partridge."—Davis (Hak. Soc.) 158.

c. 1608-10. "Alcatraz sont petis oiseaux ainsi comme estourneaux."—Mocquet, Voyages, 226.

1672. "We met with those feathered Harbingers of the Cape . . . Albetrosses . . . they haue great Bodies, yet not proportionate to their Wings, which mete out twice their length."—Fryer, 12.

1690. "They have several other Signs, whereby to know when they are near it, as by the Sea Fowl they meet at Sea, especially the Algatrosses, a very large long-winged Bird."—Dampier, i. 531.

1719. "We had not had the sight of one fish of any kind, since we were come Southward of the Straights of Le Mair, nor one sea-bird, except a disconsolate black Albitross, who accompanied us for several days, hovering about us as if he had lost himself, till Hatley (my second Captain) observing, in one of his melancholy fits, that this bird was always hovering near us, imagin'd from his colour, that it might be some ill omen . . . . But be that as it would, he after some fruitless attempts, at length shot the Albitross, not doubting (perhaps) that we should have a fair wind after it. . . .”—Shelvocke's Voyage, 72, 73.

1740. “. . . a vast variety of sea-fowl, amongst which the most remarkable are the Penguins; they are in size and shape like a goose, but instead of wings they have short stumps like fins . . . their bills are narrow like those of an Albitross, and they stand and walk in an erect posture. From this and their white bellies, Sir John Narborough has whimsically likened them to little children standing up in white aprons.”—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. (1756), p. 68.

1754. “An albatrose, a sea-fowl, was shot off the Cape of Good Hope, which measured 17½ feet from wing to wing.”—Ives, 5, 1803.

“At length did cross an Albatross;
Thorough the fog it came;
As if it had been a Christian soul
We hailed it in God's name.”

c. 1861.

Prennent des albatros, vastes oiseaux des mers,
Qui suivent, indolents compagnons de voyage,
Le navire glissant sur les gouffres amers.”
Baudelaire, L'Albatros.

Alcatif, s. This word for ‘a carpet’ was much used in India in the 16th century, and is treated by some travellers as an Indian word. It is not however of Indian origin, but is an Arabic word (katif, ‘a carpet with long pile’) introduced into Portugal through the Moors.

c. 1540. “There came aboard of Antonio de Faria more than 60 batels, and balloons, and manchruas,* with awnings and flags of silk, and rich alcatifas.”—Pinto, ch. lxviii. (orig.).

1560. “The whole tent was cut in a variety of arabesques, inlaid with coloured silk, and was carpeted with rich alcatifas.”—Tenreiro, Itin. c. xvii.

1578. “The windows of the streets by which the Viceroy passes shall be hung with carpets (alcatifadas), and the doors decorated with branches, and the whole adorned as richly as possible.”—Archiv. Port. Orient, fascic. ii. 225.

1608-10. “Quand elles vont à l'Eglise on les porte en palanquin . . . le dedans est d'un grand tapis de Perse, qu'ils appellent Alcatif.” . . . —Pyrard, ii. 62.

1648. . . . “many silk stuffs, such as satin, contenijis,† attelap (read attelas), alegie . . . ornijs (?) of gold and silk for women's wear, gold alacatijven . . .”—Van Twist, 50.

1726. “They know nought of chairs or tables. The small folks eat on a mat, and the rich on an Alcatief, or carpet, sitting with their feet under them, like our Tailors.”—Valentijn, v. Chorum, 55.

Alcove, s. This English word comes to us through the Span. alcova and Fr. alcove (old Fr. aucube), from Ar. al-kubbah, applied first to a kind of tent (so in Hebr. Numbers, xxv. 8) and then to a vaulted building or recess. An edifice of Saracenic construction at Palermo is still known as La Cuba; and another, a domed tomb, as La Cubola. Whatever be the true formation of the last word, it seems to have given us, through the Italian, Cupola.

Aldea, s. A village; also a villa. Port. from the Ar. al-dai'a, ‘a farm or villa.’ Bluteau explains it as: Povoação menor que lugar.” Lane gives among other and varied meanings of the Arabic word: “An estate consisting of land or of land and a house, . . . land yielding a revenue.” The word forms part of the name of many towns and villages in Spain and Portugal.

1547. “The Governor (of Baçæm), Dom João de Castro, has given and gives many aldeas and other grants of land to Portuguese who served and were wounded at the fortress of Dio, and to others of long service.” . . . —Simão Botelho, Cartas 3.

1678. “Here . . . in a sweet Air, stood a Magnificent Rural Church; in the way to which, and indeed all up and down this Island, are pleasant Aldeas, or Country Seats of the Gentry.”—Fryer, 71.

1726. “There are also towards the interior many Aldeas, or villages and hamlets that . . . swarm with people.”—Valentijn, v. (Malabar) 11.

1780. “The Coast between these is filled with Aldees, or villages of the Indians.”—Dunn, N. Directory, 5th ed. 110.

1782. “Il y a aussi quelques Aldées considérables, telles que Navar et Portenove, qui appartiennent aux Princes du pays.”—Sonnerat, Voyage, i. 37.

Aleppee, n.p. On the coast of Travancore; properly Alappuli.

Aljofar, s. Port. ‘seed-pearl.’ Cobarruvias says it is from Ar. al-jauhar, ‘jewel.’

Allahabad, n.p. This name—Allah-ābād, which was given in the time of Akbar to the old Hindu Prāg, has been subjected to a variety of corrupt pronunciations, both European and native. Ilahābāz is a not uncommon native form, converted by Europeans into Halabas, and further by English soldiers formerly into Isle o' bats. And the Illiabād, which we find in the Hastings charges, survives in the Elleebad still heard occasionally.

c. 1686. "La Province de Halabas s'appelloit autrefois Puorop" (vide Poorub).—Thevenot, v. 197.

"You will see in the letters from the Board . . . a plan for obtaining Illabād from the Vizier, to which he had spirit enough to make a successful resistance."—Cornwallis, i. 238.

Alleja, s. This appears to be a stuff from Turkestan called (Turki) alchah, alajah, or alāchah. It is thus described: "a silk cloth 5 yards long, which has a sort of wavy line pattern running in the length on either side." (Baden Powell's Punjab Handbook, 66.)

c. 1590. "The improvement is visible. . . . secondly in the Safid Alchahs also called Tarhādrs. . . ."—Ain, i. 91. (Blochmann says: "Alchah or Alāchah, any kind of corded stuff. Tarhādr means corded.")

Alligator, s. This is the usual Anglo-Indian term for the great lacer-tine amphibia of the rivers. It was apparently in origin a corruption, imported from S. America, of the Spanish lagarto (from Lat. lacerta), 'a lizard.' The "Summary of the Western Indies" by Pietro Martire d'Angheria, as given in Ramusio, recounting the last voyage of Columbus, says that, in a certain river, "they sometimes encountered those crocodiles which they call Lagarti; these make away when they see Christians, and in making away they leave behind them an odour more fragrant than musk" (Ram. iii. f. 17v). Oviedo, on another page of the same volume, calls them "lagarti o dragoni" (f. 62).

Bluteau gives "Lagarto, Crocodilo," and adds: "In the Oriente Conquistado (Part I. f. 823), you will find a description of the Crocodile under the name of Lagarto."

One often, in Anglo-Indian conversation, used to meet with the endeavour to distinguish the two well-known species of the Ganges as Crocodile and Alligator, but this, like other applications of popular and general terms to mark scientific distinctions, involves fallacy, as in the cases of 'panther, leopard,' 'camel, dromedary,' 'attorney, solicitor,' and so forth. The two kinds of Gangetic crocodile were known to Aelian (c. 250 A.D.), who writes: "It (the Ganges) breeds two kinds of crocodiles; one of these is not at all hurtful, whilst the other is the most voracious and cruel eater of flesh; and these have a horny prominence on the top of the nostril. These latter are used as ministers of vengeance upon evil-doers; for those convicted of the greatest crimes are cast to them; and they require no executioner."

1493. "In a small adjacent island . . . our men saw an enormous kind of lizard (lagarto muy grande), which they said was as large round as a calf, and with a tail as long as a lance, . . . but bulky as it was, it got into the sea, so that they could not catch it."—Letter of Dr. Chanca, in Select Letters of Columbus by Major, Hak. Soc. 2nd ed. 43.

1539. "All along this River, that was not very broad, there were a number of Lizards (lagartos), which might more properly be called Serpents . . . with scales upon their backs, and mouths two foot wide. . . . there be of them that will sometimes get upon an almadia . . . and overturn it with their tails, swallowing up the men

Alligator-pear, s. The fruit of the Laurus persea, Lin., Persea gratissima, Gaertn. The name as here given is an extravagant, and that of avocato or avogato a more moderate, corruption of aguacate or ahuacatl (see below), which appears to have been the native name in Central America, still surviving there. The Quichua name is patta, which is used as well as aguacaté by Cieza de Leon, and also by Joseph de Acosta. Grainger (Sugarcane, Bk. I.) calls it "rich sabbaca," which he says is "the Indian name of the avocato, avocado, avigato, or as the English corruptly call it, alligator-pear. The Spaniards in S. America call it Aguacate, and under that name it is described by Ulloa." In French it is called avocat. The praise which Grainger, as quoted below, "liberally bestows" on this fruit, is, if we might judge from the specimens occasionally met with in India, absurd. With liberal pepper and salt there may be a remote suggestion of marrow: but that is all. Indeed it is hardly a fruit in the ordinary sense. Its common sea name of 'midshipman's butter' is suggestive of its merits, or demerits. Though common and naturalized throughout the W. Indies and E. coasts of tropical S. America, its actual native country is unknown. Its introduction into the Eastern world is comparatively recent; not older than the middle of last century. Had it been worth eating it would have come long before.

Almadia, s. This is a word introduced into Portuguese from Moorish Arabic (al-ma’diyya). Properly it means ‘a raft’ (see Dozy s.v.). But it is generally used by the writers on India for a canoe, or the like small native boat. See Pinto under Alligator.

Almanack, s. On this difficult word see Dozy’s Oosterlingén. In a passage quoted by Eusebius from Porphyry (Praep. Evangel. t. iii. ed. Gaisford), there is mention of Egyptian calendars called αλμεινιανα. Also in the Vocabular Arawigo of Pedro de Alcalá (1503) the Ar. Manāk is given as the equivalent of the Spanish almanaque, which seems to show that the Sp. Arabs did use manākāh in the sense required, probably having adopted it from the Egyptian, and having assumed the initial al to be their own article.

Almyra, s. H. almārī. A wardrobe, chest of drawers, or like piece of (closed) furniture. The word is in general use, by masters and servants in Anglo-Indian households, in both N. and S. India. It has come to us from the Port. almario, but it is the same word as Fr. armoire, old E. ambry, &c., and Sc. awmry, originating in the Lat. armarium, or -riū, which occurs also in L. Gr. as ἀρμάρη, ἀρμάριον.

Aloes, s. The name aloes is applied to two entirely different substances:
a. the drug prepared from the inspissated bitter juice of the Aloe Socotrina, Lam. In this meaning (a) the name is considered (Hanbury and Flückiger, Pharmacographia, 616) to be derived from the Syriac ’elwāi (in Pers. alwā).
b. Aloes-wood, the same as Eagle-wood (q.v.). This is perhaps from one of the Indian forms, through the Hebrew (pl. forms) ahālim and ahālōth.

(a) c. A.D. 70. “The best Aloe (Latin the same) is brought out of India. . . . Much use there is of it in many cases, but principally to loosen the belly; being the only purgative medicine that is comfortable to the stomach. . . .”—Pliny, Bk. xxvii. (Ph. Holland, ii. 212).

1839. "..... A sort of good-natured house-keeper-like bodies, who talk only of ayahs and amahs, and bad nights, and babies, and the advantages of Hodgson's ale while they are nursing: seeming in short devoted to 'suckling fools and chattering small beer.'"—Letters from Madras, 294. See also p. 106.

Ambaree, s. This is a Persian word ('amārī') for a howda (q.v.), and the word occurs in Colebrooke's letters, but is quite unusual now. Gladwin defines Amaree as "an umbrella over the Howdeh" (Index to Ayeen, i.). The proper application is to a canopied howda, such as is still used by native princes.

1798. "The Rajah's Sowarree was very grand and superb. He had twenty elephants, with richly embroidered ambarrehs, the whole of them mounted by his sirdars, —he himself riding upon the largest, put in the centre."—Skinner, Mem. i. 137.

Amboyna, n.p. A famous island in the Molucca Sea, belonging to the Dutch. The native form of the name is Ambūn.

Ameen, s. The word is Arab. amin, meaning 'a trustworthy person' and then an inspector, intendant, &c. In India it has several uses as applied to native officials employed under the Civil Courts, but nearly all reduceable to the definition of fide-commissarius. Thus an ameen may be employed by a court to investigate accounts connected with a suit, to prosecute local inquiries of any kind bearing on a suit, to sell or to deliver over possession of immovable property, to carry out legal process as a bailiff, &c. The name is also applied to native assistants in the duties of land-survey.—But see Sudder Ameen.

1817. "Native officers called aumeens were sent to collect accounts, and to obtain information in the districts. The first incidents that occurred were complaints against these aumeens for injurious treatment of the inhabitants. . . ."—Mull, Hist. ed. 1840, iv. 12.

1861. "Bengallee dewans, once pure, are converted into demons; Ameens once harmless, become tigers; magistrates, supposed to be just, are converted into oppressors."—Peterson, Speech for Prosecution in Nil Durpan case.

1878. "The Ameen employed in making the partition of an estate."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 206.

1882. "A missionary . . . might, on the other hand, be brought to a standstill when asked to explain all the terms used by an amin or valuator who had been sent to fix the judicial rents. . . ."—Saty. Rev., Dec. 30, p. 866.

Ameer, s. Arab. Amīr (root amr, 'commanding,' and so) 'a commander, chief, or lord,' and, in Arabic application, any kind of chief from the 'Amir of the Faithful,' i.e. the Caliph, downwards. The word in this form perhaps first became familiar as applied to the Princes of Sind, at the time of the conquest of that Province by Sir C. J. Napier. It is the title affected by many Musulman sovereigns of various calibres, as the Amir of Kābul, the Amir of Bokhārā, &c. But in sundry other forms the word has, more or less, taken root in European languages since the early middle ages. Thus it is the origin of the title 'Admiral,' now confined to generals of the sea service, but applied in varying forms by medieval Christian writers to the Amirs, or lords, of the court and army of Egypt and other Mahomedan States. The word also came to us again, by a later importation from the Levant, in the French form, Emir or Emer.—See also Omrah, which is in fact Umarā, the pl. of amār. Byzantine writers use 'Αμῆρ, 'Αμῆρας, 'Αμῆρας, 'Αμῆρας, &c. (See Ducange, Gloss. Græc.). It is the opinion of the best scholars that the forms Amiral, Ammiraglio, Admiral, &c., originated in the application of a Low Latin termination -alis or -alius, though some doubt may still attach to this question. (See Marcel Devic, s.v. Amiral, and Dozy, Oosterlingen, s.v. Admiraal). The d in admiral probably came from a false imagination of connexion with admirari.

1250. "Li grand amiraus des galies m'envoia querre, et me demanda si j'estoie cousins le roy; et je le di que nanin . . ."

This passage illustrates the sort of way in which our modern use of the word admiral originated.

c. 1345. "The Master of the Ship is like a great amir; when he goes ashore the archers and the blackamoors march before him with javelins and swords, with drums and horns and trumpets."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 93.

(Compare with this description of the Commander of a Chinese Junk in the 14th century, A. Hamilton's of an English Captain in Malabar in the end of the 17th :

"Captain Beaves, who commanded the Albemarle, accompanied us also, carrying a Drum and two Trumpets with us, to make our Compliment the more solemn." (i. 294.)

And this again of an "interloper" skipper at Hoogly, in 1683 :

1683. "Alley went in a splendid Equipage, habitted in scarlet richly laced. Ten Englishmen in Blue Capps and Coats edged with Red, all armed with Blunderbusses, went before his pallankeen, 80 (? 8) Peons before them, and 4 Musicians playing on the Weights with 2 Flaggs, before him, like an Agent . . ."—Hedges, Oct. 8.

Amlah. See Omla.

Amoy, n.p. A great seaport of Fokien in China, the name of which in Mandarin dialect is Hia-men, meaning 'Hall-Gate,' which is in the Chang-chau dialect A-mui. In some books of the last century it is called Emuy and the like. It is now a Treaty-Port.

1687. "Amoy or Anhay, which is a City standing on a Navigable River in the Province of Fokien in China, and is a place of vast Trade,"—Dampier, i. 417.

(This looks as if Dampier confounded the name of Amoy, the origin of which (as generally given) we have stated, with that of An-hai, one of the connected ports, which lies to the N.E., about 30 m. as the crow flies, from Amoy.)

1727. "There are some Curiosities in Amoy. One is a large Stone that weighs above forty Tuns, . . . in such an Equilibrium, that a Youth of twelve Years old can easily make it move."—A. Ham. ii. 243.

Amshom, s. Malayāl. Aṁṣam, from Skt. āmsah, 'a part,' defined by Gundert as 'part of a Talook, formerly called hobīṣi, greater than a tara.' It is further explained in the following quotation :—

1878. "The amshom is really the smallest revenue division there is in Malabar, and is generally a tract of country some square miles in extent, in which there is no such thing as a village, but a series of scattered homesteads and farms, where the owner of the land and his servants reside . . . separate and apart, in single separate huts, or in scattered collections of huts."—Report of Census Com. in India.

A Muck, To run, v. There is we believe no room for doubt that, to us at least, this expression came from the Malay countries, where both the phrase and the practice are still familiar. Some valuable remarks on the phenomenon, as prevalent among the Malays, were contributed by Dr. Oxley of Singapore to the Journal of the Indian Archipelago, vol. iii. p. 532; see a quotation below. The word is by Crawford ascribed to the Javanese, and this is his explanation :

"Amuk (J.). An a-muck; to run a-muck; to tilt; to run furiously and desperately at any one; to make a furious onset or charge in combat" (Malay Dict.).

Marsden says that the word rarely occurs in any other than the verbal form mengāmuk, 'to make a furious attack' (Mem. of a Malayan Family, 96).

There is reason, however, to ascribe an Indian origin to the term; whilst the practice, apart from the term, is of no rare occurrence in Indian history.

Thus Tod records some notable instances in the history of the Rājputs. In one of these (1634) the eldest son of the Raja of Mārwar ran a-muck at the court of Shāh Jahān, failing in his blow at the Emperor, but killing five courtiers of eminence before he fell himself. Again, in the last century, Bījai Singh, also of Mārwar, bore strong resentment against the Tālpūra prince of Hyderabad, Bījar Khān, who had sent to demand from the Rājput tribute and a bride. A Bhatti and a Chondāwat offered their services for vengeance, and set out for Sind as envoys. Whilst Bījar Khān read their credentials, muttering, 'No mention of the bride!' the Chondāwat buried a dagger in his heart, exclaiming, 'This for the bride!' 'And this for the tribute,' cried the Bhatti, repeating the blow. The pair then plied their daggers right and left, and 26 persons were slain before the envoys were hacked to pieces. (Tod, ii. 45, & 315).

But it is in Malabar that we trace the apparent origin of the Malay term in the existence of certain desperadoes who are called by a variety of old travellers amouchi or amuco. The nearest approach to this that we have been able to discover is the Malayālam amar-kkan, 'a warrior' (from amar, 'fight, war'). One of the special applications of this word is remarkable, in connexion with a singular custom of Malabar. After the Zamorin (q.v.) had reigned 12 years, a great assembly was held at Tirunāvāyi, when that Prince took his seat surrounded by his dependants, fully armed. Any one might then attack him, and the assailant, if successful in killing the Zamorin, got the throne. This had often happened. In 1600 thirty such assailants were killed in the enterprise. Now these men were called amar-kkār (pl. of amar-kkan, see Gundert, s. v.). These men evidently ran a-muck in the true Malay sense; and quotations below will show other illustrations from Malabar which confirm the idea that both name and practice originated in Continental India. There is indeed a difficulty as to the derivation here indicated, in the fact that the amuco or amouchi of European writers on Malabar seems by no means close enough to amar-kkan, whilst it is so close to the Malay amuk; and on this further light may be hoped for.

De Gubernatis has indeed suggested that the word amouchi was derived from the Skt. amokshya, 'that cannot be loosed;' and this would be very consistent with several of the passages which we shall quote, in which the idea of being 'bound by a vow' underlies the conduct of the persons to whom the term was applicable both in Malabar and in the Archipelago. But amokshya is a word unknown to Malayālam, in such a sense at least.

We have seen a-muck derived from the Arab. ahmak, 'fatuous.' But this is etymology of the kind which scorns history.

The phrase has been thoroughly naturalised in England since the days of Dryden and Pope.

c. 1430. Nicolo Conti, speaking of the greater Islands of the Archipelago under the name of the Two Javas, does not use the term, but describes a form of the practice:—

"Homicide is here a jest, and goes without punishment. Debtors are made over to their creditors as slaves; and some of these, preferring death to slavery, will with drawn swords rush on, stabbing all whom they fall in with of less strength than themselves, until they meet death at the hand of some one more than a match for them. This man, the creditors then sue in court for the dead man's debt."—In India in the XVth C. 45.

1516. "There are some of them (Japanese) who if they fall ill of any severe illness vow to God that if they remain in health they will of their own accord seek another more honourable death for his service, and as soon as they get well they take a dagger in their hands, and go out into the streets and kill as many persons as they meet, both men, women, and children, in such wise that they go like mad dogs, killing until they are killed. These are called Amuco. And as soon as they see them begin this work, they cry out, saying Amuco, Amuco, in order that people may take care of themselves, and they kill them with dagger and spear thrusts."—Barbosa, Hak. Soc. 194.

This passage seems to show that the word amuk must have been commonly used in the Malay countries before the arrival of the Portuguese there, c. 1511.

1539. "... The Tyrant (o Rey Ache) sallied forth in person, accompanied with 5000 resolute men (cinco mil Amoucos) and charged the Bataes very furiously."—Pinto (orig. cap. xvii.) in Cogan, p. 20.

1552. De Barros, speaking of the capture of the Island of Beth (Beyt, off the N.W. point of Kāthiāwar) by Nuno da Cunha, in 1531, says:—"But the natives of Guzarat stood in such fear of Sultan Badur that they would not consent to the terms. And so, like people determined on death, all that night they shaved their heads (this is a superstitious practice of those who despise life, people whom they call in India Amaucos) and betook themselves to their mosque, and there devoted their persons to death . . . and as an earnest of this vow, and an example of this resolution, the Captain ordered a great fire to be made, and cast into it his wife, and a little son that he had, and all his household and his goods, in fear lest anything of his should fall into our possession." Others did the like, and then they fell upon the Portuguese.—Dec. IV. iv. 13.

1566. "The King of Cochín . . . hath a great number of gentlemen which he calleth Amocchi, and some are called Nairi: these two sorts of men esteem not their lives anything, so that it may be for the honour of their King."—M. Caesar Frederike in Purchas, ii. 1708.

1584. "Their forces (at Cochín) consist in a kind of soldiers whom they call amocchi, who are under obligation to die at the King's pleasure, and all soldiers who in a war lose their King or their general lie under this obligation. And of such the King makes use in urgent cases, sending them to die fighting."—Letter of F. Sassetti to Francesco I., Gd. D. of Tuscany, in De Gubernatis, 154.

c. 1584. "There are some also which are called Amocchi . . . who being weary of living, set themselves in the way with a weapon in their hands, which they call a Crise, and kill as many as they meete with, till somebody killeth them; and this they doe for the least anger they conceive, as desperate men."—G. Balbi in Purchas, ii. 1724.

1602. De Couto, speaking of the Javanese: "They are chivalrous men, and of such determination that for whatever offence may be offered them they make themselves amoucos in order to get satisfaction thereof. And were a spear run into the stomach of such an one he would still press forward without fear till he got at his foe."—Dec. IV. iii. 1.

"In another passage (ib. vii. 14) De Couto speaks of the amoucos of Malabar just as Della Valle does below. In Dec. VI. viii. 8, he describes how, on the death of the King of Pimenta, in action with the Portuguese, "nearly 4000 Nairs made themselves amoucos with the usual ceremonies, shaving their heads on one side, and swearing by their pagods to avenge the King's death."

1604. "Auia hecho vna junta de Amocos, con sus ceremonias para venir a morir adonde el Pñical auia sedo muerto."—Guerrero, Relacion, 91.

1611. "Viceroy. What is the meaning of amoucos? Soldier. It means men who have made up their mind to die in killing as many as they can, as is done in the parts about Malaca by those whom they call amoucos in the language of the country."

—Couto, Dialogo do Soldado Pratico, 2nd part, p. 9.—(Printed at Lisbon in 1790).

1615. "Hos inter Nairios genus est et ordo quem Amocas vocant quibus ob studium rei bellicae praecipua laus tribuitur, et omnium habentur validissimi."—Jarric, Thesaurus, i. 65.

1648. "Derrière ces palissades s'estoit caché un coquin de Panamois qui estoit revenu de la Mecque et jouoit à Moqua. . . il court par les rues et tue tous ceux qu'il rencontre. . ."—Tavernier, V. des Indes, liv. iii. ch. 24.

1659. "I saw in this month of February at Batavia, the breasts torn with red-hot tongs off a black Indian by the executioner; and after this he was broken on the wheel from below upwards. This was because through the evil habit of eating opium (according to the godless custom of the Indians), he had become mad and raised the cry of Amocle (misp. for Amock) . . . in which mad state he had slain five persons . . . This was the third Amock-crier whom I saw during that visit to Batavia (a few months) broken on the wheel for murder."

* * * "Such a murderer and Amock-runner has sometimes the fame of being an invincible hero because he has so manfully repulsed all those who tried to seize him. . . . So the Netherlands Government is compelled when such an Amock-runner is taken alive to punish him in a terrific manner."—Walter Schulzens Ost-Indische Reise-Beschreibung (German ed.), Amsterdam, 1676, pp. 19-20, and 227.

1672. "Every community (of the Malabar Christians), every church has its own Amouchi, which . . . are people who take an oath to protect with their own lives the persons and places put under their safeguard, from all and every harm."—P. Vincenzo Maria, 145.

"If the Prince is slain the amouchi, who are numerous, would avenge him desperately. These are soldiers who swear to defend the King's life with their own. If he be injured they put on festive raiment, take leave of their parents, and with fire and sword in hand invade the hostile territory, burning every dwelling, and slaying man, woman, and child, sparing none, until they themselves fall."—ib. 237-8.

1673. "And they (the Mahommedans) are hardly restrained from running a muck (which is to kill whoever they meet, till they be slain themselves), especially if they have been at Hodge, a Pilgrimage to Mecca."—Fryer, 91.

1687. Dryden assailing Burnet:—

Prompt to assault, and careless of defence,
Invulnerable in his impudence,
He dares the World; and eager of a name,
He thrusts about and justles into fame.
Frontless and satire-proof, he scours the streets
And runs an Indian Muck at all he meets."

The Hind and the Panther, line 2477.

1689. "Those that run these are called Amouki, and the doing of it Running a Muck."—Ovington, 237.

1712. "Amouco (Termo da India) val o mesmo que homem determinado e apostado que despreza a vida e não teme a morte."—Bluteau, s. v.

1727. "I answered him that I could no longer bear their Insults, and, if I had not Permission in three Days, I would run a Muck (which is a mad Custom among the Malayans when they become desperate)."—A. Hamilton, ii. 231.

1793. At Bencoolen in this year (1760) — "the Count (d'Estaing) afraid of an insurrection among the Buggesses . . . invited several to the Fort, and when these had entered the Wicket was shut upon them; in attempting to disarm them, they mangamod, that is ran a muck; they drew their cresses, killed one or two Frenchmen, wounded others, and at last suffered themselves, for supporting this point of honour."—Forrest's Voyage to Mergui, 77.

1784. "It is not to be controverted that these desperate acts of indiscriminate murder, called by us mucks, and by the natives mangamo, do actually take place, and frequently too, in some parts of the east (in Java in particular)."—Marsden, H. of Sumatra, 239.

1788. "We are determined to run a muck rather than suffer ourselves to be forced away by these Hollanders."—Mem. of a Malayan family, 66.

1798. "At Batavia, if an officer take one of these amoks, or mohawks, as they have been called by an easy corruption, his reward is very considerable; but if he kill them, nothing is added to his usual pay. . . ."—Translator of Stavorinus, i. 294.

1803. "We cannot help thinking, that one day or another, when they are more full of opium than usual, they (the Malays) will run a muck from Cape Comorin to the Caspian."—Sydney Smith, Works, 3rd ed. iii. 6.

1846. "On the 8th July, 1846, Sunan, a respectable Malay house-builder in Penang, ran amok . . . killed an old Hindu woman, a Kling, a Chinese boy, and a Kling girl about 3 years old . . . and wounded two Hindus, three Klings, and two Chinese, of whom only two survived. . . . On the trial Sunan declared he did not know what he was about, and persisted in this at the place of execution. . . . The amok took place on the 8th, the trial on the 13th, and the execution on the 15th July,—all within 8 days."—J. Ind. Arch. vol. iii. 460-61.

1849. "A man sitting quietly among his friends and relatives, will without provocation suddenly start up, weapon in hand, and slay all within his reach. . . . Next day when interrogated . . . the answer has invariably been, 'The Devil entered into me, my eyes were darkened, I did not know what I was about.' I have received the same reply on at least 20 different occasions; on examination of these monomaniacs, I have generally found them labouring under some gastric disease, or troublesome ulcer . . . . The Bugis, whether from revenge or disease, are by far the most addicted to run amok. I should think three-fourths of all the cases I have seen have been by persons of this nation."—Dr. T. Oatley, in J. Ind. Archip. iii. 532.

1873. "They (the English) . . . crave governors who, not having bound themselves beforehand to 'run amuck,' may give the land some chance of repose."—Blackwood's Magazine, June, 1873, 759.

1875. "On being struck the Malay at once stabbed Arshad with a kris; the blood of the people who had witnessed the deed was aroused, they ran amok, attacked Mr. Birch, who was bathing in a floating bath close to the shore, stabbed and killed him."—Sir W. D. Jervois to the E. of Carnarvon, Nov. 16, 1875.

1876. "Twice over, while we were wending our way up the steep hill in Galata, it was our luck to see a Turk 'run a-muck' . . . nine times out of ten this frenzy is feigned, but not always, as for instance in the case where a priest took to running a-muck on an Austrian Lloyd's boat on the Black Sea, and after killing one or two passengers, and wounding others, was only stopped by repeated shots from the captain's pistol."—Barkley, Five Years in Bulgaria, 240-241.

1877. The Times of February 11th mentions a fatal muck run by a Spanish sailor, Manuel Alves, at the Sailors' Home, Liverpool; and the Overland Times of India (31st August) another run by a sepoy at Meerut.

1879. "Running a-muck does not seem to be confined to the Malays. At Ravenna, on Monday, when the streets were full of people celebrating the festa of St. John the Baptist, a maniac rushed out, snatched up a knife from a butcher's stall, and fell upon everyone he came across . . . before he was captured he wounded more or less seriously 11 persons, among whom was one little child."—Full Mail Gazette, July 1.

Anaconda, s. This word for a great python, or boa, is of very obscure origin. It is now applied in scientific zoology as the specific name of a great S. American water-snake. Cuvier has: "L'Anacondo (Boa scytale et murina, L.—Boa aquatica, Prince Max.)." (Règne Animal, 1829, ii. 78). Again, in the Official Report prepared by the Brazilian Government for the Philadelphia Exhibition of 1876, we find: "Of the genus Boa . . . we may mention the . . . scuriui or scuriuba (B. anaconda), whose skins are used for boots and shoes and other purposes." And as the subject was engaging our attention we read the following in the St. James's Gazette of April 3, 1882:—

"A very unpleasant account is given by a Brazilian paper, the Voz do Povo of Diamantino, of the proceedings of a huge water-snake called the sucuruyú, which is to be found in some of the rivers of Brazil . . . A slave, with some companions, was fishing with a net in the river, when he was suddenly seized by a sucuruyú, who made an effort with his hinder coils to carry off at the same time another of the fishing party." We had naturally supposed the name to be S. American, and its S. American character was rather corroborated by our finding in Ramusio's version of Pietro Martire d'Angheria such S. American names as Anacauchoa and Anacaona. Serious doubt was however thrown on the American origin of the word when we found that Mr. H. W. Bates entirely disbelieved it, and when we failed to trace the name in any older books about S. America.

In fact the oldest authority that we have met with, the famous John Ray, distinctly assigns the name, and the serpent to which the name properly belonged, to Ceylon. This occurs in his Synopsis Methodica Animalium Quadrupedum et Serpentinæ Generis, Lond. 1693. In this he gives a Catalogue of Indian Serpents, which he had received from his friend Dr. Tancred Robinson, and which the latter had noted e Museo Leydensi. No. 8 in this list runs as follows:

"8. Serpens Indicus Bubalinus, Anacandaia Zeylonensibus, id est Bubalorum aliorumque jumentorum membra conterens," p. 332.

He adds, that on this No. 8 should be read what D. Cleyerus has said in the Ephem. German. An. 12, obser. 7, entitled: De Serpente magno Indiae Orientalis Urobubalum deglutiente. The serpent in question was 25 feet long. Ray quotes in abridgment the description of its treatment of the buffalo; how, if the resistance is great, the victim is dragged to a tree, and compressed against it; how the noise of the crashing bones is heard as far as a cannon; how the crushed carcass is covered with saliva, etc. It is added, that the country-people (apparently this is in Amboyna) regard this great serpent as most desirable food.

Again, in 1768, we find in the Scots Magazine, App. p. 673, but quoted from "London pap. Aug. 1768," and signed by R. Edwin, a professed eye witness, a story with the following heading: "Description of the Anaconda, a monstrous species of serpent. In a letter from an English gentleman, many years resident in the Island of Ceylon in the East Indies . . . . The Ceylonese seemed to know the creature well; they call it Anaconda, and talked of eating its flesh when they caught it." He describes its seizing and disposing of an enormous "tyger." The serpent darts on the "tyger" from a tree, attacking first with a bite, then partially crushing and dragging it to the tree . . . "winding his body round both the tyger and the tree with all his violence, till the ribs and other bones began to give way . . . each giving a loud crack when it burst . . . the poor creature all this time was living, and at every loud crash of its bones gave a houl, not loud, yet piteous enough to pierce the cruelest heart."

Then the serpent drags away its victim, covers it with slaver, swallows it, etc. The whole thing is very cleverly told, but it is evidently a romance founded on the description by "D. Cleyerus," which is quoted by Ray. There are no tigers in Ceylon. In fact, "R. Edwin" has developed the Romance of the Anaconda out of the description of D. Cleyerus, exactly as "Mynheer Försch" some years later developed the Romance of the Upas out of the older stories of the poison tree of Macassar. Indeed, when we find "Dr. Andrew Cleyer" mentioned among the early relaters of these latter stories, the suspicion becomes strong that both romances had the same author, and that "R. Edwin" was also the true author of the wonderful history told under the name of Foersch. (See further under Upas).

In Percival's Ceylon (1803) we read: "Before I arrived in the island I had heard many stories of a monstrous snake, so vast in size as to devour tigers and buffaloes, and so daring as even to attack the elephant" (p. 303). Also, in Pridham's Ceylon and its Dependencies (1849, ii. 750—51): "Pimbera or Anaconda is of the genus Python, Cuvier, and is known in English as the rock-snake." Emerson Tennent (Ceylon, 4th ed. 1860, i. 196) says: "The great python (the 'boa' as it is commonly designated by Europeans, the 'anaconda', of Eastern story), which is supposed to crush the bones of an elephant, and to swallow a tiger" . . . . It may be suspected that the letter of "R. Edwin" was the foundation of all or most of the stories alluded to in these passages. Still we have the authority of Ray's friend that Anaconda, or rather Anacondania, was at Leyden applied as a Ceylonese name to a specimen of this python. The only interpretation of this that we can offer is Tamil ānai-kondra—"which killed an elephant"; an appellative, but not a name. We have no authority for the application of this appellative to a snake, though the passages quoted from Percival, Pridham, and Tennent, are all suggestive of such stories, and the interpretation of the name Anacondania given to Ray: "Bubalorum . . . . membra conterens," is at least quite analogous as an appellative.

It may be added that in Malay, anakanda signifies "one that is well-born," which does not much help us.

Ananas, s. The Pine-apple (Ananassa sativa, Lindl.; Bromelia Ananas, L.), a native of the hot regions of Mexico and Panama. It abounded, as a cultivated plant, in Hispaniola and all the islands according to Oviedo. The Brazilian Nana, or, perhaps Nanas, gave the Portuguese Ananas or Ananas. This name has, we believe, accompanied the fruit whithersoever, except to England, it has travelled from its home in America. A pine was brought home to Charles V., as related by J. D'Acosta below. The plant is stated to have been first, in Europe, cultivated at Leyden about 1650 (?). In England it first fruited at Richmond, in Sir M. Decker's garden, in 1712.\* But its diffusion in the East was early and rapid. To one who has seen the hundreds of acres covered with pine-apples on the islands adjoining Singapore, or their profusion in a seemingly wild state in the valleys of the Kasia country on the eastern borders of Bengal, it is hard to conceive of this fruit as introduced in modern times from another hemisphere. But, as in the case of tobacco, the name bewrayeth its true origin, whilst the large natural family of plants to which it belongs is exclusively American. The names given by Oviedo, probably those of Hispaniola, are Iaiama as a general name, and Boniana and Aiagua for two species. Pine-apples used to cost a pardao (a coin difficult to determine the value of in those days, but see under the word) when first introduced in Malabar, says Linschoten, but "now there are so many grown in the country, that they are very good cheape" (91). Athanasius Kircher, in the middle of the 17th century, speaks of the ananas as produced in great abundance in the Chinese provinces of Canton, Kiangsu, and Fuhkien. In Ibn Muhammad Wali's H. of the Conquest of Assam, written in 1662, the pine-apples of that region are commended for size and flavour. In the last years of the preceding century, Carletti (1599) already commends the excellent ananas of Malacca. But even some 20 or 30 years earlier the fruit was grown profusely in Western India, as we learn from Chr. d'Acosta (1578). And we know from the Ain that (about 1590) the ananas was habitually served at the table of Akbar, the price of one being reckoned at only 4 dams, or  $\frac{1}{10}$  of a rupee; whilst Akbar's son Jahāngir states that the fruit came from the sea-ports in the possession of the Portuguese.—(See Ain, i. 66-68).

* The English Cyclop. states on the authority of the Sloane MSS. that the pine was brought into England by the Earl of Portland, in 1690.

In Africa too this royal fruit has spread, carrying the American name along with it. "The Mānānzī* or pine-apple," says Burton, "grows luxuriantly as far as 3 marches from the coast (of Zanzibar). It is never cultivated, nor have its qualities as a fibrous plant been discovered." (J. R. G. S. xxix. 35). On the Ile Ste. Marie, off Madagascar, it grew in the first half of the 17th century as manasse (Flacourt, 29).

Abul Fazl, in the Ain, mentions that the fruit was also called kathal-i-safarī, or 'travel jack-fruit,' "because young plants put into a vessel may be taken on travels and will yield fruits." This seems a nonsensical pretext for the name, especially as another American fruit, the Guava, is sometimes known in Bengal as the Safarī-ām, or 'travel-mango.' It has been suggested by one of the present writers that these cases may present an uncommon use of the word safarī in the sense of 'foreign' or 'outlandish,' just as Clusius says of the pine-apple in India, "peregrinus est hic fructus," and as we begin this article by speaking of the ananas as having 'travelled' from its home in S. America. In the Tesoro of Cobarruvias (1611) we find: "Çafari, cosa de Africa o Argel, como grenada" ('a thing from Africa or Algiers, such as a pomegranate'). And on turning to Dozy and Eng. we find that in Saracenic Spain a renowned kind of pomegranate was called rommān safarī: though this was said to have its name from a certain Safar ibn-Obaïd al Kūlā'i, who grew it first. One doubts here, and suspects some connexion with the Indian terms, though the link is obscure. The lamented Prof. Blochmann, however, in a note on this suggestion, would not admit the possibility of the use of safarī for 'foreign.' He called attention to the possible analogy of the Arabic safarjāl for 'quince.' In Macassar, according to Crawford, the ananas is called Pandang, from its strong external resemblance, as regards fruit and leaves, to the Pandanus. Conversely we have called the latter screw-pine, from its resemblance to the ananas, or perhaps to the pine-cone, the original owner of the name.

Acosta again (1578) describes the Pandanus odoratissima as the 'wild ananas,' and in Malayalam the pine-apple is called by a name meaning 'pandanus-jackfruit.'

The term ananas has been arabized, among the Indian pharmacists at least, as ain-un-nās; in Burmese it has become nan-na-ši; and in Singhalese annāsi (see Moodeen Sheriff).

We should recall attention to the fact that pine-apple was good English long before the discovery of America, its proper meaning being what we have now been driven (for the avoiding of confusion) to call pine-cone. This is the only meaning of the term 'pine-apple' in Minshew's Guide into Tongues (2d ed. 1627). And the ananas got this name from its strong resemblance to a pine-cone. This is most striking as regards the large cones of the Stone-Pine of Southern Europe. In the following three first quotations 'pine-apple' is used in the old sense:

1565. "To all such as die so, the people erecteth a chappell, and to each of them a pillar and pole made of Pine-apple for a perpetuall monument."—Reports of Japan, in Hakl. ii. 567.

"The greater part of the quadrangle set with savage trees, as Okes, Chesnuts, Cypresses, Pine-apples, Cedars."—Reports of China, tr. by R. Willes, in Hakl. ii. 559.

1577. "In these islandes they found no trees known vnto them, but Pine-apple trees, and Date trees, and those of marceylous heyght, and exceedyng hardé."—Peter Martyr in Eden's H. of Trauayle, fol. 11.

Oviedo, in H. of the (Western) Indies, fills 2½ folio pages with an enthusiastic description of the pine-apple as first found in Hispaniola, and of the reason why it got this name (pina in Spanish, pigna in Ramusio's Italian, from which we quote). We extract a few fragments.

1535. "There are in this iland of Spagnuola certain thistles, each of which bears a Pigna, and this is one of the most beautiful fruits that I have seen. . . . It has all these qualities in combination, viz. beauty of aspect, fragrance of odour, and exquisite flavour. The Christians gave it the name it bears (Pigna) because it is, in a manner, like that. But the Pine-apples of the Indies of which we are speaking are much more beautiful than the pigne [i.e. pine-cones] of Europe, and have nothing of that hardness which is seen in those of Castille, which are in fact nothing but wood," &c.—Ramusio, iii. f. 135 v.

1564. "Their pines be of the bigness of two fists, the outside whereof is of the making of a pine-apple [i.e. pine-cone], but it is soft like the rinde of a cucumber, and the inside eateth like an apple, but it is more delicious than any sweet apple sugared."—Master John Hawkins, in Hakl. iii. 602.

1590. "The Pines, or Pine-apples, are of the same fashion and forme outwardly to those of Castille, but within they wholly differ. . . One presented one of these Pine-apples to the Emperour Charles the fift, which must have cost much paine and care to bring it so farre, with the plant from the Indies, yet would he not trie the taste."—Jos. de Acosta, E. T. of 1604 (Hak. Soc.) 236-7.

1595. ". . with diuers sortes of excellent fruits and rootes, and great abundance of Pinas, the princesse of fruits that grow vnder the Sun."—Raleigh, Disc. of Guiana, Hak. Soc. 73.

c. 1610. "Ananats, et plusieurs autres fruits."—Pyrard de la Val, i. 236.

1616. "The ananas or pine, which seems to the taste to be a pleasing compound, made of strawberries, claret-wine, rose-water, and sugar, well tempered together."—Terry, in Purchas, i. 1469.

1623. "The ananas is esteemed, and with reason, for it is of excellent flavour, though very peculiar, and rather acid than otherwise, but having an indescribable dash of sweetness that renders it agreeable. And as even these books (Clusius, &c.) don't mention it, if I remember rightly, I will say in brief that when you regard the entire fruit externally, it looks just like one of our pine-cones (pigna), with just such scales, and of that very colour."—P. della Valle, ii. 582.

1631. Bontius thus writes of the fruit :—
"Qui legitis Cynaras, atque Indica dulcisa fraga, Ne nimis haec comedas, fugito hinc, latet anguis in herbâ."
Lib. vi. cap. 50, p. 145.

1661. "I first saw the famous Queen Pine brought from Barbados and presented to his Majesty; but the first that were ever seen in England were those sent to Cromwell House four years since."—Evelyn's Diary, July 19.

1667. "Le peux à très-juste titre appeller l'Ananas le Roy des fruits, parcequ'il est le plus beau, et le meilleur de tous ceux qui sont sur la terre. C'est sans doute pour cette raison que le Roy des Roys luy a mis une couronne sur la teste, qui est comme une marque essentielle de sa Royaute, puis qu'à la cheute du pere, il produit un ieune Roy qui luy succede en toutes ses admirables qualitez."—P. Du Tertre, Hist. Gén. des Antilles Habitées par les François, ii. 127.

1668. "Standing by his Majesty at dinner in the Presence, there was of that rare fruit call'd the King-pine, grown in the Barbadoes and the West indies, the first of them I have ever seene. His Majesty having cut it up was pleas'd to give me a piece off his owne plate to taste of, but in my opinion it falls short of those ravishing varieties of deliciousness describ'd in Capt. Ligon's history and others."—Evelyn, July 19.

1673. "The Fruit the English call Pine-Apple (the Moors Ananas) because of the Resemblance."—Fryer, 182.

1716. "I had more reason to wonder that night at the King's table" (at Hanover) "to see a present from a gentleman of this country . . . what I thought, worth all the rest, two ripe Ananasses, which to my taste are a fruit perfectly delicious. You know they are naturally the growth of the Brazil, and I could not imagine how they came here but by enchantment."—Lady M. W. Montagu, Letter XIX.

"Oft in humble station dwells
Unboastful worth, above fastidious pomp;
Witness, thou best Anana, thou the pride
Of vegetable life, beyond whate'er
The poets imaged in the golden age."

Thomson, Summer.

The poet here gives the word an unusual form and accent.

c. 1730. "They (the Portuguese) cultivate the skirts of the hills, and grow the best products, such as sugar-cane, pine-apples, and rice."—Khāfi Khān in Elliot, vii. 345.

A curious question has been raised regarding the ananas, similar to that discussed under Custard-apple, as in the existence of the pine-apple to the Old World, before the days of Columbus.

In Prof. Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies (i. 578), it is stated in reference to ancient Assyria : "Fruits . . . were highly prized; amongst those of most repute were pomegranates, grapes, citrons, and apparently pine-apples." A foot-note adds : "The representation is so exact that I can hardly doubt the pine-apple being intended. Mr. Layard expresses himself on the point with some hesitation (Nineveh and Babylon, p. 338)."

The cut given is something like the conventional figure of a pine-apple, though it seems to us by no means very exact as such. Again, in Winter Jones's tr. of Conti (c. 1430) in India in the 15th Century, the traveller, speaking of a place called Panconia (read Fauconia, apparently Pegu), is made to say: "they have pine-apples, oranges, chestnuts, melons, but small and green, white sandal-wood and camphor."

We cannot believe that in either place the object intended was the Ananas, which has carried that American name with it round the world. Whatever the Assyrian representation was intended for, Conti seems to have stated, in the words pinus habent (as it runs in Poggio's Latin) merely that they had pine-trees. We do not understand on what ground the translator introduced pine-apples. If indeed any fruit was meant, it might have been that of the screw-pine, which though not eaten might perhaps have been seen in the bazars of Pegu, as it is used for some economical purposes. But pinus does not mean a fruit at all. 'Pine-cones' even would have been expressed by pinæ or the like.

Anchediva, Anjediva, n.p. A small island off the west coast of India, a little south of Carwar, which is the subject of frequent and interesting mention in the early narratives. The name is interpreted by Malayālim as añju-divu, 'Five Islands,' and if this is correct belongs properly to the whole group. This may, however, be only an endeavour to interpret an old name, which is perhaps traceable in Ἀνχιδίον Nῆσος of Ptolemy. It is a remarkable example of the slovenliness of English professional map-making that Keith Johnston's Royal Atlas map of India contains no indication of this famous island. It has, between land surveys and sea-charts, been omitted altogether by the compiler. But it is plain enough in the Admiralty charts; and the way Mr. Birch speaks of it in his translation of Alboquerque as "an Indian seaport, no longer marked on the maps," is odd (ii. 168).

c. 1345. Ibn Batuta gives no name, but Anjediva is certainly the island of which he thus speaks: "We left behind us the island (of Sindābur or Goa), passing close to it, and cast anchor by a small island near the mainland, where there was a temple, with a grove and a reservoir of water. When we had landed on this little island we found there a Jogi leaning against the wall of a Bukhānah or house of idols."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 63.

The like may be said of the Roteiro of V. da Gama's voyage, which likewise gives no name, but describes in wonderful correspondence with Ibn Batuta; as does Correa, even to the Jogi, still there after 150 years!

1498. "So the Captain-Major ordered Nicolas Coello to go in an armed boat, and see where the water was; and he found in the said island a building, a church of great ashlar-work, which had been destroyed by the Moors, as the country people said, only the chapel had been covered with straw, and they used to make their prayers to three black stones in the midst of the body of the chapel. Moreover they found, just beyond the church, a tanque of wrought ashlar in which we took as much water as we wanted; and at the top of the whole island stood a great tanque of the depth of 4 fathoms, and moreover we found in front of the church a beach where we careened the ship."—Roteiro, 95.

1510. "I quitted this place, and went to another island which is called Anzediva. . . There is an excellent port between the island and the mainland, and very good water is found in the said island."—Vart Thema, 120.

c. 1552. "Dom Francisco de Almeida arriving at the Island of Anchediva, the first thing he did was to send João Homem with letters to the Factors of Cananor, Cochim, and Coulaõ. . . ."—Barros, I. viii. 9.

c. 1561. "They went and put in at Ange-diva, where they enjoyed themselves much; there were good water springs, and there was in the upper part of the island a tank built with stone, with very good water, and much wood; . . . there were no inhabitants, only a beggar man whom they called Joguedes. . . ."—Correa, Hak. Soc. 239.

1727. "In January, 1664, my Lord (Marlborough) went back to England . . . and left Sir Abraham with the rest, to pass the westerly Monsoons, in some Port on the Coast, but being unacquainted, chose a desolate Island called Anjadwa, to winter at. . . . Here they stayed from April to October, in which time they buried above 200 of their Men."—A. Hamilton, i. 182. At p. 274 the name is printed more correctly Anjediva.

Andaman, n.p. The name of a group of Islands in the Bay of Bengal, inhabited by tribes of a negrito race, and now partially occupied as a convict settlement under the Government of India. The name (though perhaps obscurely indicated by Ptolemy—see H. Y. in Procgs. R. G. Soc. 1882, p. 665), first appears distinctly in the Arab narratives of the 9th century. The persistent charge of cannibalism seems to have been unfounded.

A.D. 851. "Beyond are two islands divided by a sea called Andamān. The natives of these isles devour men alive; their hue is black, their hair woolly; their countenance and eyes have something frightful in them . . . they go naked, and have no boats . . ."—Relation des Voyages, &c. par Reinaud, i. 8.

c. 1050. These islands are mentioned in the great Tanjore temple-inscription (11th cent.) as Tamaittira, 'Islands of Impurity,' inhabited by cannibals.

c. 1292. "Angamansin is a very large Island. The people are without a King and are idolators, and no better than wild beasts . . . they are a most cruel generation, and eat everybody that they can catch if not of their own race."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. c. 13.

c. 1430. . . . "leaving on his right hand an island called Andemania, which means the island of Gold, the circumference of which is 800 miles. The inhabitants are cannibals. No travellers touch here unless driven to do so by bad weather, for when taken they are torn to pieces and devoured by these cruel savages."—Conti, in India in XV. Cent. 8.

c. 1566. "Da Nicubar sind a Pegu é vna catena d'Isole infinite, delle quali molte sono habitate da gente seluaggia, e chiamansi Isole d'Andeman . . . e se per disgratia si perde in queste Isole qualche naue, come già se n'ha perso, non ne scampa alcuno, che tutti gli amazzano, e mangiano."—Cesare de' Federici, in Ram. iii. 391.

1727. "The Islands opposite the Coast of Tunacerin are the Andemans. They lie about 80 leagues off, and are surrounded with many dangerous Banks and Rocks; they are all inhabited with Cannibals, who are so fearless that they will swim off to a Boat if she approach near the Shore, and attack her with their wooden Weapons. . . ."—A. Hamilton, ii. 65.

1552. "The Moors all were on foot, and their Captain was a valiant Turk, who as being their Captain, for the honour of the thing was carried in an Andor on the shoulders of 4 men, from which he gave his orders as if he were on horseback."—Barros, II. vi. viii.

c. 1760. "Of the same nature as palankeens, but of a different name, are what they call andolas . . . these are much cheaper, and less esteemed."—Grose i. 155.

Andrum, s. Malayāl. āndram. The form of hydrocele common in S. India. It was first described by Kaempfer, in his Decas, Leyden, 1694. —(See also his Amoenitates Exoticae, Fascic. III. pp. 557 seqq.)

Angely-wood, s. Tamil anjilū-

maram; Artocarpus hirsuta, Lam. A wood of great value on the Western Coast, for shipbuilding, house-building, &c.

1644. "Another thing which this province of Mallavar produces, in abundance and of excellent quality, is timber, particularly that called Angelim, which is most durable, lasting many years, insomuch that even if you desire to build a great number of ships, or vessels of any kind . . . you may make them all in a year." . . . —Bocarro, MS. f. 315.

Angengo, n.p. A place on the Travancore coast, the site of an old English Factory; properly said to be Anju-tengu, the trivial meaning of which would be "five coco-nuts."

This name gives rise to the marvellous rhapsody of the once famous Abbé Raynal, regarding "Sterne's Eliza," of which we quote below a few sentences from the 3½ pages of close print which it fills.

1711. "Anjengo is a small Fort belonging to the English East India Company. . . There are about 40 Soldiers to defend it . . . most of whom are Topazes, or mungrel Portuguese."—Lockyer, 199.

1782. "Territoire d'Anjinga; tu n'es rien; mais tu as donné naissance à Eliza. Un jour, ces entrepôts . . . ne subsisteront plus . . . mais si mes écrits ont quelque durée, le nom d'Anjinga restera dans le mémoire des hommes. . . Anjinga, c'est à l'influence de ton heureux climat qu'elle devoit, sans doute, cet accord presque incompatible de volupté et de décence qui accompagnoit toute sa personne, et qui se mêloit à tous ses mouvements, &c., &c."—Hist. Philosophique des Deux Indes, ii. 72-73.

Anicut, s. Used in the irrigation of the Madras Presidency for the dam constructed across a river to fill and regulate the supply of the channels drawn off from it; the cardinal work in fact of the great irrigation systems. The word, which has of late years become familiar all over India, is the Tamil comp. anai-kaiṭṭu, 'Dam-building.'

1776. "Sir—We have received your letter of the 24th. If the Rajah pleases to go to the Anacut, to see the repair of the bank, we can have no objection, but it will not be convenient that you should leave the garrison at present."—Letter from Council at Madras to Lt.-Col. Harper, Comm. at Tanjore, in E. I. Papers, 1777, 4to, i. 836.

1784. "As the cultivation of the Tanjore country appears, by all the surveys and reports of our engineers employed in that service, to depend altogether on a supply of water by the Cauvery, which can only be secured by keeping the Anicut and banks in repair, we think it necessary to repeat to you our orders of the 4th July, 1777, on the subject of these repairs."—Desp. of Court of Directors, Oct. 27th, as amended by Bd. of Control, in Burke, iv. 104.

1793. "The Annicut is no doubt a judicious building, whether the work of Solar Rajah or anybody else."—Correspondence between A. Ross, Esq., and G. A. Ram, Esq. at Tanjore, on the subject of furnishing water to the N. Circars. In Dalrymple, O. K., ii. 459.

1862. "The Upper Coleroon Anicut or weir is constructed at the west end of the Island of Seringham."—Markham, Peru & India, 426.

Anile, Neel, s. An old name for indigo, borrowed from the Portuguese anil. They got it from the Arab. al-nīl, pron. an-nīl; nīl again being the common name of Indigo in India, from the Sansk. nīla, 'blue.' The vernacular (in this instance Bengali) word appears in the title of a native satirical drama Nīl-Darpan, 'The Mirror of Indigo (planting)', famous in Calcutta in 1861, in connexion with a cause célèbre, and with a sentence which discredited the now extinct Supreme Court of Calcutta in a manner unknown since the days of Impey.

"Neel-walla" is a phrase for an Indigo-planter.

1501. Amerigo Vespucci, in his letter from the Id. of Cape Verde to Lorenzo di Piero Francesco de' Medici, reporting his meeting with the Portuguese Fleet from India, mentions among the things brought "anib and tuzia;" the former a manifest transcriber's error for anil.—In Baldelli Boni, 'Il Milione,' p. lviii.

1516. In Barbosa's price list of Malabar we have:

"Anil nadador (*), very good,
per farazola . . . fanams 30.
Anil loaded, with much sand, per farazola . . . fanams 18 to 20."
In Lisbon Collection, ii. 393.

1525. "A load of anyll in cakes which weighs 3½ maunds, 353 tangas."—Lembrança, 52.

1563. "Anil is not a medicinal substance but an article of trade, so we have no need to speak thereof. . . . The best is pure and clear of earth, and the surest test is to burn it in a candle . . . others put it in water, and if it floats then they reckon it good."—Garcia, i. 25 v.

1583. "Neel, the churle 70 duckats, and a churle is 27 rottles and a halfe of Aleppo."—Mr. John Newton, in Hakl. ii. 378.

1586. "They vse to pricke the skinne, and to put on it a kind of anile, or blacking which doth continue alwayes."—Fitch in Hakl. ii. 395.

c. 1610. ". . . l'Anil ou Indique, qui est vne teinture bleüe violette, dont il ne s'en trouue qu'à Cambaye et Suratte."—Pyrrard de la Val, ii. 158.

1622. "E conforme a dita pauta se despachará o dito anile e canella."—In Archivio Port. Orient., fasc. 2, 240.

1638. "Les autres marchandises, que l'on y débite le plus, sont . . . du sel ammoniac, et de l'indigo, que ceux de pais appellent Anil."—Mandelstlo, Paris, 1659, 138.

1648. ". . . and a good quantity of Anil, which, after the place where most of it is got, is called Chirchees* Indigo."—Van Twist, 14.

1653. "Indico est un mot Portugais, dont l'on appelle une teinture bleüe qui vient des Indes Orientales, qui est de contrabande en France, les Turqs et les Arabes la nomment Nil."—De la B. le-Gouz, 543.

Anna, s. Properly (Hind.) ānā, or ānah. The 16th part of a rupee. The term belongs to the Mahommedan monetary system (v. Rupee). There is no coin of one anna, so that it is a money of account only.

The term anna is used in denoting a corresponding fraction of any kind of property, and especially in regard to coparcenary rights in land, or shares in a speculation. Thus a one-anna share is  $\frac{1}{16}$  of such right, or a share of  $\frac{1}{16}$  in the speculation; a four-anna is  $\frac{1}{4}$  and so on. In some parts of India the term is also used as a subdivision ( $\frac{1}{16}$ ) of the current land measure. Thus, in Saugor, the ānā = 16 rāsīs, and is itself  $\frac{1}{16}$  of a hancha (Elliot, Glos. s. v.).

The term is also sometimes applied colloquially to persons of mixt parentage. "Such an one has at least 2 annas of dark blood' or 'of coffee-colour.' This may be compared with the Scotch expression that a person of deficient intellect 'wants two-pence in the shilling.'

1708. "Provided . . . that a debt due from Sir Edward Littleton . . . of 80,407 Rupees and Eight Annas Money of Bengal, with Interest and Damages to the said English Company shall still remain to them. . . ."—Earl of Godolphin's Award be-* Sharkej or Sirkej, 5 m. from Ahmedabad. "Cirqueze Indigo" (1624) occurs in Sainsbury, ii. 442. It is the "Sorcaze" of Forbes, Oriental Memoirs. The Dutch, about 1620, established a factory there on account of the Indigo. Many of the Sultans of Guzerat were buried there (Savotinus, iii. 109). Some account of the 'Sarkhaj Rozas,' or Mausolea, is given in H. Briggs's Cities of Gujarastra (Bombay, 1840, pp. 274, seqq.).

Ant, White, s. The insect (Termes bellicosus of naturalists) not properly an ant, of whose destructive powers there are in India so many disagreeable experiences, and so many marvelous stories. The phrase was perhaps taken up by the English from the Portuguese formigas brancas, which is in Bluteau's Dict. (1713, iv. 175). But indeed exactly the same expression is used in the 14th century by our medieval authority.

It is, we believe, a fact that these insects have been established at Rochelle in France, for a long period, and more recently at St. Helena. They exist also at the Convent of Mt. Sinai, and a species in Queensland.

It seems probable that Aelian speaks of White Ants in the 16th Book, De Nat. Animal., chap. 15 :—

(A.D. c. 250.) "But the Indian ants construct a kind of heaped up dwellings, and these not in depressed or flat positions easily liable to be flooded, but in lofty and elevated positions . . ."

c. 1328. "Est etiam unum genus parvisimarum formicarum, sicut lana albarum, quarum durities dentium tanta est quod etiam ligna rodunt et venas lapidum; et quotquot breviter inveniunt siccum super terram, et pannos laneos, et bombycinos laniant; et faciunt ad modum muri crustam unam de arenâ minutissimâ, ita quod sol non possit eas tangere; et sic remanent coopertae; verum est quod si contingat illam crustam frangi, et solem eas tangere, quam citius moriuntur."—Fr. Jordanus, p. 53.

1688. "Here are also abundance of Ants of several sorts, and Wood-lice, called by the English in the East Indies, White Ants."—Dampier, ii. 127.

1713. "On voit encore des fourmis de plusieurs espèces; la plus pernicieuse est celle que les Européens ont nommé fourmi blanche."—Lettres Edifiantes, xii. 98.

1727. "He then began to form Projects how to clear Accounts with his Master's Creditors, without putting anything in their Pockets. The first was on 500 chests of Japon Copper . . . and they were brought into Account of Profit and Loss, for so much eaten up by the White Ants."—A. Hamilton, ii. 169.

1789. "The White Ant is an insect greatly dreaded in every house; and this is not to be wondered at, as the devastation it occasions is almost incredible."—Munro, Narrative, 31.

1876. "The metal cases of his baggage are disagreeably suggestive of White Ants, and such omnivorous vermin."—Sat. Review, No. 1057, p. 6.

Apil, s. Transfer of Eng. 'Appeal'; in general native use, in connexion with our Courts.

1872. "There is no Sindi, however wild, that cannot now understand 'Rasid' (receipt) and 'Apil' (appeal)."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 283.

Apollo Bunder, n.p. A well-known wharf at Bombay. A street near it is called Apollo Street, and a gate of the Fort leading to it 'the Apollo Gate.' The name is said to be a corruption, and probably is so, but of what it is a corruption is not clear. The quotations given afford different suggestions, and Dr. Wilson's dictum is entitled to respect, though we do not know what pālavā here means. Sir G. Birdwood writes that it used to be said in Bombay, that Apollo-bandar was a corrn. of palwa-bandar, because the pier was the place where the boats used to land palwa fish. But we know of no fish so called; it is however possible that the palla or sable-fish (q.v.) is meant, which is so called in Bombay, as well as in Sind. On the other hand we may observe that there was at Calcutta in 1748 a frequented tavern called the Apollo (see Long, p. 11). And it is not impossible that a house of the same name might have given its title to the Bombay street and wharf. But Sir Michael Westropp's quotation below shows that Pallo was at least the native representation of the name 140 years ago.

We may add that a native told Mr. W. G. Pedder, of the Bombay C. S., from whom we have it, that the name was due to the site having been the palace where the "poli" cake, eaten at the Holi festival, was baked. And so we leave the matter.

1847. "A little after sunset, on 2nd Jan., 1843, I left my domicile in Ambrolie, and drove to the Pālāvā bandar, which receives from our accommodative countrymen the more classical name of Apollo pier."—Wilson, Lands of the Bible, p. 4.

1860. "And atte what place ye Knyghte came to Londe, theyre ye folke . . . . wor-schyppen II. Idolyis in cheefe. Ye fyfste is Apolla, wherefore ye cheefe londynge place of theyr Metropole is hyght Apolla-Sundir . . . ."—Ext. from a MS. of Sir John Mandeville, lately discovered.*

1877. "This bunder is of comparatively recent date. Its name 'Apollo' is an English corruption of the native word Pallou (fish), and it was probably not extended and brought into use for passenger traffic till about the year 1819 . . . ."—Maclean, Guide to Bombay, 167.

The last work adds a note: "Sir M. Westropp gives a different derivation . . . : Polo, a corruption of Pálwa, derived from Pál, which inter alia means a fighting vessel, by which kind of craft the locality was probably frequented. From Pálwa or Pál-war, the bunder now called Apollo is supposed to take its name. In the memorial of a grant of land, dated 5th Dec., 1743, the pákhde in question is called Pulto."—High Court Reports, iv. pt. 3.

Apricot, s. Prunus Armeniaca, L. This English word is of curious origin, as Dozy expounds it. The Romans called it Malum Armeniacum and also (Persicum?) præcox, or 'early.' Of this the Greeks made πραυκόκιον, &c. and the Arab conquerors of Byzantine provinces took this up as birḳōk and barḳōk, with the article al-barḳōk, whence Sp. albarcoque, Port. albricoque, alboquorque, Ital. albercocca, albicocca, Prov. aubricot, ambricot, Fr. abricot, Dutch, abricock, abrikoos, Eng. apricock, apricot. Dozy mentions that Dodonaeus, an old Dutch writer on plants, gives the vernacular name as Vroege Persen, 'Early Peaches,' which illustrates the origin. In the Cyprus bazars, apricots are sold as χρυσόμυλα; but the less poetical name of 'kill-johns' is given by sailors to the small hard kinds common to St. Helena, the Cape, China, &c. Zard ālū (Pers.) 'yellow-plum,' is the common name in India.

Arakan, Arracan, n.p. This is an European form, perhaps through Malay, of Rakhāing, the name which the natives give themselves. This is believed by Sir Arthur Phayre to be a corruption of the Skt. rākṣha, Pali rakkhaso, i.e. 'ogre' or the like, a word applied by the early Buddhist propagationists to unconverted tribes of alien race with whom they came in contact.

It is not impossible that the Ἀργυρῆ of Ptolemy, which unquestionably represents Arakan, may disguise the name by which the country is still known to foreigners; at least no trace of the name as 'Silver-land' in old Indian Geography has yet been found.

We may notice, without laying any stress upon it, that in Mr. Beal's account of early Chinese pilgrims to India, there twice occurs mention of an Indo-Chinese kingdom called O-li-ki-lo, which transliterates fairly into some name like Argyrē, and not into any other yet recognisable (see J. R. A. S. (N. S.) xiii. 560, 562).

1726. "It is called by some Portuguese Orakan, by others among them Arrakan, and by some again Bakan (after its capital), and also Mog."*—Valentijn, v. 140.

1727. "Arackan has the Conveniency of a noble spacious River."—A. Ham, ii. 30.

Arbol Triste, s. The tree or shrub, so called by Portuguese writers appears to be the Nyctanthes arbor tristis, or Arabian jasmine (N. O. Jasminaceæ), a native of the drier parts of India.

Arcot, n.p. Arkāt, a famous fortress and town in the Madras territory, 65 miles from Madras. The name is derived by Bp. Caldwell from Tamil ār-kād, 'the Six Forests,' confirmed by the Tamil-French Dict., which gives a form Arukādu = 'Six forests.' Notwithstanding the objection made by Maj.-Gen. Cunningham in his Geog. of Ancient India, it is probable that Arcot is the Ἀρκατοῦ βασιλείον Σόρα of Ptolemy, 'Arkatu, residence of K. Sora.'

c. 1346. "We landed with them on the beach, in the county of Ma'bar, . . . we arrived at the fortress of Harkātū, where we passed the night."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 187, 188.

1785. "It may be said that this letter was written by the Nabob of Arcot in a moody humour. . . . Certainly it was; but it is in such humours that the truth comes out."—Burke's Speech, Feb. 28th.

Areca, s. The seed (in common parlance the nut) of the palm Areca catechu, L., commonly, though somewhat improperly called 'betel-nut'; the term betel (q. v.) belonging in reality to the leaf which is chewed along with the areca. Though so widely cultivated the palm is unknown in a truly indigenous state. The word is Malayalam adakka, and comes to us through the Portuguese.

1510. "When they eat the said leaves (betel), they eat with them a certain fruit which is called caffolo, and the tree of the said caffolo is called Arecha."—Varthema, Hak. Soc., 144.

1516. "There arrived there many zam-bucos . . . with areca."—Barbosa, Hak. Soc., 64.

1521. "They are always chewing Arecca, a certain Fruit like a Pear, cut in quarters and rolled up in leaves of a Tree called Bette (or Vettele), like Bay leaves; which having chewed they spit forth. It makes the mouth red. They say they do it to comfort the heart, nor could live without it."—Pigafetta in Purchas, i. 38.

1548. "In the Renda do Betel, or Betel duties at Goa are included Betel, arequa, jacks, green ginger, oranges, lemons, figs, coir, mangos, citrons."—Botelho, Tombo, 48.

The Portuguese also formed a word ariqueira for the tree bearing the nuts.

1563. ". . . and in Malabar they call it pac; * and the Nairs (who are the gentlemen), call it areca."—Garcia D'O., f. 91 b.

c. 1566. "Great quantitie of Archa, which is a fruite of the bignesse of nutmegs, which fruite they eate in all these parts of the Indies, with the leafe of an Herbe, which they call Bettell."—C. Frederike, transl. in Hakl. ii. 350.

1586. "Their friends come and bring gifts, cocos, figges, arreaes, and other fruits."—Fitch in Hakl. ii. 395.

1689. ". . . The Neri (†) which is drawn from the Areques Tree in a fresh earthen vessel, is as sweet and pleasant as Milk."—Ovington, 239.

Argemone mexicana. This American weed (N. O. Papaveraceæ) is notable as having overrun India, in every part of which it seems to be familiar. It is known by a variety of names, Firingi dhatura; gamboge-thistle, &c.

Argus Pheasant, s. This name,

* See Mug.

* The Tamil is pac.

† H. and Mahr. ner, 'sap,' but neri is, we are told, Guzerati for toddy in some form.

which seems more properly to belong to the splendid bird of the Malay Peninsula (Argusamus giganteus, Tem., Pavo argus, Lin.) is confusingly applied by Europeans in Upper India to the Himalayan horned pheasant Cerionis (Spp. satyra, and melanocephala) from the round white eyes or spots which mark a great part of the bird's plumage.—See remark under Moonaul.

Arrack, or Rack, s. This word is the Ar. arak, properly 'perspiration,' and then, first the exudation or sap drawn from the date palm (arak-altamar); secondly any strong drink, 'distilled spirit,' 'essence,' etc. But it has spread to very remote corners of Asia. Thus it is used in the forms ariki and arki in Mongolia and Manchuria, for spirit distilled from grain.

In India it is applied to a variety of common spirits; in S. India to those distilled from the fermented sap of sundry palms; in E. and N. India to the spirit distilled from canemolasses, and also to that from rice. The Turkish form of the word, râkî, is applied to a spirit made from grape-skins; and in Syria and Egypt to a spirit flavoured with aniseed, made in the Lebanon. There is a popular or slang French word, riquiriqui, for brandy, which appears also to be taken from arakî (Marcel Devic).

Humboldt (Examen, &c., ii. 300) says that the word first appears in Pigafetta's Voyage of Magellan; but this is not correct.

c. 1420. "At every yam (post-house) they gave the travellers a sheep, a goose, a fowl . . . 'arak. . . ."—Shah Rukh's Embassy to China, in N. & E. xiv. 396.

1516. "And they bring cocoa-nuts, huraca (which is something to drink) . . . ."—Barbosa, Hak. Soc. 59.

1518. "—que todos os mantimentos asy de pão, comoinhos, orracas, arrozes, carnes, e pescados . . . ."—In Archiv. Port. Orient. fasc. 2, 57.

1521. "When these people saw the politeness of the captain, they presented some fish, and a vessel of palm-wine, which they call in their language uraca . . . ."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 72.

1544. "Manueli a cruce . . . comendo ut plurimum invigilet duobus illis Christianorum Carearum pagis, diligenter attendere . . . nemo potu Orracae se inebriet . . . si ex hoc deinceps tempore Punicali [q. v.] Orracha potetur, ipsos ad mihi suo gravi damno luituros."—Sci. Fr. Xav. Epist., p. 111.

1554. "And the excise on the orraquas made from palm-trees, of which there are three kinds, viz., cura, which is as it is drawn; orraqua, which is cura once boiled (cocida, qu. distilled?); sharab (zarao) which is boiled 2 or 3 times and is stronger than orraqua."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 50.

1563. "One kind (of coco-palm) they keep to bear fruit, the other for the sake of the cura, which is vino mosto; and this when it has been distilled they call orraca."—Garcia D'O. f. 67.

(The word surā, used here, is a very ancient importation from India, for Cosmas (6th century) in his account of the coco-nut, confounding (it would seem) the milk with the toddy of that palm, says: "The Argellion is at first full of a very sweet water, which the Indians drink from the nut, using it instead of wine. This drink is called rhonoc-sura, and is exceeding pleasant." It is indeed possible that the rhonoc here may already be the word arrack.)

1605. "A Chines borne, but now turned Iauan, who was our next neighbour . . . and brewed Aracke which is a kind of hot drinke, that is vsed in most of these parts of the world, instead of Wine. . . ."—E. Scot, in Purchas. i. 173.

1631. ". . . jecur . . . a potu istius maledicti Arac, non tantum in temperamento immutatum, sed etiam in substantiâ suâ corrumpitur."—Jac. Bontius, lib. ii., cap. vii. p. 22.

1687. "Two Jars of Arack (made of Rice as I judged) called by the Chinese Sam-shu."—Dampier, i. 419.

1719. "We exchanged some of our wares for opium and some arrack . . ."—Robinson Crusoe, Pt. II.

1727. "Mr. Boucher had been 14 Months soliciting to procure his Pharmand; but his repeated Petitions . . . had no Effect. But he had an Englishman, one Swan, for his Interpreter, who often took a large Dose of Arrack . . . Swan got pretty near the King (Aurengzeb) . . . and cried with a loud Voice in the Persian Language that his Master wanted Justice done him" (see Doai).—A. Hamilton, i. 97.

Rack is a further corruption; and rack-punch is perhaps not quite obsolete.

1603. "We taking the But-end of Pikes and Halberts and Faggot sticks, drave them into a Racke-house."—E. Scot, in Purchas, i. 184.

Purchas has also Vraca and other forms; and at i. 648 there is mention of a strong kind of spirit called Rack-apce (Malay api = 'fire'). See Fool Rack.

1616. "Some small quantitie of Wine, but not common, is made among them; they call it Rack, distilled from Sugar and a spicie Rinde of a Tree called Iagra."—Terry in Purchas, ii. 1470.

1622. "We'll send him a jar of rack by next conveyance."—Letter in Sainsbury, iii. 40.

1627. "Java hath been fatal to many of the English, but much through their own distemper with Rack."—Purchas, Pilgrim-age, 693.

1848. "Jos . . . finally insisted upon having a bowl of rack punch . . . That bowl of rack punch was the cause of all this history."—Vanity Fair, ch. vi.

Arsenal, s. An old and ingenious etymology of this word is ars navalis. But it is really Arabic. Hyde derived it from tars-khūnah, 'domus terroris,' contracted into tarsānah, the form (as he says) used at Constantinople (Syntagma Dissertt. i. 100). But it is really the Arabic dār-al-ṣinā'a 'domus artificii,' as the quotations from Mas'ūdī clearly show. The old Italian forms darsena, darsinale, corroborate this, and the Sp. atarazana, which is rendered in Arabic by Pedro de Alcalá, quoted by Dozy, as dar a cinna.—(See details in Dozy, Oosterlingen, 16–18.)

A.D. 943–4. "At this day in the year of the Hijra 332, Rhodes (Rodas) is an arsenal (dār-ṣinā'a) where the Greeks build their war-vessels."—Mas'ūdī, ii. 423.

And again "dār-ṣinā'at al-marākīb," 'an arsenal of ships,' iii. 67.

1573. "In this city (Fez) there is a very great building which they call Daraçana, where the Christian captives used to labour at blacksmith's work and other crafts under the superintendence and orders of renegade headmen . . . here they made cannon and powder, and wrought swords, cross-bows, and arquebusses."—Marmol, Desc. General de Africa, lib. iii. f. 92.

1672. "On met au Tershana deux belles galères à l'eau."—Antoine Galland, Journ., i. 80.

Artichoke, s. The genealogy of this word appears to be somewhat as follows: The Arab. is al-harshūf, (perhaps connected with harash, 'rough-skinned';) hence Sp. alcarchofa, and It. carcioffo and arcicoccu, Fr. artichaut, Eng. artichoke.

c. 1348. "The Incense (benzoin) tree is small . . . its branches are like those of a thistle or an artichoke (al-kharshaf)* . . ."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 240.

Arundel.—See Roundel.

Aryan, adj. Sansk. Ārya, 'noble.' A term frequently used to include all the races (Indo-Persic, Greek, Roman, Celtic, Slavonic, &c.), which speak languages belonging to the same family as Sanskrit. Much vogue was given to the term by Pictet's publication of Les Origines Indo-Européennes, ou les Aryas Primitifs (Paris, 1859), and this writer seems almost to claim the name in this sense as his own (see quotation below). But it was in use long before the date of his book. Our first quotation is from Ritter, and there it has hardly reached the full extent of application. Ritter seems to have derived the use in this passage from Lassen's Pentapotamia. The word has in great measure superseded the older term Indo-Germanic proposed by F. Schlegel at the beginning of the century. The latter is however still sometimes used, and M. Hovelacque, especially, prefers it. We may observe here that the connexion which evidently exists between the several languages classed together as Aryan cannot be regarded, as it was formerly, as warranting an assumption of identity of race in all the peoples who speak them.

It may be noted as curious that among the Javanese (a people so remote in blood from what we understand by Aryan), the word ārya is commonly used as an honorary prefix to the names of men of rank; a survival of the ancient Hindu influence on the civilisation of the island.

The earliest use of Aryan in an ethnic sense is in the Inscription on the tomb of Darius, in which the king calls himself an Aryan, and of Aryan descent, whilst Ormuzd is, in the Median version styled, 'God of the Aryans.'

B.C. c. 486. "Adam Dāryavush Khshdāyathiya vazarka . . . . . Pārsa, Pārsahiya putra, Ariya, Ariya chitra." i.e. "I (am) Darius, the Great King, the King of Kings, the King of all inhabited countries, the King of this great Earth far and near, the son of Hystaspes, an Achaemenian, a Persian, the son of a Persian, an Arian, of Arian descent."—In Rawlinson's Herodotus, 3d ed. iv. 250.

"These Medes were called anciently by all people Arians, but when Medā, the Colchian, came to them from Athens, they changed their name."—Herodot. vii. 62 (Rawlins.).

1835. "Those eastern and proper Indians, whose territory, however, Alexander never touched by a long way, call themselves in the most ancient period Arians (Arier) (Manu, ii. 22, x. 45), a name coinciding with that of the ancient Medes."—Ritter, v. 458.

1838. See also Ritter, viii. 17 seqq.; and Pott's art. in Ersch & Grueber's Encyc. ii. 18, 46.

* Sic, in the published text. The spelling with h instead of k is believed to be correct (see Dozy, s.v. Alcarchofa).

1850. "The Aryan tribes in conquering India, urged by the Brahmans, made war against the Turanian demon-worship, but not always with complete success."—Dr. John Wilson, in Life, 450.

1851. "We must request the patience of our readers whilst we give a short outline of the component members of the great Arian family. The first is the Sanskrit. . . . The second branch of the Arian family is the Persian. . . . There are other scions of the Arian stock which struck root in the soil of Asia, before the Arians reached the shores of Europe. . . ."—(Prof. Max Müller?) Edinburgh Review, Oct. 1851, pp. 312-313.

1853. "Sur les sept premières civilisations, qui sont celles de l'ancien monde, six appartiennent, en partie au moins, à la race ariane."—Gobineau, De l'Inégalité des Races Humaines, i. 364.

1855. "I believe all who have lived in India will bear testimony . . . that to natives of India, of whatever class or caste, Mussulman, Hindoo, or Parsee, "Aryan or Tamulian," unless they have had a special training, our European paintings, prints, drawings, and photographs, plain or coloured, if they are landscapes, are absolutely unintelligible."—Mission to Ava, 59 (publ. 1858).

1858. "The Aryan tribes,—for that is the name they gave themselves, both in their old and new homes,—brought with them institutions of a simplicity almost primitive."—Whitney, Or. & Ling. Studies, ii. 5.

1861. "Latin, again, with Greek, and the Celtic, the Teutonic, and Slavonic languages, together likewise with the ancient dialects of India and Persia, must have sprung from an earlier language, the mother of the whole Indo-European or Aryan family of speech."—Prof. Max Müller, Lectures, 1st Ser. 32.

We also find the verb Arganize :

1858. "Thus all India was brought under the sway, physical or intellectual and moral, of the alien race; it was thoroughly Aryanized."—Whitney, u. s. 7.

Ashrafee, s. Arab. ashrafī, 'noble,' applied to various gold coins (in analogy with the old English 'noble'), especially to the dīnār of Egypt, and to the gold mohr of India.—See Xerafine.

c. 1550. "There was also the sum of 500,000 Falory* ashrafes, equal in the currency of Persia to 50,000 royal Irak tomāns."—Mem. of Humayun, 125.

Assa-foetida.—See Hing.

Assam, n.p. The name applied for the last 3 centuries or more to the great valley of the Brahmaputra River, from the emergence of its chief sources from the mountains till it enters the great plain of Bengal. The name Asām and sometimes Ashām is a form of Āhām or Āhom, a dynasty of Shan race, who entered the country in the middle ages, and long ruled it.

Assam politically is now a province embracing much more than the name properly included.

c. 1590. "The dominions of the Rajah of Asham join to Kamroop: he is a very powerful prince, lives in great state, and when he dies, his principal attendants, both male and female, are voluntarily buried alive with his corpse."—Gladwin's Ayeen (ed. 1800) ii. 3.

1682. "Ye Nabob was very busy dispatching and vesting divers principal officers sent with all possible diligence with recruits for their army, lately overthrown in Asham and Silet, two large plentiful countries 8 days' journey distant from this city (Dacca)."—Hedges, Oct. 29th.

1770. "In the beginning of the present century, some Bramins of Bengal carried their superstitions to Asham, where the people were so happy as to be guided solely by the dictates of natural religion."—Raynal (tr. 1777) i. 420.

1788. "M. Chevalier, the late Governor of Chandernagore, by permission of the King, went as high up as the capital of Assam, about the year 1762."—Renell's Mem., 3rd ed. p. [299].

Assegay, s. An African throwing-spear. Dozy has shown that this is Berber zagħaya, with the Arabic article prefixed (p. 223). Those who use it often seem to take it for a S. African or Eastern word. So Godinho de Eredia seems to use it as if Malay (f. 21v).

c. 1270. "There was the King standing with three 'exortins' (or men of the guard) by his side armed with javelins [ab tur atzagayes]."—Chronicle of K. James of Aragon, tr. by Mr. Foster, 1883, i. 173.

c. 1444. . . . "They have a quantity of azagaia, which are a sort of light darts."—Cadamosto, Navegação primeira, 32.

1552. "But in general they all came armed in their fashion, some with azagaia and shields, and others with bows and quivers of arrows."—Barros, I. iii. 1.

1572. "Hum de escudo embraçado, e de azagaia, Outro de arco encurvado, e setta ervada."—Camões, i. 86.

By Burton :

"this, targe on arm and assegai in hand, that, with his bended bow, and venom'd reed."

1600. "These they use to make Instruments of wherewith to fish . . . as also to make weapons, as Bows, Arrowes, Aponers, and Assagayen."—Disc. of Guinea, from the Dutch, in Purchas, ii. 327.

1608. "Donques voyant que nous ne

1681. . . . . “encontraron diez y nueve hombres bazos armados con dardas, y azagayas, assi llaman los Arabes vnas lanças pequenas arrojadizas, y pelearon con ellos.”—Martínez de la Puente, Compendio, 87.

“Alert to fight, athirst to slay,
They shake the dreaded assegai,
And rush with blind and frantic will
On all, when few, whose force is skill.”
Isandlana, by Ld. Stratford de Redcliffe, Times, March 29.

Atap or Adap, s. Applied in the Malayo-Javanese regions to any palm-fronds used in thatching, commonly to those of the Nipa, q.v. (Nipa fruticans, Thunb.). “Although a wild plant, for it is so abundant that its culture is not necessary, it is remarkable that its name should be the same in all languages from Sumatra to the Philippines.”—(Crawford, Dict. Ind. Arch. 301). Atép is Javanese for ‘thatch.’

1690. “Adapol (quae folia sunt sicca et vetusta) . . . .”—Rumphius, Herb. Amb. i. 14.

1817. “In the maritime districts, âtap or thatch is made . . . from the leaves of the nipa.”—Raffles, Java, i. 166.

1878. “The universal roofing of a Perak house is Attap stretched over bamboo rafters and ridge-poles. This attap is the dried leaf of the nipah palm, doubled over a small stick of bamboo, or nibong.”—McNair, Perak, &c. 164.

Atlas, s. An obsolete word for ‘satin,’ from the Arab. atlas, used in that sense, literally ‘bare’ or ‘bald’ (comp. the Italian raso for ‘satin’). The word is still used in German.

1284. “Cette même nuit par ordre du Sultan quinze cents de ses Mamlouks furent revêtus de robes d'atlas rouges brodées. . .”—Makrizi, t. ii. pt. i, 69.

1673. “They go Rich in Apparell, their Turbats of Gold, Damask'd Gold Atlas Coats to their Heels, Silk, Alajah or Cut-tanee breeches.”—Fryer, 196.

1683. “I saw ye Taffaties and Atlases in ye Warehouse, and gave directions concerning their several colours and stripes.”—Hedges, April 6.

1689. (Surat) “is renown'd for . . . rich Silks, such as Atlases . . . and for Zarbafts. * . . .”—Ovington, 218.

1712. In the Spectator of this year are advertised “a purple and gold Atlas gown” and “a scarlet and gold Atlas petticoat edged with silver.”—Cited in Malcolm's Anecdotes (1808), 429.

1727. “They are exquisite in the Weaver's Trade and Embroidery, which may be seen in the rich Atlases . . . made by them.”—A. Hamilton, i. 160.

c. 1750–60. “The most considerable (manufacture) is that of their atlases or satin flowered with gold and silver.”—Grose, i. 117.

Note.—I saw not long ago in India a Polish Jew who was called Jacob Atlas, and he explained to me that when the Jews (about 1800) were forced to assume surnames, this was assigned to his grandfather, because he wore a black satin gaberdeine!—(A. B. 1879.)

Atoll, s. A group of coral islands forming a ring or chaplet, sometimes of many miles in diameter, inclosing a space of comparatively shallow water, each of the islands being on the same type as the atoll. We derive the expression from the Maldivé islands, which are typical examples of this structure, and where the form of the word is atolu. It is probably connected with the Singhalese prep. âtul, ‘inside.’ The term was made a scientific one by Darwin in his publication on Coral Reefs (see below), but our second quotation shows that it had been generalized at an earlier date.

c. 1610. “Estant au milieu d'un Atollon, vous voyez autour de vous ce grand banc de pierre que jay dit, qui environne et qui defend les isles contre l'impetuosité de la mer.”—Pyrard de la Val, i. 71 (ed. 1679).

1732. “Atollon, a name applied to such a place in the sea as exhibits a heap of little islands lying close together, and almost hanging on to each other.”—Zeidler's (German) Universal Lexicon, s. v.

1842. “I have invariably used in this volume the term atoll, which is the name given to these circular groups of coral islets by their inhabitants in the Indian Ocean, and is synonymous with ‘lagoon-island.’”—Darwin, The Structure, &c., of Coral Reefs, 2.

Aumil, s. Arab. and thence Hind. ‘amīl (noun of agency from ‘amal, ‘he performed a task or office,' therefore 'an agent'). Under the native governments a collector of Revenue, also a farmer of the Revenue invested with chief authority in his district. Also

Aumildar. Properly 'amaldār, 'one holding office;' (Ar. 'amal, work, with Pers. term. of agency). A factor or manager. Among the Mahrattas the 'Amaldār was a collector of revenue under varying conditions.—(See details in Wilson). The term is now limited to Mysore and a few other parts of India, and does not belong to the standard system of any Presidency.

c. 1780. "... having detected various frauds in the management of the Amildar or renter . . . (M. Lally) paid him 40,000 rupees."—Orme, iii. 496 (ed. 1803).

1793. "The aumildars, or managers of the districts."—Dirom, p. 56.

1799. I wish that you would desire one of your people to communicate with the Amildar of Soondah respecting this road."—A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Munro's Life, i. 335.

1804. "I know the character of the Peshwah, and his ministers, and of every Mahratta amildar sufficiently well . . ."—Wellington, iii. 38.

1809. "Of the aumil I saw nothing."—Ld. Valentia, i. 412.

Aurang, s. Hind. from Pers. aurang, 'a place where goods are manufactured, a depot for such goods.' During the Company's trading days this term was applied to their factories for the purchase, on advances, of native piecegoods, &c.

1778. "... Gentoo-factors in their own pay to provide the investments at the different Aurungs or cloth markets in the province."—Orme, ii. 51.

1789. "I doubt, however, very much whether he has had sufficient experience in the commercial line to enable him to manage so difficult and so important an aurung as Luckipore, which is almost the only one of any magnitude which supplies the species of coarse cloths which do not interfere with the British manufacture."—Cornwallis, i. 435.

Ava, n.p. The name of the city which was for several centuries the capital of the Burmese Empire, and was applied often to that State itself.

This name is borrowed, according to Crawford, from the form Awa or Awak used by the Malays. The proper Burmese form was Eng-wa, or 'the Lake-Mouth,' because the city was built near the opening of a lagoon into the Irawadi; but this was called, even by the Burmese, more popularly A-wa, 'The Mouth.' The city was founded A.D. 1364. The first European occurrence of the name, so far as we know, is (c. 1440) in the narrative of Nicolo Conti, and it appears again (no doubt from Conti's information) in the great World-Map of Fra Mauro at Venice (1459).

c. 1430. "Having sailed up this river for the space of a month he arrived at a city more noble than all the others, called Ava, and the circumference of which is 15 miles."—Conti, in India in the XVth Cent. 11.

c. 1490. "The country (Pegu) is distant 15 days' journey by land from another called Ava in which grow rubies and many other precious stones."—Hier. di Sto. Stefano, u. s. p. 6.

1516. "Inland, beyond this Kingdom of Pegu . . . there is another Kingdom of Gentiles which has a King who resides in a very great and opulent city called Ava, 8 days' journey from the sea; a place of rich merchants, in which there is a great trade of jewels, rubies, and spinel-rubies, which are gathered in this Kingdom."—Barbosa, 186.

c. 1635 "... The King of Ová having already sent much people, with cavalry, to relieve Porão (Promé), which marches with the Pozão (?) and city of Ová or Anvá, (which means 'surrounded on all sides with streams') . . ."—Antonio Bocarro, Decada. 130.

1726. "The city Ava is surpassing great. . . . One may not travel by land to Ava, both because this is permitted by the Emperor to none but envoys, on account of the Rubies on the way, and also because it is a very perilous journey on account of the tigers."—Valentijn, v. (Chorum.) 127.

Avadavat, s. Improperly for Amadavat. The name given to a certain pretty little cage-bird (Estrela aman-dava, L. or 'Red Wax-Bill') found throughout India, but originally brought to Europe from Ahmadabad in Guzerat, of which the name is a corruption.

1588. "... o qual veyo d'Amadava principall cidade do reino."—In S. Botelho, Tombo, 228.

1648. "The capital (of Guzerat) lies in the interior of the country and is named Hamed-Evat, i. e., the City of King Hamed who built it; nowadays they call it Amad-var or Amadabat."—Van Twist, 4.

1673. "From Amidavad, small Birds, who, besides that they are spotted with white and Red no bigger than Measles, the principal Chorister beginning, the rest in Consort, Fifty in a Cage, make an admirable Chorus."—Fryer, 116.

1813. "... amāḍavats, and other songsters are brought thither (Bombay) from Surat and different countries."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 47.

Avatar, s. Sansk. Avatāra, an incarnation on earth of a divine Being. This word first appears in Baldaeus (1672) in the form Autaar (Afgoderye, p. 52), which in the German version generally quoted in this book takes the corrupter shape of Altar.

1672. "Bey den Benjanen haben auch diese zehen Verwandlungen den Namen daas sie Altare heissen, und also hat Mats Altar als dieser erste, gewähret 2500 Jahr."—Baldaeus, 472.

1784. "The ten Avatārs or descents of the deity, in his capacity of Preserver."—Sir W. Jones, in Asiat. Res. (reprint) i. 234.

1812. "The Awatars of Vishnu, by which are meant his descents upon earth, are usually counted ten . . . ."—Maria Graham, 49.

1845. "In Vishnu-land what Avatar?"—Browning, Dramatic Romances, Works, ed. 1870, iv. pp. 209, 210.

1872. "... all which cannot blind us to the fact that the Master is merely another avatar of Dr. Holmes himself."—Sat. Review, Dec. 14, p. 768.

1873. "He . . . builds up a curious History of Spiritualism, according to which all matter is mediately or immediately the avatar of some Intelligence, not necessarily the highest."—Academy, May 15th, 172b.

1875. "Balzac's avatars were a hundred-fold as numerous as those of Vishnu."—Ibid., April 24, p. 421.

Average, s. Skeat derives this in all its senses from L. Latin averia, used for cattle; for his deduction of meanings we must refer to his Dictionary. But it is worthy of consideration whether average, in its special marine use for a proportionate contribution towards the losses of those whose goods are cast into the sea to save a ship, &c., is not directly connected with the French avarie, which has quite that signification. And this last Dozy shows most plausibly to be from the Arabic ʿawār, spoilt merchandise. Note that many European words of trade are from the Arabic; and that avarie is in Dutch avarij, averij, or haverij.—(See Dozy, Oosterlinghen.)

Ayah, s. A native lady's-maid or nurse-maid. The word has been adopted into most of the Indian vernaculars in the forms āya or āyā, but it is really Portuguese (f. aia, 'a nurse, or governess'; m. aio, 'the governor of a young noble').

"Consumah..... 10 (rupees a month).

India Gazette, Oct. 12.

1810. "The female who attends a lady while she is dressing, etc., is called an Ayah."—Williamson, V. M. i. 337.

1826. "The lieutenant's visits were none less frequent than usual; one day, however, he came . . . and on leaving the house I observed him slip something, which I doubted not was money, into the hand of the Ayah, or serving woman, of Jane."—Pandurang Hari, 71.

1842. "Here (at Simla) there is a great preponderance of Mahometans. I am told that the guns produced absolute consternation, visible in their countenances. One Ayah threw herself upon the ground in an agony of despair. . . . I fired 42 guns for Ghuzni and Cabul; the 22nd (42nd?) gun—which announced that all was finished—was what overcame the Mahometans."—Lord Ellenborough, in Indian Administration, 295. This stuff was written to the great Duke of Wellington!

1873. "The white-robed ayah flits in and out of the tents, finding a home for our various possessions, and thither we soon retire."—Fraser's Mag., June, 696.

1879. "He was exceedingly fond of his two children, and got for them servants; a man to cook their dinner, and an ayah to take care of them."—Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 7.

B.

Baba, s. This is the word usually applied in Anglo-Indian families, by both Europeans and natives, to the children,—often in the plural form bābā lōg (lōg='folk'). The word is not used by the natives among themselves in the same way, at least not habitually; and it would seem as if our word baby had influenced the use. The word bābā is properly Turki,='father'; sometimes used to a child as a term of endearment (or forming part of such a term, as in the Pers. Bābā-jān, 'Life of your Father'). Compare the Russian use of batushka.

Babagooree, s. H. Bābāghūrī, the white agate (or chalcedony?) of Cambay. It is apparently so-called from the patron saint or martyr of the district containing the mines, under whose especial protection the miners place themselves before descending into the shafts. Tradition alleges that he was a prince of the great Ghori dynasty, who was killed in a great battle in that region. But this prince will hardly be found in history.

1516. "They also find in this town (Limadura in Guzerat) much chalcodony, which they call babagore. They make beads with it, and other things which they wear about them."—Barbosa, 67.

1554. "In this country (Guzerat) is a profusion of Bābāghūrī and carnelians; but the best of these last are those coming from Yaman."—Sidi 'Alī Kapudān, in J.A.S.B. v. 463.

1590. "By the command of his Majesty grain weights of bābāghūrī were made, which were to be used in weighing."—Ain, i. 35, and note, p. 615.

1818. "On the summit stands the tomb . . . of the titular saint of the country, Baba Ghor, to whom a devotion is paid more as a deity than as a saint. . . ." Copland, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo., i. 294.

1849. Among ten kinds of carnelians specified in H. Briggs's Cities of Gujardāshtra we find "Bawa Gori Akik, a veined kind," p. 183.

Babbs, n.p. This name is given to the I. of Perim, in the St. of Babel-mandel, in the quotation. It was probably English sea-slang only.

1690. "The Babbs is a small island opening to the Red Sea. . . Between this and the Main Land, is a safe Passage . . ." Ovington, 458.

Baber, Bhabur, s. Hind. bābar. A name given in those districts of the N.W. Provinces which lie immediately under the Himālaya to the dry forest belt on the talus of the hills, at the lower edge of which the moisture comes to the surface and forms the wet forest belt called Tarāi. (See Terye.)

The following extract from the report of a lecture on Indian Forests is rather a happy example of the danger of "a little learning" to a reporter:

1877. "Beyond that (the Tarāi) lay another district of about the same breadth, called in the native dialect the Bahadar. That in fact was a great filter-bed of sand and vegetation."—London Morning Paper of 26th May.

* This word takes a ludicrous form in Dampier: "All the Indians who spake Malayan. . . looke on those Meangians as a kind of Barbarians; and upon any occasion of dislike, would call them Bobby, that is Hogs."—i. 515.

rūsa ('stag'), = The 'Stag-hog,' a remarkable animal of the swine genus (Sus babirusa, L.; Babirusa alfurus, F. Cuvier), found in the island of Bourou, and some others of the I. Archipelago, but nowhere on continental Asia. Yet it seems difficult to apply the description of Pliny below, or the name and the drawing given by Cosmas, to any other animal. The 4-horned swine of Aelian is more probably the African Wart-hog, called accordingly by F. Cuvier Phacochoerus Aelianus.

c. A.D. 70. "The wild bores of India have two bowing fangs or tusks of a cubit length, growing out of their mouth, and as many out of their foreheads like calves horns."—Pliny, viii. 52 (Holland's Tr. i. 281).

c. 250. "Ἀέγει δὲ ἄλυσιν ἐν Ἀθιωπιά γίνεσθαι . . . ὡς τερπάκους."—Aelian, De Nat. Anim. xvii. 10.

c. 545. "The Choirelaphus ('Hog-stag') I have both seen and eaten."—Cosmas Indicopleustes, in Cuthay, &c., p. clxxv.

1555. "There are hogs also with horns, and parats which prattle much which they call noris."—Galvano, Discoveries of the World (Hak. Soc.) 120.

1658. "Quadrupes hoc inusitatae figurae monstrosi bestilis ascribit Indi quod adversae speciei animalibus, Porco scilicet et Cervo, pronatum putent . . . ita ut primo intuitu quatuor cornibus juxta se positus videatur armatum hoc animal Babyroussa."—Piso, Appendix to Bontius, p. 61.

Baboo, s. Beng. and Hind. Bābū. Properly a term of respect attached to a name, like Master or Mr., and formerly applied in some parts of Hindustan to certain persons of distinction. Its application as a term of respect is now almost or altogether confined to Lower Bengal (though C. P. Brown states that it is also used in S. India for 'Sir, My lord, your Honour'). In Bengal and elsewhere, among Anglo-Indians, it is often used with a slight savour of disparagement, as characterizing a superficially cultivated, but too often effeminate, Bengali. And from the extensive employment of the class, to which the term was applied as a title, in the capacity of clerks in English offices, the word has come often to signify 'a native clerk who writes English.'

1782. "Cantoo Baboo" appears as a subscriber to a famine fund at Madras for 200 Sicca Rupees.—India Gazette, Oct. 12.

1803. ". . . Calling on Mr. Neave I foun

there Baboo Dheep Narrain, brother to Oodit Narrain, Rajah at Benares."—Lord Valentia's Travels, i. 112.

1824. "... the immense convent-like mansion of some of the more wealthy Baboos. ..."—Heber, i. 31, ed. 1844.

1834. "The Baboo and other Tales, descriptive of Society in India." Smith and Elder, London. (By Augustus Prinsep.)

1850. "If instruction were sought for from them (the Mahomedan historians) ... we should no longer hear bombastic Baboos, enjoying under our Government the highest degree of personal liberty ... rave about patriotism, and the degradation of their present position."—Sir H. M. Elliot, Orig. Preface to Mahom. Historians of India, in Dowson's ed. I. xxii.

c. 1866.

"But I'd sooner be robbed by a tall man who showed me a yard of steel, Than be fleeced by a sneaking Baboo, with a peon and badge at his heel."

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

1873. "The pliable, plastic, receptive Baboo of Bengal eagerly avails himself of this system (of English education), partly from a servile wish to please the Sahib logue, and partly from a desire to obtain a Government appointment."—Fraser's Mag., August, 209.

N.B.—In Java and the farther East bābū means a nurse or female servant (Javanese word).

Babool, s. Hind, babūl, babūr (though often mis-pronounced bābūl, as in two quotations below); also called kīkar. A thorny mimosa common in most parts of India except the Malabar coast; the Acacia arabica, Willd. The Bhils use the gum as food.

1666. "L'eau de Vie de ce Pais . . . qu'on y boit ordinairement, est faite de jagre ou sucre noir, qu'on met dans de l'eau avec de l'écorce de l'arbre Baboul, pour y donner quelque force, et ensuite on les distille ensemble."—Thevenot, v. 50.

1780. "Price Current. Country Produce. Bable Trees, large, 5 pc. each tree."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, April 29.

1824. "Rampoor is . . . chiefly remarkable for the sort of fortification which surrounds it. This is a high thick hedge . . . of bamboos . . . faced on the outside by a formidable underwood of cactus and bābūl."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 290.

1849. "Look at that great tract from Deesa to the Hāla mountains. It is all sand; sometimes it has a little ragged clothing of bābūl, or milk-bush."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 1.

Baboon, s. This, no doubt comes to us through the Italian babuino; but it is probable that the latter word is a corruption of Pers. maimūn, 'a baboon or monkey,' a word which also occurs in Italian under the more direct form of maimone, in gatto-maimone, 'cat-monkey' or rather 'monkey-cat.'

Bacanore and Barcelore, nn.pp. Two ports of Canara often coupled together in old narratives, but which have entirely disappeared from modern maps and books of navigation, inasmuch that it is not quite easy to indicate their precise position.

But it would seem that Bacanore, Malayāl. Valekanūr, is the place called in Canarese Bārūr, the Barcoor-pettah of some maps, in lat. 13° 28½'. This was the site of a very old and important city, "the capital of the Jain kings of Tulava . . . and subsequently a stronghold of the Vijayanagar Rajas."—Imp. Gazet.

Also that Barcelore is a Port. corruption of Bārūr. It must have stood immediately below the 'Barsilur Peak' of the Admiralty charts, and was apparently identical with, or near to, the place called Seror in Scott's Map of the Madras Presidency, in about lat. 13° 55'.

c. 1330. "Thence (from Hannaur) the traveller came to Bāsārūr, a small city. . . ."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 184.

c. 1343. "The first town of Mulaibār that we visited was Abu-Sarūr, which is small, situated on a great estuary, and abounding in coco-nut trees. . . . Two days after our departure from that town we arrived at Fākanūr, which is large, and situated on an estuary. One sees there an abundance of sugar-cane, such as has no equal in that country."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 77-78.

c. 1420. "Duas praeterea ad maritimas urbes, alteram Pachamuriam . . . nomine, xx diebus transiit."—Conti, in Poggius de Var. Fort. iv.

1501. "Bacanut," for Bacanur, is named in Amerigo Vespucci's letter, giving an account of Da Gama's discoveries, first published by Baldelli Boni, Il Milione, pp. liii. seqq.

1516. "Passing further forward . . . along the coast, there are two little rivers on which stand two places, the one called Bacanor, and the other Bracalor, belonging to the kingdom of Naryngua and the province of Tolinate.* And in them is much good rice grown round about these places, and this is loaded in many foreign ships and in many of Malabar. . . ."—Barbosa, in Lisbon Coll. 294.

1548. "The Port of the River of Barcalor pays 500 loads (of rice as tribute)."—Botelho, Tombo, 246.

1552. "Having dispatched this vessel,

he (V. da Gama) turned to follow his voyage, desiring to erect the padrão (votive pillar) of which we have spoken; and not finding a place that pleased him better, he erected one on certain islets joined (as it were) to the land, giving it the name of Santa Maria, whence those islands are now called Saint Mary's Isles. standing between Bacanor and Baticalá, two notable places on that coast."—De Barros, l. iv. 11.

"... the city Onor, capital of the kingdom, Baticalá, Bendor, Bracelor, Bacanor."—Ib. l. ix. 1.

1726. "In Barseloer or Basseloer have we still a factory ... a little south of Basseloer lies Baquanoor and the little River Vier."—Valentijn, v. (Malabar) 6.

1727. "The next town to the Southward of Batacola is Barceloar, standing on the Banks of a broad River about 4 Miles from the Sea. . . . The Dutch have a Factory here, only to bring up Rice for their Garrisons . . . Baccanoar and Molkey lie between Barceloar and Mangalore, both having the benefit of Rivers to export the large quantities of Rice that the Fields produce."—A. Ham. i. 284-5.

1780. "St. Mary's Islands lie along the coast N. and S. as far as off the river of Bacanor, or Callianpoor, being about 6 leagues . . . In lat. 13° 50' N., 5 leagues from Bacanor, runs the river Barsalor."—Dunn's N. Directory, 5th ed. 105.

1814. "Barcelore, now frequently called Cundapore."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 109, also 113.

Backdore, s. H. bāg-dōr ('bridle-cord'); a halter or leading rein.

Backsee. Sea Hind. bāksē. Nautical 'aback,' from which it has been formed (Roebuck).

Badega, n.p. The Tamil Vadagar, i.e. 'Northerners.' The name has at least two specific applications:

a. To the Telugu people who invaded the Tamil country from the kingdom of Vijayanagara (the Bisnaga or Narsinga of the Portuguese and old travellers, qq. v.) during the later middle ages, but especially in the 16th century. This word first occurs in the letters of St. Francis Xavier (1544), whose Parava converts on the Tinnevely Coast were much oppressed by these people. The Badega language of Lucena, and other writers regarding that time, is the Telugu.

The Badagas of St. Fr. Xavier's time were in fact the emissaries of the Nāyaka rulers of Madura, using violence to exact tribute for those rulers, whilst the Portuguese had conferred on the Paravas "the somewhat dangerous privilege of being Portuguese subjects." See Caldwell's H. of Tinnevely, 69 seqq.

1544. "Ego ad Comorinum Promontorium contendo eoque naviculas deduco xx. cibariis onustas, ut miseris illis subveniam Neophytis, qui Bagadarum (read Badagarum) acerrimorum Christiani nominis hostium terrore percussi, relictis vicis, in desertas insulas se abdiderunt."—S. F. Xav. Epist. i. vi. ed. 1677.

1737. "In eā parte missionis Carnatensis in quā Telougou, ut aiunt, lingua viget, seu inter Badagos, quinque annos versatus sum; neque quamdiu vigerunt vires ab illā dilectissimā et sanctissimā Missione Pudecherium veni."—In Norbert, iii. 230.

1875. "Mr. C. P. Brown informs me that the early French missionaries in the Guntur country wrote a vocabulary 'de la langue Talenga, dite vulgairement le Badega.'"—Bp. Caldwell, Dravidian Grammar, Intr. p. 33.

b. To one of the races occupying the Nilgiri Hills, speaking an old Canarese dialect, and being apparently a Canarese colony, long separated from the parent stock.—(See Bp. Caldwell's Grammar, 2nd ed., pp. 34, 125, &c.) The name of these people is usually in English corrupted to Burghers (q.v.)

Badgeer, s. Pers. bād-gīr, 'wind-catch.' An arrangement acting as a windsail to bring the wind down into a house; it is common in Persia, and in Sind.

1298. "The heat is tremendous (at Hormus) and on that account the houses are built with ventilators (ventiers) to catch the wind. These ventilators are placed on the side from which the wind comes, and they bring the wind down into the house to cool it."—Marco Polo, ii. 450.

1872. "... Badgirs or windcatchers. You see on every roof these diminutive screens of wattle and dab, forming acute angles with the hatches over which they project. Some are moveable, so as to be turned to the S.W. between March and the end of July, when the monsoon sets in from that quarter."—Burton's Sind Revisited, 254.

1881. "A number of square turrets stick up all over the town; these are badgirs or ventilators, open sometimes to all the winds, sometimes only to one or two, and divided inside like the flues of a great chimney, either to catch the draught, or to carry it to the several rooms below."—Pioneer Mail, March 8th.

1784. "Over this they wear the badjoo, which resembles a morning gown, open at the neck, but fastened close at the wrist, and half-way up the arm."—Marsden's H. of Sumatra, 2d ed. 44.

1878. "The general Malay costume . . . consists of an inner vest, having a collar to button tight round the neck, and the baju, or jacket, often of light coloured dimity, for undress."—McNair, 147.

1883. "They wear above it a short-sleeved jacket, the baju, beautifully made, and often very tastefully decorated in fine needlework."—Bird, Golden Chersonese, 139.

Bael, s. Hind. bel, Mahr. bail, from Sansk. vilva, the Tree and Fruit of Aegle marmelos (Correa), or 'Bengal Quince,' as it is sometimes called, after the name (Marmelos de Benguala) given it by Garcia de Orta, who first described the virtues of this fruit in the treatment of dysentery, &c. These are noticed also by P. Vincenzo Maria and others, and have always been familiar in India. Yet they do not appear to have attracted serious attention in Europe till about the year 1850. It is a small tree, a native of various parts of India. The dried fruit is now imported into England.—(See Hanbury and Flückiger, 116.) The shelly rind of the bel is in the Punjab made into carved snuff-boxes for sale to the Afghans.

1563. "And as I knew that it was called beli in Baçaim, I enquired of those native physicians which was its proper name, cirifole or beli, and they told me that cirifole [sriphala] was the physician's name for it. . . ."—Garcia De O., ff. 221v., 222.

1681. Jac. Bontius describes the bel as malum cydonium (i.e. a quince), and speaks of its pulp as good for dysentery and for the cholerae immanem organismum.—Lib. vi. cap. viii.

1672. "The Bili plant grows to no greater height than that of a man,* all thorny . . . the fruit in size and hardness, and nature of rind, resembles a pomegranate, dotted over the surface with little dark spots equally distributed. . . . With the fruit they make a decoction, which is a most efficacious remedy for dysenteries or fluxes, proceeding from excessive heat. . . ."—P. Vincenzo, 353.

1879. " . . . On this plain you will see a large bél-tree, and on it one big bél-fruit."—Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 140.

Bafta, s. A kind of calico, made especially at Baroch; from the Pers. bäfta, 'woven.' The old Baroch bäftas seem to have been fine goods. Nothing is harder than to find intelligible explanations of the distinction between the numerous varieties of cotton stuffs formerly exported from India to Europe under a still greater variety of names; names and trade being generally alike obsolete. Bäftas however survived in the Tariffs till recently.

1598. "There is made great store of Cotton Linnen of diuers sort . . . Boffetas."—Linschoten, p. 18.

1612. "Bäftas or white Callicos, from twentie to fortie Royals, the corge."—Capt. Saris in Purchas, i. 347.

1665. "The Bäftas, or Calicuts painted red, blue, and black, are carried white to Agra and Amadabad, in regard those cities are nearest the places where the Indigo is made that is us'd in colouring."—Tavernier, (E. T.) p. 127.

1672. "A Broach Bäftas, broad and narrow."—Fryer, 86.

1727. "The Baroach Bäftas are famous throughout all India, the country producing the best Cotton in the World."—A. Hamilton, i. 144.

1875. In the Calcutta Tariff valuation of this year we find Piece Goods, Cotton :

Bäftahs, score, 30rs.

It is curious to find this word now current on Lake Nyanza. The burial of King Mtesa's mother is spoken of :

1883. "The chiefs half filled the nicely-padded coffin with bäfta (bleached calico . . . after that the corpse and then the coffin was filled up with more bäfta." . . . In Ch. Missy. Intelligencer, N.S., viii. p. 543.

Bahar, s. Arab. bahār, Malayāl. bhāram, from Sansk. bhāra, 'a load.' A weight used in large trading transactions; it varied much in different localities; and though the name is of Indian origin it was naturalised by the Arabs, and carried by them to the far East, being found in use, when the Portuguese arrived in those seas, at least as far as the Moluccas. In the Indian islands the bahār is generally reckoned as equal to 3 peculs, (q.v.) or 400 lbs. avoirdupois. But there was a different bahār in use for different articles of merchandize; or, rather, each article had a special surplus allowance in weighing, which practically made a different bahār (see Picota).

1498. . . . "and begged him to send to the King his Lord a bagar of cinnamon, and another of clove . . . for sample" (a mostra).—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 78.

1506. "In Cananor, el suo Re si è zentil, e qui nasce zz. (i.e., zengeri or 'ginger'); ma li zz. pochi e non cusi boni come quelli de Colcut, e suo peso si chiama baar, che sono K. (Cantari) 4 da Lisbona."—Relazione di Leonardo Ca' Masser, 26.

1510. "If the merchandise about which they treat be spices, they deal by the bahar, which bahar weighs three of our cantari."—Varthema, p. 170.

Bahaudur, s. Hind. Bahādur, 'a hero, or champion.' It is a title affixed commonly to the names of European officers in Indian documents, or when spoken of ceremoniously by natives ('e.g. Jones Şāhib Bahādur'), in which use it may be compared with the "gallant officer" of Parliamentary courtesy, or the Illustrissimo Signore of the Italians. It was conferred as a title of honour by the Great Mogul and by other native princes. Thus it was particularly affected to the end of his life by Hyder Ali, to whom it had been given by the Raja of Mysore (see quotation from John Lindsay below). Bahādur, and Sirdār Bahādur are also the official titles of members of the 2nd and 1st classes respectively of the Order of British India, established for native officers of the army in 1837.

As conferred by the court of Dehli the usual gradation of titles was (ascending):—1. Bahādur; 2. Bahādur Jang; 3. Bahādur ud-Daulah; 4. Bahādur ul-Mulk. At Hyderabad they had also Bahādur ul-Umrā (Kirkpatrick, in Tippoo's Letters, 354).

In Anglo-Indian colloquial parlance the word denotes a haughty or pompous personage, exercising his brief authority with a strong sense of his own importance; a don rather than a swaggerer. Thackeray, who derived from his Indian birth and connexions a humorous felicity in the use of Anglo-Indian expressions, has not omitted this serviceable word. In that brilliant burlesque, the Memoirs of Major Gahagan, we have the Mahratta traitor Bobachee Bahauder. It is said also that Mr. Canning's malicious wit bestowed on Sir John Malcolm, who was not less great as a talker than as a soldier and statesman, the title, not included in the Great Mogul's repertory, of Bahauder Jau.*

Bahādur is one of the terms which the hosts of Chingiz Khan brought with them from the Mongol Steppes. In the Mongol genealogies we find Yesugai Bahādur, the father of Chingiz, and many more. Subutai Bahādur, one of the great soldiers of the Mongol host, twice led it to the conquest of Southern Russia, twice to that of Northern China! In Sanang Setzen's poetical annals of the Mongols, as rendered by I. J. Schmidt, the word is written Baghatür, whence in Russian Bogatir still survives, as a memento probably of the Tartar domination, meaning 'a hero or champion.' It occurs often in the old Russian epic ballads in this sense; and is also applied to Samson of the Bible. It occurs in a Russian chronicle as early as 1240, but in application to Mongol leaders. In Polish it is found as Bohatyr, and in Hungarian as Bátor,—this last being in fact the popular Mongol pronunciation of Baghatür. In Turki also this elision of the guttural extends to the spelling, and the word becomes Bätür, as we find it in the dictionaries of Vambéry and Pavet de Courteille. In Manchu also the word takes the form of Baturu, expressed in Chinese characters as Pa-tu-lu;* the Kirghiz has it as Batyr; the Altai-Tataric as Paattyır, and other dialects even as Magathyr. But the singular history of the word is not yet entirely told. Benfey has suggested that the word originated in Sanskrit bhaga-dhara ('happiness-possessing').† But the late lamented Prof. A. Schiefner, who favoured us with a note on the subject, was strongly of opinion that the word was rather a corruption "through dissimulation of the consonant," of the Zend bagha-puthra, 'Son of God,' and thus but another form of the famous term Faghfur, by which the old Persians rendered the Chinese Tien-tsz ('Son of Heaven'), applying it to the Emperor of China.‡

* At Lord Wellesley's table, Major Malcolm mentioned as a notable fact that he and three of his brothers had once met together in India. "Impossible, Malcolm, quite impossible," said the Governor-General. Malcolm persisted. "No, no," said Lord Wellesley, "if four Malcolms had met, we should have heard the noise all over India!"

1280-1290. In an eccentric Persian poem, purposely stuffed with Mongol expressions, written by Purbahā Jāmī in praise of Arghūn Khān of Persia, of which Hammer has given a German translation, we have the following:—

"The Great Kaan names thee his Ulugh-Bitekchi [Great Secretary], Seeing thou art bitekchi and Behādir to boot;

O Well-beloved, the yarligh [rescript] that thou dost issue is obeyed
By Turk and Mongol, by Persian, Greek, and Barbarian!"

c. 1400. "I ordained that every Ameer who should reduce a Kingdom, or defeat an army, should be exalted by three things; by a title of honour, by the Tugh (Yak's tail standard), and by the Nakkāra [great kettle drum]; and should be dignified by the title of Bahadur."—Timour's Institutes, 283; see also 291-293.

1536. (As a proper name) "Itaq̃ ille potentissimus Rex Badur, Indiae universae terror, a quo nonnulli regnū Pori maximi quōdam regis teneri affirmant. . . ."—Letter from John III. of Portugal, to Pope Paul III.

Hardly any native name occurs more frequently in the Portuguese Hist. of India than this of Badur—viz., Bahadur Shah the warlike and powerful king of Guzerat (1526-1537), killed in a fray which closed an interview with the Viceroy, Nuno da Cunha, at Diu.

We have said that the title Behauder (Bahadur) was one by which Hyder Ali of Mysore was commonly known in his day. Thus in the two next quotations:

1781. "Sheikh Hussein upon the guard tells me that our army has beat the Behauder [i.e. Hyder Ali], and that peace was making. Another sepoj in the afternoon tells us that the Behauder had destroyed our army, and was besieging Madras."—Captivity of Hon. John Lindsay, in Lives of Lindsays, iii. 296.

1800. "One lac of Behaudry pagodas."—Wellington, i. 148.

1801. "Thomas, who was much in liquor, now turned round to his sowars, and said—'Could any one have stopped Sahib Bahadur at this gate but one month ago?' 'No, no,' replied they; on which—"Skinner, Mil. Mem. i. 236.

1876. "Reverencing at the same time bravery, dash, and boldness, and loving their freedom, they (the Kirghiz) were always ready to follow the standard of any batyr, or hero . . . who might appear on the stage."—Schuyler's Turkestan, i. 33.

1878. "Peacock feathers for some of the subordinate officers, a yellow jacket for the successful general, and the bestowal of the Manchoo title of Baturu, or 'Brave,' on some of the most distinguished brigadiers, are probably all the honours which await the return of a triumphal army. The reward which fell to the share of 'Chinese Gordon' for the part he took in the suppression of the Taiping rebellion was a yellow jacket, and the title of Baturu has lately been bestowed on Mr. Mesny for years of faithful service against the rebels in the province of Kweichow."—Saturday Review, Aug. 10, p. 182.

"There is nothing of the great bahawder about him."—Athenaeum, No. 2670, p. 851.

1879. "This strictly prohibitive Proclamation is issued by the Provincial Administrative Board of Likim . . . and Chang, Brevet-Provincial Judge, chief of the Foochow Likim Central Office, Taot'ai for special service, and Bat'uru with the title of 'Awe-inspiring Brave.'"—Transl. of Proclamation against the cultivation of the Poppy in Foochow, July, 1879.

Baikree, s. The Bombay name for the Barking-deer, q. v. It is Guzarāṭī bekrī; and, acc. to Jerdon, Mahr. bekra or bekar, but this is not in Molesworth's Dict.

1879. "Any one who has shot baikri on the spurs of the Ghats can tell how it is possible unerringly to mark down these little beasts, taking up their position for the day in the early dawn."—Overl. Times of India, Suppt. May 12, 7b.

Bajra. Hind. bājra and bājri (Pennisetia spicata, Willden.). One of the tall millets forming a dry crop in many parts of India. Forbes calls it bahjeree (Or. Mem. ii. 406).

1844. "The ground (at Maharajpore) was generally covered with bajree, full 5 or 6 feet high."—Lord Ellenborough in Ind. Admin. 414.

Bākīr-khānī, s. A kind of cake, almost exactly resembling pie-crust, said to owe its name to its inventor Bākīr Khān.

Balāchong, Blachong, s. Malay balūchān. The characteristic condiment of the Indo-Chinese and Malayan races, composed of prawns, sardines, and other small fish, allowed to ferment in a heap, and then mashed up with salt. Marsden calls it 'a species of caviare,' which is hardly fair to caviare. It is the ngāpi of the Burmese, and trāsi of the Javanese, and is probably, as Crawford says, the Roman garum. One of us, who has witnessed the process of preparing ngāpi on the island of Negrais, is almost disposed to agree with the Venetian Gasparo Balbi (1583), who says, "he would rather smell a dead dog, to say nothing of eating it" (f. 125 v). But when this experience is absent it may be more tolerable.

1688. Dampier writes it Balachau, ii. 28.

1727. "Bankasay is famous for making Balichang, a Sauce made of dried Shrimps, Cod-pepper, Salt, and a Sea-weed or Grass, all well mixed and beaten up to the Consistency of thick Mustard."—A. Hamilton, ii. 194.

The same author, in speaking of Pegu, calls the like sauce Prock (44), which was probably the Talain name. It appears also in Sonnerat under the form Proa (ii. 305).

1784. "Blachang . . . is esteemed a great delicacy among the Malays, and is by them exported to the west of India. . . . It is a species of caviare, and is extremely offensive and disgusting to persons who are not accustomed to it."—Marsden's H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 57.

Balaghaut, used as n.p.; Pers. bālā, 'above,' Hind. Mahr.; &c., ghāt, 'a pass,'—the country 'above the passes,' i.e. above the passes over the range of mountains which we call the "Western Ghats" (see Ghats). The mistaken idea that ghāt means 'mountains' causes Forbes to give a nonsensical explanation, cited below. The expression may be illustrated by the old Scotch phrases regarding "below and above the Pass" of so and so; implying Lowlands and Highlands.

c. 1562. "All these things were brought by the Moors, who traded in pepper which they brought from the hills where it grew, by land in Bisnega, and Balagate, and Cambay."—Correa of Ld. Stanley, p. 344.

This is nonsense, but the following are also absurd misdescriptions:—

1805. "Bala Ghaut, the higher or upper Gaut or Ghaut, a range of mountains so called to distinguish them from the Payen Ghauts, the lower Ghauts or Passes."—Dict. of Words used in E. Indies, 28.

Balass, s. A kind of ruby, or rather a rose-red spinelle. This is not an Anglo-Indian word, but it is a word of Asiatic origin, occurring frequently in old travellers. It is a corruption of Balakhshī, a popular form of Badakhshī, because these rubies came from the famous mines on the Upper Oxus, in one of the districts subject to Badakhshān.

c. 1350. "The mountains of Badakhshān have given their name to the Badakhshī ruby, vulgarly called al-Balakhsh."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 59, 394.

1516. "These balasses are found in Balaxayo, which is a kingdom of the mainland near Pegu and Bengal."—Barbosa, 213.

This is very bad geography for Barbosa, who is usually accurate and judicious, but it is surpassed in much later days.

1581. "I could never understand from whence those that be called Balassi come."—Cæsar Frederike in Hakl. ii. 372.

Balcony, s. Not an Anglo-Indian word, but sometimes regarded as of Oriental origin; a thing more than doubtful. The etymology alluded to by Mr. Schuyler and by the lamented William Gill in the quotations below, is not new, though we know not who first suggested it. Neither do we know whether the word balagani, which Erman (Tr. in Siberia, E. T. i. 115) tells us is the name given to the wooden booths at the Nijnei Fair, be the same Persian word or no. Both Wedgwood and Littré connect balcony with the word which appears in English as balk, and with the Italian balco, 'a scaffolding' and the like, also used for 'a box' at the play. Balco, as well as paleo, is a form occurring in early Italian. Thus Franc. da Buti, commenting on Dante (1385-87) says: "Balco è luogo alto doue si monta e scende." Hence naturally would be formed balcone, which we have in Giov. Villani, in Boccaccio and in Petrarch.

Manuzzi (Vocabolario It.) defines balcone as = finestra (f).

It may be noted as to the modern pronunciation that whilst ordinary mortals (including among verse-writers Scott and Lockhart, Tennyson and Hood) accent the word as a dactyl (bālcōnŷ), the crème de la crème, if we are not mistaken, makes it, or did in the last generation make it, as Cowper does below, an amphibrach (bālcōnŷ): "Xanthus his name with those of heavenly birth, But called Scamander by the sons of earth!"

1880. "Bālā khānā means 'upper house,' or 'upper place,' and is applied to the room built over the archway by which the chāppā khānā is entered, and from it, by the way, we got our word 'Balcony.'"—MS. Journal in Persia of Captain W. J. Gill. R.E.

Baloon, Balloon, &c. s. A rowing vessel formerly used in various parts of the Indies, the basis of which was a large canoe, or 'dug-out.' There is a Mahr. word balyānw, a kind of barge, which is probably the original.

Balsora, n. p. This old form used to be familiar from its use in the popular version of the Arabian Nights after Galland. It is Basra properly, long the chief mart of the Euphrates and Tigris Delta.

Balty, s. Hind. bālī, a bucket. This is the Port. balde.

Bálwar, s. This is the native servant's form of 'barber,' shaped by the 'striving after meaning' as bālwār, for bāhwāla, i.e. 'capillarius,' 'hair-man.' It often takes the further form bāl-būr, another factitious hybrid, shaped by Pers. bārīdan, 'to cut,' quasi 'hair-cutter.' But though now obsolete, there was also (see both Meninski, and Vullers s.v.) a Persian word bārbār, for a barber or surgeon, from which came this Turkish term "Le Berber-bachi, qui fait la barbe au Pacha," which we find (c. 1674) in the Appendix to the journal of Antoine Galland, pubd. at Paris, 1881 (ii. 190). It looks as if this must have been an early loan from Europe.

Bamboo, s. Applied to many gigantic grasses, of which Bambusa arundinacea and B. vulgaris are the most commonly cultivated; but there are many other species of the same and allied genera in use; natives of tropical Asia, Africa, and America. This word, one of the commonest in Anglo-Indian daily use, and thoroughly naturalised in English, is of exceedingly obscure origin. According to Wilson it is Canarese bāndū. Marsden inserts it in his dictionary as good Malay. Crawford says it is certainly used on the west coast of Sumatra as a native word, but that it is elsewhere unknown to the Malay languages. The usual Mal. word is buluh. He thinks it more likely to have found its way into English from Sumatra than from Canara. But there is evidence enough of its familiarity among the Portuguese before the end of the 16th century to indicate the probability that we adopted the word, like so many others, through them. We believe that the correct Canarese word is banuru. In the 16th century the form in the Concan appears to have been mambu, or at least it was so represented by the Portuguese. Rumphius seems to suggest a quaint onomatopœia: "vehementissimos edunt ictus et sonitus, quum incendio comburuntur, quando notum ejus nomen Bambu, Bambu, facile exauduit."—(Herb. Amb. iv. 17.)

The term applied to tabūshūr, a siliceous concretion in the bamboo, in our first quotation seems to show that bamboo or mambu was one of the words which the Portuguese inherited from an earlier use by Persian or Arab traders. But we have not been successful in finding other proof of this.

It is possible that the Canarese word is a vernacular corruption, or development, of the Sansk. vaṇṣa, whence H. bāṇs. Bamboo does not occur, so far as we can find, in any of the earlier XVth century books, which employ canna or the like.

In England the term bamboo-cane is habitually applied to a kind of walking-stick, which is formed not from any bamboo but from a species of rattan. It may be noted that some 15 to 20 years ago there existed along the high road between Putney Station and West Hill a garden fence of bamboos of considerable extent; it often attracted the attention of one of the present writers.

1563. "The people from whom it (tabashūr) is got call it sacar-mambum . . . because the canes of that plant are called by the Indians mambu."—Garcia, f. 194.

1578. "Some of these (canes), especially in Malabar, are found so large that the people make use of them as boats (embarcaciones) not opening them out, but cutting one of the canes right across and using the natural knots to stop the ends, and so a couple of naked blacks go upon it . . . each of them at his own end of the mambu* (so they call it) [being provided with two paddles, one in each hand . . . and so upon a cane of this kind the folk pass across, and sitting with their legs clinging naked."—C. Acosta, Tractado, 296.

Again:

" . . . and many people on that river (of Cranganor) make use of those canes in place of boats, to be safe from the numerous Crocodiles or Caymoins (as they call them) which are in the river (which are in fact great and ferocious lizards)" [lagartos].—Id. 297.

These passages are curious as explaining, if they hardly justify, Ctesias, in what we have regarded as one of his greatest bounces, viz., his story of Indian canes big enough to be used as boats.

which they call Bambos, and bee covered with Strawe."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 391.

1615. "These two kings (of Camboja and Siam) have neyther Horses, nor any fiery Instruments: but make use only of bowes, and a certaine kind of pike, made of a knottie wood like Canes, called Bambuc, which is exceeding strong, though pliant and supple for vse."—De Monfart, 33.

1621. "These Forts will better appeare by the Draught thereof, herewith sent to your Worshipps, inclosed in a Bamboo."—Letter in Purchas, i. 699.

1623. "Among the other trees there was an immense quantity of bambū, or very large Indian canes, and all clothed and covered with pretty green foliage that went creeping up them."—P. della Valle, ii. 640.

c. 1666. "Cette machine est suspendue à une longue barre que l'on appelle Pambou."—Thevenot, v. 162.

(This spelling recurs throughout a chapter describing palankins, though elsewhere the traveller writes bamboo).

1727. "The City (Ava) tho' great and populous, is only built of Bambou Canes."—A. Hamilton, ii. 47.

1855. "When I speak of bamboo huts, I mean to say that post and walls, wall-plates and rafters, floor and thatch and the withes that bind them, are all of bamboo. In fact it might almost be said that among the Indo-Chinese nations the staff of life is a Bamboo. Scaffolding and ladders, landing-jetties, fishing apparatus, irrigation-wheels and scoops, oars, masts and yards, spears and arrows, hats and helmets, bow, bow-string and quiver, oil-cans, water-stoups and cooking-pots, pipe-sticks, conduits, clothes-boxes, pan-boxes, dinner-trays, pickles, preserves, and melodious musical instruments, torches, footballs, cordage, bellows, mats, paper,* these are but a few of the articles that are made from the bamboo."—Mission to Ava, p. 153.

Bamboos are sometimes popularly distinguished (after a native idiom) as male and female; the latter embracing all the common species with hollow stems, the former title being applied to a certain kind (in fact a sp. of a distinct genus, Dendrocalamus strictus), which has a solid or nearly solid core, and is much used for bludgeons (see lattee) and spear-shafts. It is remarkable that this popular distinction by sex was known to Ctesias (c. B.C. 400) who says that the Indian reeds were divided into male and female, the male having no ἐνρῶσιν.

* To these may be added, from a cursory inspection of a collection in one of the museums at Kew, combs, mugs, sun-blinds, cages, grotesque carvings, brushes, fans, shirts, sails, teapots, pipes, and harps.

One of the present writers has seen (and partaken of) rice cooked in a joint of bamboo, among the Khyens, a hill-people of Arakan. And Mr. Markham mentions the same practice as prevalent among the Chunchos and savage aborigines on the eastern slopes of the Andes. (J. R. Geog. Soc. xxv. 155.) An endeavour was made in Pegu in 1855 to procure the largest obtainable bamboo. It was a little over 10 inches in diameter. But Clusius states that he had seen two great specimens in the University at Leyden, 30 feet long and from 14 to 16 inches in diameter. And E. Haeckel, in his Visit to Ceylon (1882), speaks of bamboo-stems at Peridenia, "each from a foot to two feet thick." We can obtain no corroboration of anything approaching two feet.

Bamó, n. p. Burn. Bha-maw, Shan Manmaw; in Chinese Sin-Kai, 'New-market.' A town on the upper Irawadi, where one of the chief routes from China abuts on that river. The old Shan town of Bamo was on the Tapeng R. about 20 m. east of the Irawadi, and it is supposed that the English factory alluded to by Dalrymple was there.

1759. "This branch seems formerly to have been driven from the Establishment at Frammoo."—Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 111.

Banana, s. The fruit of Musa paradisaca, and M. sapientum of Linnaeus, but now reduced to one species under the latter name by R. Brown. This word is not used in India, though one hears it in the Straits Settlements. The word itself is said by De Orta to have come from Guinea; so also Pigafetta (see below). The matter will be more conveniently treated under Plantain, q. v.

1563. "The Arab calls these musa or amusa; there are chapters on the subject in Avicenna and Serapion, and they call them by this name, as does Rasis also.

Moreover, in Guinea they have these figs, and call them bananas."—Garcia, 93 v.

1598. "Other fruits there are termed Banana which we think to be the Muses of Egypt and Soria . . . but here they cut them yearly, to the end they may bear the better."—Tr. of Pigafetta's Congo, in Harleian Coll. ii. 553 (also in Purchas, ii. 1008).

c. 1610. "Des bannes (marginal rubric Bannanes) que les Portugais appellent figues d'Inde, et aux Maldives Quella."—Pyrard de la Val, i. 85.

1673. "Bonanoes, which are a sort of Plantain, though less, yet much more grateful."—Fryer, 40.

1686. "The Bonano tree is exactly like the Plantain for shape and bigness, not easily distinguishable from it but by the Fruit, which is a great deal smaller."—Dampier, i. 316.

Banchoot, Beteechoot, ss. Terms of abuse, which we should hesitate to print if their odious meaning were not obscure "to the general." If it were known to the Englishmen who sometimes use the words, we believe there are few who would not shrink from such brutality. Somewhat similar in character seem the words which Saul in his rage flings at his noble son (1 Sam. xx. 30).

1638. "L'on nous monstra à vne demy lieue de la ville vn sepulchre, qu'ils appellent Bety-chuit, c'est à dire la vergogne de la fille decouverte."—Mandelstø, Paris, 1659, 142. See also Valentijn, iv. 157.

There is a handsome tomb and mosque to the north of Ahmedabad, erected by Hajji Malik Bahā-ud-dīn, a Wazīr of Sultan Mahommed Bigara, in memory of his wife Bibi Achut or Achhūt; and probably the vile story to which the 17th century travellers refer is founded only on a vulgar misrepresentation of this name.

1648. "Bety-chuit; dat is (onder eerbre-dinge gesproocken) in onse tale te seggen, u Dochters Schaemelheyt."—Van Twist, 16.

1792. "The officer (of Tippoo's troops) who led, on being challenged in Moors answered (Agari que loque)—"We belong to the advance"—the title of Lally's brigade, supposing the people he saw to be their own Europeans, whose uniform also is red; but soon discovering his mistake the commandant called out (Feringhy Banchoot!—chelow) 'they are the rascally English! Make off; in which he set the corps a ready example.'—Dirom's Narrative, 147.

Bancock, n. p. The modern capital of Siam, properly Bang-kok; see explanation by Bp. Pallegoix in quotation. It had been the site of forts erected on the ascent of the Menam to the old capital Ayuthia, by Constantine Phaulcon in 1675; here the modern city was established as the seat of government in 1767, after the capture of Ayuthia (see Yuthia) by the Burmese that year. It is uncertain if the first quotation refer to Bancock.

1552. "... and Bamplacot, which stands at the mouth of the Menam."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1727. "The Ship arrived at Bencock, a Castle about half-way up, where it is customary for all Ships to put their Guns ashore."—A. Hamilton, I. 363.

1850. "Civitas regia tria habet nomina: ... bān mākōk, per contractionem Bangkōk, pagus oleastrorum, est nomen primitivum quod hodie etiam vulgo usurpatur."—Pallegoix, Gram. Linguae Thai, Bangkok, 1850, p. 167.

Bandanna, s. This term is properly applied to the rich yellow or red silk handkerchief, with diamond spots left white by pressure applied to prevent their receiving the dye. The etymology may be gathered from Shakespeare's Dict., which gives "Bandhnā"; 1. A mode of dyeing in which the cloth is tied in different places, to prevent the parts tied from receiving the dye ... 3. a kind of silk cloth."

A class or caste in Guzerat who do this kind of preparation for dyeing are called Bandhūrā (Drummond).

c. 1590. "His Majesty improved this department in four ways ... Thirdly, in stuffs as. ... Bandhnūn, Chhint, Alchah."—Ain, I. 91.

1752. "The Cosseimbazar merchants having fallen short in gurrals, plain taffaties, ordinary bandannoes, and chappas."—In Long, 31.

1813. "Bandannoes ... 800."—Milburn (List of Bengal Piece-goods, and no. to the ton) ii. 221.

1843. "Mr. Scape, lately admitted partner into the great Calcutta House of Fogle, Fake, and Cracksmen ... taking Fake's place, who retired to a princely Park in Sussex, (the Fogles have long been out of the firm, and Sir Horace Fogle is about to be raised to the peerage as Baron Bandanna) ... two years before it failed for a million, and plunged half the Indian public into misery and ruin."—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. 25.

1866. "Of course," said Toogood, wiping his eyes with a large red bandana handkerchief. 'By all means, come along, Major.' The major had turned his face away, and he also was weeping."—Last Chronicle of Barsat, ii. 362.

Bandaree, s. Mahr. Bhandāri, the name of the caste. It is applied at Bombay to the class of people (of a low caste) who tend the coco-palm gardens in the island, and draw toddy, and who at one time formed a local militia.

1548. "... certain duties collected from the bandarys who draw the toddy (sura) from the aldeas ..."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 203.

1644. "The people ... are all Christians, or at least the greater part of them consisting of artizans, carpenters, chaudaris (this word is manifestly a mistranscription of bandaris), whose business is to gather nuts from the coco-palms, and corumbis (see Koonbee) who till the ground ..."—Bocarro, MS.

1673. "The President ... if he go abroad, the Bandarines and Moors under two Standards march before him."—Fryer, 68.

"... besides 60 Field-pieces ready in their Carriages upon occasion to attend the Militia and Bandarines."—Ibid. 66.

c. 1760. "There is also on the island kept up a sort of militia, composed of the land-tillers, and bandarees, whose living depends chiefly on the cultivation of the coco-nut trees."—Grose, I. 46.

1810. "Her husband came home, laden with toddy for distilling. He is a bandari or toddy-gatherer."—Maria Graham, 26.

c. 1836. "Of the Bhundarees the most remarkable usage is their fondness for a peculiar species of long trumpet, called Bhongalee, which, ever since the dominion of the Portuguese, they have had the privilege of carrying and blowing on certain State occasions."—R. Murphy, in Tr. Bo. Geog. Soc. i. 131.

1883. "We have received a letter from one of the large Bhundarries in the city, pointing out that the tax on toddy trees is now Rs. 18 (? Rs. 1. 8 as.) per tapped toddy tree per annum, whereas in 1872 it was only Re. 1 per tree ... he urges that the Bombay toddy-drawers are entitled to the privilege of practising their trade free of license, in consideration of the military services rendered by their ancestors in garrisoning Bombay town and island, when the Dutch fleet advanced towards it in 1670."—Times of India (Mail), July 17th.

1621. "We and the Hollanders went to vizet Semi Dono, and we carid hym a bottell of strong water, and an other of Spanish wine, with a great box (or bandeja) of sweet bread."—Cocks's Diary, ii. 143.

c. 1760. "(Betel) in large companies is brought in ready made up on Japan chargers, which they call from the Portuguese name, Bandejals, something like our tea-boards."—Grose, i. 237.

Bandeja appears in the Manilla Vocabulary of Blumentritt as used there for the present of cakes and sweetmeats, tastefully packed in an elegant basket, and sent to the priest, from the wedding feast. It corresponds therefore to the Indian qāli (see Dolly).

Bandel, n. p. The name of the old Portuguese settlement in Bengal about a mile above Hoogly, where there still exists a monastery, said to be the oldest church in Bengal (see Insp. Gazetteer). The name is a Port. corruption of bandar, 'the wharf'; and in this shape the word was applied among the Portuguese to a variety of places. Thus in Correa, under 1541, 1542, we find mention of a port in the Red Sea, near the mouth, called Bandel dos Malemos ('of the Pilots'). Chittagong is called Bandel de Chatigão (e.g. in Bocarro, p. 441), corresponding to Bandar Chāt-gām in the Autobiog. of Jahāngir (Elliot, vi. 326). In the following passage the original no doubt runs Bandar-i-Hūgli or Hūgli-Bandar.

1631. "... these Europeans increased in number, and erected large substantial buildings, which they fortified with cannons, muskets, and other implements of war. In due course a considerable place grew up, which was known by the name of Port of Hūgli."—Abdul Hamid, in Elliot, vii. 32.

Bandicoot, s. Corr. from the Telugu pandi-kokku, lit. 'pig-rat.' The name has spread all over India, as applied to the great rat called by naturalists Mus malabaricus (Shaw), Mus giganteus (Hardwicke), Mus bandicota (Bechstein). The word is now also used in Queensland.

c. 1330. "In Lesser India there be some rats as big as foxes, and venomous exceedingly."—Friar Jordanus, Hak. Soc. 29.

c. 1343. "They imprison in the dungeons (of Dwaigir, i.e. Daulatābād) those who have been guilty of great crimes. There are in those dungeons enormous rats, bigger than cats. In fact, these latter animals run away from them, and can't stand against them, for they would get the worst of it. So they are only caught by stratagem. I have seen these rats at Dwaigir, and much amazed I was!"—Ibn Batuta, iv. 47.

Fryer seems to exaggerate worse than the Moor:

1673. "For Vermin, the strongest huge Rats as big as our Pigs, which burrow under the Houses, and are bold enough to venture on Poultry."—Fryer, 116.

The following surprisingly confounds two entirely different animals:

1789. "The Bandicoot, or musk rat, is another troublesome animal, more indeed from its offensive smell than anything else."—Munro, Narrative, 32. See Musk-rat.

1879. "I shall never forget my first night here (on the Cocos Islands). As soon as the Sun had gone down, and the moon risen, thousands upon thousands of rats, in size equal to a bandicoot, appeared."—Pollak, Sport in B. Burmah, &c., ii. 14.

1880. "They (wild dogs in Queensland) hunted Kangaroo when in numbers . . . but usually preferred smaller and more easily obtained prey, as rats, bandicoots, and 'possums.'"—Blackwood's Mag., Jan. p. 65.

Bandicooy, s. The colloquial name in S. India of the fruit of Hibiscus esculentus; Tamil venḍai-kkai, i.e. unripe fruit of the venḍai, called in Hind. bhendi. See Bendy.

Bandy, s. A carriage, bullock-carriage, buggy, or cart. This word is usual in both the Southern and Western Presidencies, but is unknown in Bengal, and in the N. W. P. It is the Tamil vaṇḍi, Telug. baṇḍi, 'a cart or vehicle.' The word, as bendi, is also used in Java.

1791. "To be sold, an elegant new and fashionable Bandy, with copper pannels. lined with Morocco leather."—Madras Courier, 29th Sept.

1800. "No wheel-carriages can be used in Canara, not even a buffalo-bandy."—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 243.

1810. "None but open carriages are used in Ceylon; we therefore went in bandies, or in plain English, gigs."—Maria Graham, 88.

1826. "Those persons who have not European coachmen have the horses of their . . . 'bandies' or gigs, led by these men . . . Gigs and hackeries all go here (in Ceylon) by the name of bandy."—Heber (ed. 1844), ii. 152.

1860. "Bullock-bandies covered with cajans met us."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 146.

1862. "At Coimbatore I bought a bandy or country cart of the simplest construction."—Markham's Peru and India, 393.

Bang, Bhang, s. Hind. bhāṅg, the dried leaves and small stalks of hemp (i.e. Cannabis indica), used to cause intoxication, either by smoking, or when eaten mixt up into a sweetmeat (see Majoon). Hashish of the Arabs is substantially the same; Birdwood says it "consists of the tender tops of the plants after flowering."

1563. "The great Sultan Badur told Martin Affonso de Souza, for whom he had a great liking, and to whom he told all his secrets, that when in the night he had a desire to visit Portugal, and the Brazil, and Turkey, and Arabia, and Persia, all he had to do was to eat a little bangue . . ."—Garcia, f. 26.

1578. "Bangue is a plant resembling hemp, or the Cannabis of the Latins . . . the Arabs call this Bangue 'Axis,'" (i.e. Hashish).—C. Acosta, 360-361.

1598. "They have . . . also many kinds of Drogues, as Amfion, or Opium, Camfora, Bangue and Sandall Wood."—Linschoten, 19.

1638. "Il se fit apporter vn petit cabinet d'or . . . dont il tira deux layettes, et prit dans l'une de l'offion, ou opium, et dans l'autre du bengi, qui est vne certaine drogue ou poudre, dont ils se seruient pour s'exciter à la luxure."—Mandelstou, Paris, 1659, 150.

1685. "I have two sorts of the Bangue, which were sent from two several places of the East Indies; they both differ much from our Hemp, although they seem to differ most as to their magnitude."—Dr. Hans Sloane to Mr. Ray, in Ray's Correspondence, 1848, p. 160.

1711. "Bang has likewise its Vertues attributed to it; for being used as Tea, it inebriates, or exhilarates them according to the Quantity they take."—Lockyer, 61.

1727. "Before they engage in a Fight, they drink Bang, which is made of a Seed like Hemp-seed, that has an intoxicating Quality."—A. Ham., i. 131.

1763. "Most of the troops, as is customary during the agitations of this festival, had eaten plentifully of bang . . ."—Orme, i. 194.

1784. ". . . it does not appear that the use of bank, an intoxicating weed which resembles the hemp in Europe, . . . is considered even by the most rigid (Hindoo) a breach of the law."—G. Forster, Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 291.

1789. "A shop of Bang may be kept with a capital of no more than two shillings, or one rupee. It is only some mats stretched under some tree, where the Bangeras of the town, that is, the vilest of mankind, assemble to drink Bang."—Note on Seir Mutaglerin, iii. 308.

"The Hemp—with which we used to hang Our prison pets, yon felon gang,—
In Eastern climes produces Bang, Esteemed a drug divine.
As Hashish dressed, its magic powers
Can lap us in Elysian bowers;
But sweeter far our social hours,
O'er a flask of rosy wine."

Lord Neaves.

Banged — is also used as a participle, for 'stimulated by bang,' e.g. "banged up to the eyes."

Bangle, s. Hind. bangrī or bangrī. The original word properly means a ring of coloured glass worn on the wrist by women; but bangle is applied to any native ring-bracelet, and also to an anklet, or ring of any kind worn on the ankle or leg. Indian silver bangles on the wrist have recently come into common use among English girls.

1803. "To the cutwahl he gave a heavy pair of gold bangles, of which he considerably enhanced the value by putting them on his wrists with his own hands."—Journal of Sir J. Nicholas, in note to Wellington Despatches, ed. 1837, ii. 373.

1809. "Bangles, or bracelets."—Maria Graham, 13.

1810. "Some wear . . . a stout silver ornament of the ring kind, called a bangle, or karrah [karā] on either wrist."—Williamson, V. M. i. 305.

1826. "I am paid with the silver bangles of my enemy, and his cash to boot."—Pandurang Hari, 27.

1873. "Year after year he found some excuse for coming up to Sirmoori—now a proposal for a tax on bangles, now a scheme for a new mode of Hindustani pronunciation."—The True Reformer, i. 24.

Bangun, s.—See Brinjaul.

Bangur, s. Hind. bāṅgar. In Upper India this name is given to the higher parts of the plain country on which the towns stand,—the older alluvium—in contradistinction to the khādar or lower alluvial immediately bordering the great rivers, and forming the limit of their inundation and modern divagations; the khādar having been cut out from the bāṅgar by the river. Medlicott spells bhāṅgar (Manual of Geol. of India, i. 404).

Bangy, Banghy, &c. s. Hind. ba-haṅgī, Mahr. baṅgī; Skt. vihaṅgamā, and vihaṅgikā.

a. A shoulder-yoke for carrying loads, the yoke or bangy resting on the shoulder, whilst the load is apportioned at either end in two equal weights, and generally hung by cords. The milkmaid's yoke is the nearest approach to a survival of the bangy-staff in England. Also such a yoke with its pair of baskets or boxes.—(See Pitarra.)

b. Hence a parcel post, carried originally in this way, was called bangy or dawk-bangy, even where the primitive mode of transport had long become obsolete. "A bangy parcel" is a parcel received or sent by such post.

c. 1844. "I will forward with this by bangy dāk, a copy of Capt. Moresby's Survey of the Red Sea." . . . Sir G. Arthur, in Ind. Adm'n. of Lord Ellenborough, p. 221.

1873. "The officers of his regiment . . . subscribed to buy the young people a set of crockery, and a plated tea and coffee service (got up by dawk banghee . . . at not much more than 200 per cent. in advance of the English price)."—The True Reformer, i. 57.

Banjo, s. Though this is a West- and not East-Indian term, it may be worth while to introduce the following older form of the word:

"Permit thy slaves to lead the choral dance
To the wild banshaw's melancholy sound."—Grainger, iv.

See also Davies, for example of banjore.

b. The office of a Harbour Master or other Port Authority.

In the former sense the word is still used in S. India; in Bengal the latter is the only sense recognised, at least among Anglo-Indians; in Northern India the word is not in use.

As the Calcutta Office stands on the banks of the Hoogly, the name is, we believe, often accepted as having some indefinite reference to this position. And in a late work we find a positive and plausible, but entirely unfounded, explanation of this kind, which we quote below.

In Java the word has a specific application to the open hall of audience, supported by wooden pillars without walls, which forms part of every princely residence.

The word is used in Sea Hindustani, in the forms bansār, and bangsāl for a 'store-room' (Roebuck).

Bankshall is in fact one of the oldest of the words taken up by foreign traders to India. And its use not only by Correa (c. 1561) but by King John (1524), with the regularly formed Portuguese plural of words in -al, shows how early it was adopted by the Portuguese. Indeed, Correa does not even explain it, as is his usual practice with Indian terms. More than one serious etymology has been suggested:

(1). Crawford takes it to be the Malay word bangsal, defined by him in his Malay dictionary thus: "(J.) A shed; a storehouse; a workshop; a porch; a covered passage" (see J. Ind. Archip. iv. 182). But it is probable that the Malay word, though marked by Crawford ("J.") as Javanese in origin, is a corruption of one of the two following:

(3). Sansk. bhāṇḍaśāla, Canar. bhaṇḍasāle, Malayāl. paṇḍiśāla, Tam. paṇḍasālai or paṇḍakaśālai, 'a storehouse or magazine.'

It is difficult to decide which of the two last is the original word; the prevalence of the second in S. India is an argument in its favour; and the substitution of g for ḍ would be in accordance with a phonetic practice of not uncommon occurrence.

c. 1345. "For the bandar there is in every island (of the Maldives) a wooden building which they call bajansār [evidently for banjasār, i.e. Arabic spelling for banjasār] where the Governor . . . collects all the goods, and there sells or barter them."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 120.

1524. A grant from K. John to the City of Goa, says: "that henceforward even if no market-rent in the city is collected from the bacacés, viz. those at which are sold honey, oil, butter, betre (i. e. betel), spices, and cloths, for permission to sell such things in the said bacacés, it is our pleasure that they shall sell them freely."

A note says: "Apparently the word should be bacaçaes, or bancacacae, or bangaçae, which then signified any place to sell things, but now particularly a wooden house."—Archiv. Portug. Or. Fasc. ii. 43.

1561. . . . "In the bengaçaes, in which stand the goods ready for shipment."—Correa, Lendas, i. 2, 260.

1610. The form and use of the word have led P. Teixeira into a curious confusion (as it would seem) when, speaking of foreigners at Ormus, he says: "hay muchos gentiles, Baneanes, Bangasaly, y Camabayats,"—where the word in italics probably represents Bangaly, i.e. Bengâlis (Rel. de Harmuz, 18).

c. 1610. "Le facteur du Roy chrestien des Maldives tenoit sa banquesalle ou plustost cellier, sur le bord de la mer en l'isle de Malé."—Pyrard de la Val., ed. 1679, i. 65.

1613. "The other settlement of Yler . . . with houses of wood thatched extends . . . to the fields of Tanjonpacer, where there is a bangasal or sentry's house without other defense."—Godinho de Eredia, 6.

1734-5. "Paid the Bankshall Merchants for the house poles, country reapers [q.v.], &c., necessary for house-building."—In Wheeler, iii. 148.

1748. "A little below the town of Wampo . . . These people (compradores) build a house for each ship. . . . They are called by us bank-salls. In these we deposit the rigging and yards of the vessel, chests, water-casks, and every thing that incommodes us aboard."—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748 (1762), p. 294.

It appears from this book (p. 118) that the place in Canton River was known as Bank-sall Island.

1750-52. "One of the first things on arriving here (Canton River) is to procure a baneshall, that is, a great house, constructed of bamboo and mats . . . in which the stores of the ship are laid up."—A Voyage, &c., by Olof Toræen . . . in a series of letters to Dr. Linnæus. Transl. by J. R. Forster (with Osbeck's Voyage), 1771.

1783. "These people (Chulias, &c., from India, at Achin) . . . on their arrival immediately build, by contract with the natives, houses of bamboo, like what in China at Wampo is called bankshall, very regular, on a convenient spot close to the river."—Forrest, V. to Mergu, 41.

1687. "The Mayor and Aldermen, etc., do humbly request the Honourable President and Council would please to grant and assign over to the Corporation the petty dues of Bankshall Tolls."—In Wheeler, i. 207.

1727. "Above it is the Dutch Bankshall, a Place where their Ships ride when they cannot get further up for the too swift Currents."—A. Hamilton, ii. 6.

1789. "And that no one may plead ignorance of this order, it is hereby directed that it be placed constantly in view at the Bankshall in the English and country languages."—Procl. against Slave-Trading, in Seton-Karr, ii. 5.

1788. "The term 'Banksoll' has always been a puzzle to the English in India. It is borrowed from the Dutch. The 'Soll' is the Dutch or Danish 'Zoll,' the English 'Toll.' The Banksoll was then the place on the 'bank' where all tolls or duties were levied on landing goods."—Talboys Wheeler, Early Records of B. India, 196.

(Quite erroneous, as already said; and Zoll is not Dutch).

Bantam, n.p. The province which forms the western extremity of Java, properly Bāntan. It formed an independent kingdom at the beginning of the 17th century, and then produced much pepper (no longer grown), which caused it to be greatly frequented by European traders. An English factory was established here in 1603, and continued till 1682, when the Dutch succeeded in expelling us as interlopers.

1727. "The only Product of Bantam is Pepper, wherein it abounds so much, that they can export 10,000 Tuns per annum."—A. Hamilton, ii. 127.

Bantam Fowls. According to Crawford, the dwarf poultry which we call by this name were imported from Japan, and received the name "not from the place that produced them, but from that where our voyagers first found them."—(Desc. Dict. s.v. Bantam).

1673. "From Siam are brought hither little Champore Cocks with ruffled Feet, well armed with Spurs, which have a strutting Gate with them, the truest mettle in the World."—Fryer, 116.

This looks as if they came from Champa (q. v.).

(1) Banyan, s. a. A Hindu trader, and especially of the Province of Guzerat, many of which class have for ages been settled in Arabian ports and known by this name; but the term is often applied by early travellers in Western India to persons of the Hindu Religion generally. b. In Calcutta also it is (or perhaps rather was) specifically applied to the native brokers attached to houses of business, or to persons in the employment of a private gentleman doing analogous duties (now usually called sircar, q. v.).

The word was adopted from Vāṇiya, a man of the trading caste (in Gujarātī vāṇiyo), and that comes from Sansk. vaṇij, 'a merchant.' The terminal nasal may be a Portuguese addition (as in palanquin, mandarin, Bassein), or may be taken from the plural form vāṇiyan. It is probable however, that the Portuguese found the word already in use by the Arab traders. Sidi 'Ali, the Turkish Admiral, uses it precisely in the same form, applying it to the Hindus generally; and in the poem of Sassui and Panhu, the Sindian Romeo and Juliet, as given by Burton in his Sindh (p. 101), we have the form Wāṇiyan. P. F. Vincenzo Maria, who is quoted below, absurdly alleges that the Portuguese called these Hindus of Guzerat Bag-nani, because they were always washing themselves "... chiamati da Portughesi Bagnani, per la frequenza e superstitione, con quale si lauano più volte il giorno" (251). See also Lullier, below. The men of this class profess an extravagant respect for animal life; but after Stanley brought home Dr. Livingstone's letters they became notorious as chief promoters of slave-trade in Eastern Africa. A. K.

Forbes speaks of the medieval Wānias at the Court of Anhilwara as "equally gallant in the field (with Rajputs), and wiser in council . . . already in profession puritans of peace, but not yet drained enough of their fiery Kshatri blood."—(Ras Mūla, i. 240.)

Bunya is the form in which vāṇiya appears in the Anglo-Indian use of Bengal with a different shade of meaning, and generally indicating a grain-dealer.

1516. "There are three qualities of these Gentiles, that is to say, some are called Razbuts . . . others are called Banians, and are merchants and traders."—Barbosa, 51.

1552. "... Among whom came certain men who are called Baneanes of the same heathen of the Kingdom of Cambaia . . . coming on board the ship of Vasco da Gama, and seeing in his cabin a pictorial image of Our Lady, to which our people did reverence, they also made adoration with much more fervency. . . ."—Barros, Dec. I. liv. iv. cap. 6.

1555. "We may mention that the inhabitants of Guzerat call the unbelievers Banyāns, whilst the inhabitants of Hindustan call them Hindū."—Sidi 'Ali Kapudān, in J. As., 1<sup>re</sup> S. ix. 197—8.

1563. "R. If the fruits were all as good as this (mango) it would be no such great matter in the Baneanes, as you tell me, not to eat flesh. And since I touch on this matter tell me, prithee, who are these Baneanes . . . who do not eat flesh? . . ."—Garcia, f. 136.

1608. "The Gouverneur of the Towne of Gandeeue is a Bannyan, and one of those kind of people that observe the Law of Pythagoras."—Jones in Purchas, i. 231.

1623. "One of these races of Indians is that of those which call themselves Vaniā, but who are called, somewhat corruptly by the Portuguese, and by all our other Franks, Banians; they are all, for the most part, traders and brokers."—P. della Valle, i. 486—7.

1630. "A people presented themselves to mine eyes, clothed in linnen garments, somewhat low descending, of a gesture and garbe, as I may say, maidenly and well nigh effeminate; of a countenance shy, and somewhat estranged; yet smiling out a glosed and bashful familiarity. . . . I asked what manner of people these were, so strangely notable, and notably strange? Reply was made they were Banians."—Lord, Preface.

c. 1666. "Aussi chacun a son Banien dans les Indes, et il y a des personnes de qualité qui leur confient tout ce qu'ils ont . . ."—Thevenot, v. 166.

This passage shows in anticipation the transition to the Calcutta use (b, below).

1672. "It is the custom to say that to make one Bagnan (so they call the Gentle Merchants) you need three Chinese, and to make one Chinese three Hebrews."—P. F. Vincenzo di Maria, 114.

1673. "The Banyan follows the Soldier, though as contrary in Humour, as the Antipodes in the same Meridian are opposite to one another. . . . In Cases of Trade they are not so hide-bound, giving their Consciences more Scope, and boggle at no Villainy for an Emolument."—Fryer, 193.

1705. ". . . ceux des premieres castes, comme les Baignans."—Lutther, 106.

1813. ". . . it will, I believe, be generally allowed by those who have dealt much with Banians and merchants in the larger trading towns of India, that their moral character cannot be held in high estimation."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 456.

1877. "Of the Wani, Banyan, or trader-caste there are five great families in this country."—Burton, Sind Revisited, ii. 281.

1761. "We expect and positively direct that if our servants employ Banians or black people under them, they shall be accountable for their conduct."—The Court of Directors, in Long, 254.

1764. "Resolutions and Orders. That no Moonshee, Linguist, Banian, or Writer, be allowed to any officer, excepting the Commander-in-Chief. . . ."—Ft. William Proceedings, in Long, 382.

1780. "We are informed that the Juty Wallahs or Makers and Vendors of Bengal Shoes in and about Calcutta . . . intend sending a Joint Petition to the Supreme Council . . . on account of the great decay of their Trade, entirely owing to the Luxury of the Bengalis, chiefly the Bangans (sic) and Sarcars, as there are scarce one of them to be found who does not keep a Chariot, Phaeton, Buggy or Pallanquin, and some all four. . . ."—In Hicky's Bengal Gazette, June 24th.

1783. "Mr. Hastings' bannian was, after this auction, found possessed of territories yielding a rent of £140,000 a year."—Burke, Speech on E. I. Bill, in Writings, &c., iii. 490.

1786. "The said Warren Hastings did permit and suffer his own banyan or principal black steward, named Canto Baboo, to hold farms . . . to the amount of 13 lacs of rupees per annum."—Art. agst. Hastings, Burke, vii. 111.

"A practice has gradually crept in among the Banians and other rich men of Calcutta, of dressing some of their servants . . . nearly in the uniform of the Honourable Company's Sepoys and Lascars. . . ."—Notification, in Seton Karr, i. 122.

1788. "Banyan—A Gentoo servant employed in the management of commercial affairs. Every English gentleman at Bengal has a Banyan who either acts of himself, or as the substitute of some great man or black merchant."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale).

1810. "The same person frequently was banyan to several European gentlemen; all of whose concerns were of course accurately known to him, and thus became the subject of conversation at those meetings the banians of Calcutta invariably held. . . ."—Williamson, V. M. i. 189.

1817. "The European functionary . . . has first his banyan or native secretary."—Mill, Hist. (ed. 1840) iii. 14.

Mr. Mill does not here accurately interpret the word.

(2) Banyan, s. An undershirt, originally of muslin, and so-called as resembling the body garment of the Hindus; but now commonly applied to under body-clothing of elastic cotton, woollen, or silk web.

The following quotations illustrate the stages by which the word reached its present application. And they show that our predecessors in India used to adopt the native or Banyan costume in their hours of ease. C. P. Brown defines Banyan as "a loose dressing-gown, such as Hindu tradesmen wear." Probably this may have been the original use; but it is never now so employed in Northern India.

1672. "It is likewise ordered that both Officers and Souldiers in the Fort shall, both on every Sabbath Day, and on every day when they exercise, wear English apparel; in respect the garbe is most becoming as Souldiers, and correspondent to their profession."—Sir W. Langhorne's Standing Order, in Wheeler, iii. 426.

1781. "The Ensign (as it proved, for his first appearance, being undressed and in his banyon coat, I did not know him) came off from his cot, and in a very haughty manner cried out, 'None of your disturbance, Gentlemen.'"—In Wheeler, iii. 109.

1781. "I am an Old Stager in this Country, having arrived in Calcutta in the Year 1736 . . . Those were the days, when Gentlemen studied Ease instead of Fashion; when even the Hon. Members of the Council met in Banyan Shirts, Long Drawers (q.v.), and Conjee caps; with a Case Bottle of good old Arrack, and a Gouglet of Water placed on the Table, which the Secretary (a Skilful Hand) frequently converted into Punch. . . ."—Letter from An Old Country Captain, in India Gazette, Feb. 24th.

1810. ". . . an undershirt, commonly called a banian."—Williamson, V. M. i. 19

(3) Banyan, s. See Banyan Tree.

Banyan-Day, s. This is sea-slang for a jour maigre, or day on which no ration of meat was allowed; when (as one of our quotations above expresses it) the crew had "to observe the Law of Pythagoras."

1690. "Of this (Kitchery or Kedgeree, q. v.) the European Sailors feed in these parts once or twice a Week, and are forc'd at those times to a Pagan Abstinence from Flesh, which creates in them a perfect Dislike and utter Detestation to those Bannian Days, as they commonly call them."—Orvington, 310, 311.

Banyan-Fight, s. Thus:

1690. "This Tongue Tempest is termed there a Bannian-Fight, for it never rises to blows or bloodshed."—Orvington, 275.

Sir G. Birdwood tells us that this is still a phrase current in Bombay.

Banyan-Tree, also elliptically Banyan, s. The Indian Fig-Tree (Ficus indica, or Ficus bengalensis, L.) called in Hind. bar. The name appears to have been first bestowed popularly on a famous tree of this species growing near Gombroon (q. v.), under which the Banyans, or Hindu traders settled at that port, had built a little pagoda. So says Tavernier below. This original Banyan-tree is described by Della Valle (ii. 453), and by Valentijn (v. 202). Della Valle's account (1622) is extremely interesting, but too long for quotation. He calls it by the Persian name, lul. The tree still stood, within half-a-mile of the English factory, in 1758, when it was visited by Ives, who quotes Tickell's verses given below.

c. A.D. 70. "First and foremost, there is a Fig-tree there (in India) which beareth very small and slender figges. The propertie of this Tree, is to plant and set it selfe without mans helpe. For it spreadeth out with mightie armes, and the lowest water-boughes underneath, do bend so downward to the very earth, that they touch it againe, and lie upon it: whereby, within one years space they will take fast root in the ground, and put forth a new Spring round about the Mother-tree: so as these braunches, thus growing, seeme like a traile or border of arbours most curiously and artificially made," etc.—Plinius Nat. Historie, by Philemon Holland, i. 360.

"... The goodly bole being got To certain cubits' height, from every side The boughs decline, which, taking root afresh, Spring up new boles, and these spring new, and newer, Till the whole tree become a porticus, Or arched arbour, able to receive A numerous troop."

c. 1650. "Cet Arbre estoit de même espece que celui qui est a une lieue du Bander, et qui passe pour une merveille; mais dans les Indes il y en a quantité. Les Persans l'appellent Lul, les Portugais Arbre de Reys, et les Français l'Arbre des Banianes; parce que les Banianes ont fait bâtir dessous une Pagode avec un carvansera accompagné de plusieurs petits étangs pour se laver."—Tavernier, V. de Perse, liv. v. ch. 23.

c. 1650. "Near to the City of Ormus was a Bannians tree, being the only tree that grew in the Island."—Tavernier, Eng. Tr. i. 255.

c. 1666. "Nous vîmes à cent ou cent cinquante pas de ce jardin, l'arbre War dans toute son étendue. On l'appelle aussi Bar, et arbre des Banians, et arbre des racines . . ."—Thevenot, v. 76.

"The fig-tree, not that kind for fruit renowned;

But such as at this day, to Indians known, In Malabar or Decan spreads her arms Branching so broad and long, that in the ground

The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow

About the mother-tree, a pillar'd shade High over-arch'd, and echoing walks between."—Paradise Lost, ix.

1672. "Eastward of Surat two Courses, i.e. a League, we pitched our Tent under a Tree that besides its Leafs, the Branches bear its own Roots, therefore called by the Portugals, Arbor de Raiz; For the Adoration the Banyans pay it, the Banyan-Tree."—Fryer, 105.

1691. "About a (Dutch) mile from Gamron . . . stands a tree, heretofore described by Mandelslo and others. . . . Beside this tree is an idol temple where the Banyans do their worship."—Valentijn, v. 267-8.

"The fair descendants of thy sacred bed Wide-branching o'er the Western World shall spread,

Like the fam'd Banian Tree, whose pliant shoot

To earthward bending of itself takes root, Till like their mother plant ten thousand stand

In verdant arches on the fertile land; Beneath her shade the tawny Indians rove,

Or hunt at large through the wide-echoing grove."

1726. "On the north side of the city (Surat) is there an uncommonly great Pichar or Waringin* tree. . . . The Portuguese call this tree Albero de laiz, i.e. Root-tree. . . . Under it is a small chapel built by a Benyan. . . . Day and night lamps are alight there, and Benyans constantly come in pilgrimage, to offer their prayers to this saint."—Valentijn, iv. 145.

1771. "... being employed to construct a military work at the fort of Trip-lasore (afterwards called Marsden's Bastion) it was necessary to cut down a banyan-tree, which so incensed the brahmans of that place, that they found means to poison him" (i.e. Thomas Marsden of the Madras Engineers).—Mem. of W. Marsden, 7-8.

1809. "Their greatest enemy (i.e. of buildings) is the Banyan Tree."—Ld. Valentia, I. 396.

"In the midst an aged Banian grew.
It was a goodly sight to see
That venerable tree,
For o'er the lawn, irregularly spread,
Fifty straight columns propt its lofty head;

And many a long depending shoot,

Seeking to strike its root,

Straight like a plummet grew towards the ground,

Some on the lower boughs which crost their way,

Fixing their bearded fibres, round and round,

With many a ring and wild contortion wound;

Some to the passing wind at times, with sway

Of gentle motion swung;

Others of younger growth, unmoved, were hung,

Like stone-drops from the cavern's fretted height."

"Des banians touffus, par les brames adorés,
Depuis longtemps la langueur nous im-plore,

Courbés par le midi, dont l'ardeur les dévore,

Ils étendent vers nous leurs rameaux altérés."

Casimir Delavigne, Le Paria, iii. 6.

A note of the publishers on the preceding passage, in the edition of 1855, is divert-ing:

"Un journaliste allemand a accusé M. Casimir Delavigne d'avoir pris pour un arbre une secte religieuse de l'Inde. . . ." The German Journalist was wrong here, but he might have found plenty of matter for ridicule in the play. Thus the Brahmins (men) are Akebar (!), Idamore (!!), and Emp-sael (!!!); their women Neala (?), Zaide (!), and Mirza (!!).

1825. "Near this village was the finest banyan-tree which I had ever seen, literally a grove rising from a single primary stem, whose massive secondary trunks, with their straightness, orderly arrangement, and evident connexion with the parent stock, gave the general effect of a vast vegetable organ. The first impression which I felt on coming under its shade was, 'What a noble place of worship.'"—Heber, ii. 93 (ed. 1844).

seed-grain that cannot die; unnoticed to-day, it will be found flourishing as a banyan-grove—(perhaps alas! as a hemlock forest) after a thousand years."—Sartor Resartus.

"... Its pendent branches, rooting in the air,

Yearn to the parent earth and grappling fast,

Grow up huge stems again, which shoot-ing forth

In massy branches, these again despatch their drooping heralds, till a labyrinth

Of root and stem and branch commingling, forms

A great cathedral, aisled and choired in wood."

The Banyan Tree, a Poem.

1865. "A family tends to multiply families around it, till it becomes the centre of a tribe, just as the banyan tends to surround itself with a forest of its own offspring."—MacLennan, Primitive Marriage, 269.

1878. . . . "des banyans soutenus par des racines aériennes et dont les branches tombantes engendrent en touchant terre des sujets nouveaux."—Rev. des Deux Mondes, Oct. 15, p. 832.

Bārasinhā, s. The H. name of the widely spread Cervus Wallichii, Cuvier. This H. name ("12-horn") is no doubt taken from the number of tines being approximately twelve. The name is also applied by sportsmen in Bengal to the Rucervus Duvaucellii, or Swamp-Deer.

Barbican, s. This term of medieval fortification is derived by Littré, and by Marcel Devic from Arab. barbakh, which means a sewer-pipe or water-pipe. And one of the meanings given by Littré is, "une ouverture longue et étroite pour l'écoulement des eaux." Apart from the possible, but untraced history which this alleged meaning may involve, it seems probable, considering the usual meaning of the word as 'an outwork before a gate,' that it is from Ar. Pers. bāb-khāna, 'gate-house.' This etymology was suggested in print 30 years ago by one of the present writers,* and confirmed to his mind some years later, when in going through the native town of Cawnpore, not long before the Mutiny, he saw a brand-new double-towered gateway, or gate-house, on the face of which was the inscription in Persian characters: "Bāb-Khāna-i-Mahommed Bakhsh," or whatever was his name, i.e. "The Barbican of Mahommed Bakhsh."

* In a Glossary of Military Terms, appended to Fortification for Officers of the Army and Students of Military History, Edinburgh, Blackwood, 1851.

The editor of the Chron. of K. James of Aragon (1883, p. 423) says that barbacana in Spain means a second, outermost and lower wall; i.e. a faussebraye. And this agrees with facts in that work, and with the definition in Cobarruvias; but not at all with Joinville's use, nor with V.-le-Duc's explanation.

"Tuit le baron . . s'accorderent queen un terture . . . féist l'en une forteresse qui fust bien garnie de gent, si que se li Tur fesoient saillies . . cell tore fust ainsi come barbaque (orig. 'quasi antemurale') de l'oste."—The Med. Fr. tr. of William of Tyre, ed. Paul Paris, i. 158.

c. 1270. ". . . on condition of his at once putting me in possession of the albarrana tower . . . and should besides make his Saracens construct a barbacana round the tower."—James of Aragon, as above.

1552. "Lourenço de Brito ordered an intrenchment of great strength to be dug, in the fashion of a barbican (barbacã) outside the wall of the fort . . . on account of a well, a stone-cast distant. . ."—Barros, II. i. 5.

c. 1870. "Barbacane. Défense extérieure protégeant une entrée, et permettant de réunir un assez grand nombre d'hommes pour disposer des sorties ou protéger une retraite."—Viollet-le-Duc, H. d'une Forteresse, 361.

Barbiers, s. This is a term which was formerly very current in the East as the name of a kind of paralysis, often occasioned by exposure to chills. It began with numbness and imperfect command of the power of movement, sometimes also affecting the muscles of the neck and power of articulation, and often followed by loss of appetite, emaciation and death. It has often been identified with beri-beri (q.v.), and medical opinion seems to have come back to the view that the two are forms of one disorder, though this was not admitted by some older authors of the present century. The allegation of Lind and others, that the most frequent subjects of barbiers were Europeans of the lower class who, when in drink, went to sleep in the open air, must be contrasted with the general experience that beriberi rarely attacks Europeans. The name now seems obsolete.

1673. "Whence follows Fluxes, Dropsy, Scurvy, Barbiers (which is an enervating (sic) the whole Body, being neither able to use hands or Feet), Gout, Stone, Malignant and Putrid Fevers."—Fryer, 68.

1690. "Another Distemper with which the Europeans are sometimes afflicted, is the Barbeers, or a deprivation of the Use and Activity of their Limbs, whereby they are rendered unable to move either Hand or Foot."—Ovington, 350.

1755. (If the land wind blow on a person sleeping) "the consequence of this is always dangerous, as it seldom fails to bring on a fit of the Barbiers (as it is called in this country), that is, a total deprivation of the use of the limbs."—Ives, 77.

1768. "The barbiers, a species of the palsy, is a disease most frequent in India. It distresses chiefly the lower class of Europeans, who when intoxicated with liquors frequently sleep in the open air, exposed to the land winds."—Lind on Diseases of Hot Climates, 260. See Beriberi.

Bargeer, s. Hind. from Pers. bārgīr. A trooper of irregular cavalry who is not the owner of his troop-horse and arms (as is the normal practice, see Silladar) but is either put in by another person, perhaps a native officer in the regiment, who supplies horses and arms and receives the man's full pay, allowing him a reduced rate, or has his horse from the state in whose service he is. The Pers. word properly means 'a load-taker,' 'a baggage horse'; the transfer of use is not quite clear.

1844. "If the man again has not the cash to purchase a horse, he rides one belonging to a native officer, or to some privileged person, and becomes what is called his bargeer . . ."—Calcutta Rev., vol. ii. p. 57.

Barking-Deer, s. The popular name of a small species of deer (Cervulus aureus, Jerdon) called in Hindustani kāṅkar, and in Nepal ratwā. Also called Ribfuced-Deer, and in Bombay Baikree, q.v. Its common name is from its call, which is a kind of short bark, like that of a fox but louder, and may be heard in the jungles which it frequents, both by day and by night (Jerdon).

Baroda, n.p. Usually called by the Dutch and older English writers Brodera; proper name according to the Imp. Gazetteer, Wadodra. A large city of Guzerat which has been since 1732 the capital of the Mahratta dynasty of Guzerat, the Gaṅkṡārs (see Guicowar).

1552. In Barros, 'Cidade de Barodar,' IV. vi. 8.

1555. "In a few days we arrived at Barāj; some days afterwards at Baloudra, and then took the road towards Champaiz (read Champarū?)."—Sūdī 'Alī, p. 91.

1606. "That city (Champanel) may be a day's journey from Deberadora or Barodar, which we commonly call Verdora."—Couto, IV., ix. 5.

1813. Brodera, in Forbes, Or. Mem., iii. 268.

1857. "The town of Baroda, originally Barpatra (or a bar leaf, i.e., leaf of the Ficus indica, in shape) was the first large city I had seen."—Autob. of Lutfullah, 39.

Baros, n.p. A fort on the West Coast of Sumatra, from which the chief export of Sumatra camphor, so highly valued in China, long took place. It is perhaps identical with the Pan-šūr or Fanšūr of the middle ages, which gave its name to the Fanšūrī camphor, famous among Oriental writers, and which by the perpetuation of a misreading is often styled Kaīšūrī camphor, &c. (See Camphor, and Marco Polo, 2d ed. ii. 282, 285 seq.).

The place is called Barrowse in the E. I. Colonial papers, ii. 52, 153.

1727. "Baros is the next place that abounds in Gold, Camphire, and Benzoin, but admits of no foreign Commerce."—A. Ham, ii. 113.

Barrackpore, n.p. The auxiliary Cantonment of Calcutta, from which it is 15 m. distant, established in 1772. Here also is the country residence of the Governor-General, built by Lord Minto, and much frequented in former days before the annual migration to Simla was established. The name is a hybrid. See Achanock.

Bashaw, s. The old form of what we now call pasha, the former being taken from bāshā the Arabic form of the word, which is itself generally believed to be a corruption of the Pers. pādīshāh. Of this the first part is Skt. patīs, Zend. patīs, Old Pers. patī, 'a lord or master' (comp. Gr. δεσποτης). Pechah, indeed, for 'Governor' (but with the ch guttural) occurs in I. Kings, x. 15, II. Chron. ix. 14, and in Daniel iii. 2, 3, 27. Prof. Max Müller notices this, but it would seem merely as a curious coincidence.—(See Pusey on Daniel, 567).

c. 1610. "Un Bascha estoit venu en sa Cour pour luy rendre compte du tribut qu'il luy apportoit; mais il fut neuf mois entiers à attendre que celui qui a la charge . . . eut le temps et le loisir de le compter . . ."—Pyrard de la Val (of the Great Mogul), ii. 161.

1702. " . . . The most notorious injustice we have suffered from the Arabs of Muscat, and the Bashaw of Judda."—In Wheeler, ii. 7.

1727. "It (Bagdad) is now a prodigious large City, and the Seat of a Beglerbeg. . . The Bashaws of Bassora, Comera, and Musol (the ancient Nineveh) are subordinate to him."—A. Ham, i. 78.

Basin, s. H. besan. Pease-meal, generally made of gram (q. v.) and used, sometimes mixed with ground orange-peel or other aromatic substance, to cleanse the hair, or for other toilette purposes.

Bassadore, n.p. A town upon the island of Kishm in the Persian Gulf, which belonged in the 16th century to the Portuguese. The place was ceded to the British crown in 1817, though the claim seems now dormant. The real form of the name is according to Dr. Badger's transliterated map (in H. of Imāms, &c. of Omān) Bāsūdū.

1673. "At noon we came to Bassatu, an old ruined town of the Portugals, fronting Congo."—Fryer, 320.

Bassein, n.p. This is a corruption of three entirely different names, and is applied to various places remote from each other.

(1) Wasāi, an old port on the coast, 26 m. north of Bombay, called by the Portuguese, to whom it long pertained, Baçaim (e.g. Barros, I. ix. 1).

c. 1565. "Dopo Daman si troua Basain con molte ville . . . ne di questa altro si caua che risi, frumenti, e molto ligname."—Cesare de' Federici in Ramus. iii. 387 v.

1756. "Bandar Bassai."—Mīrat-i Ahmadi, Bird's tr., 129.

1781. "General Goddard after having taken the fortress of Bessi, which is one of the strongest and most important fortresses under the Mahratta power. . . ."—Seir Mutaqherin, iii. 327.

(2) A town and port on the river which forms the westernmost delta-arm of the Irawadi in the Province of Pegu. The Burmese name Bathein, was, according to Prof. Forchhammer, a change, made by the Burmese conqueror Alompra, from the former name Kuthein (i.e. Kusein), which was a native corruption of the old name Kusima (see Cosmin). We cannot explain the old European corruption Persaim.

1759. Persaim occurs in Dalrymple's Or. Repert., i. 127 and passim.

(3) Basim, or properly Wāsim; an old town in Berar, the chief place of a district so-called.

Batavia, n.p. The famous capital of the Dutch possessions in the Indies; occupying the site of the old city of Jakarta, the seat of a Javanese kingdom which combined the present Dutch Provinces of Bantam, Buitenzorg, Krawang, and the Preanger Regencies.

1619. "On the day of the capture of Jakarta, 30th May, 1619, it was certainly time and place to speak of the Governor-General's dissatisfaction that the name of Batavia had been given to the Castle."—Valentijn, iv. 489.

The Governor-General, Jan Pieter- sen Coen, who had taken Jakarta, desired to have called the new fortress New Hoorn, from his own birth place, Hoorn, on the Zuider Zee.

c. 1649. "While I stay'd at Batavia, my Brother dy'd; and it was pretty to consider what the Dutch made me pay for his Funeral."—Tavernier (E.T.) i. 203.

Batcul, Batcole, Batecala, &c., n.p. Bhatkal. A place often named in the older narratives. It is on the coast of Canara, just S. of Pigeon Island and Hog Island, in lat. 13° 59', and is not to be confounded (as it has been) with Beitcul, q.v.

1328. "... There is also the King of Batigala, but he is of the Saracens."—Friar Jordanus, p. 41.

1510. The "Bathecala, a very noble city of India," of Varthema (119), though misplaced, must we think be this place and not Beitcul.

1548. "Trelado* do Contrato que o Governador Gracia de Saa fez com a Raynha de Batecalaa por não aver Reey e ela reger o Reeyno."—In S. Botelho, Tombo, 242.

1599. "... part is subject to the Queene of Baticola, who selleth great store of pepper to the Portugals, at a towne called Onor. . ."—Sir Fulke Greville to Sir Fr. Walsingham, in Bruce's Annals, i. 125.

1618. "The fift of March we anchored at Batachala, shooting three Peeces to give notice of our arrival. . ."—Wm. Hore, in Purchas, i. 657. See also Sainsbury, ii. p. 374.

1727. "The next Sea-port, to the Southward of Onoar, is Batacola, which has the vestigia of a very large city. . ."—A. Ham, i. 282.

Batel, Batelo, Botella, s. A sort of boat used in Western India and Sind. Port. batell, a word which occurs in the Roteiro de V. da Gama, 91.

1838. "The Botella may be described as the Dow in miniature. . . It has invariably a square flat stern, and a long grab-like head."—Vaupell in Trans. Bo. Geog. Soc. vii. 98.

1857. "A Sindhi battēla, called Rahmatt, under the Tindal Kasim, laden with dry fish, was about to proceed to Bombay."—Lutfullah, 347.

See also Burton, Sind Revisited (1877), 32, 33.

Batta, s. Two different words are thus expressed in Anglo-Indian colloquial, and in a manner confounded.

a. Hind. bhata or bhātā. An extra allowance made to officers, soldiers, or other public servants, when in the field, or on other special grounds; also subsistence money to witnesses, prisoners and the like. Military Batta, originally an occasional allowance, as defined, grew to be a constant addition to the pay of officers in India, and constituted the chief part of the excess of Indian over English military emoluments. The question of the right to batta on several occasions created great agitation among the officers of the Indian army, and the measure of economy carried out by Lord William Bentinck when Governor-General (G. O. of the Gov.-Gen. in Council, 29th November, 1828) in the reduction of full batta to half batta, in the allowances received by all regimental officers serving at stations within a certain distance of the Presidency in Bengal (viz., Barrackpore, Dumdum, Berhampore, and Dinapore), caused an enduring bitterness against that upright ruler.

It is difficult to arrive at the origin of this word. There are however several Hindi words in rural use, such as bhāt, bhantū, 'advances made to ploughmen without interest,' and bhattā, bhanṭā, 'plough-men's wages in kind,' with which it is possibly connected. It has also been suggested that it may be allied to bahut, 'much, excess,' an idea entering into the meaning of both a and b.

It is just possible that the familiar military use of the term in India may have been influenced by the existence of the European military term bât or bât-money. The latter is from bât, a pack-saddle, and implies an allowance for carrying baggage in the field. It will be seen that one writer below seems to confound the two words.

b. Hind. Baṭṭa and Bāṭṭā. Agio, or difference in exchange, discount on coins not current, or of short weight.

We may notice that Sir H. Elliot does not recognise an absolute separation between the two senses of batta. His definition runs thus: "Difference of exchange; anything extra; an extra allowance; discount on uncurren, or short-weight coins; usually called Batta. The word has been supposed to be a corruption of Bharta, increase, but it is a pure Hindi vocable, and is more usually applied to discount than premium."—(Supp. Gloss. ii. 41.) It will be seen that we have early Portuguese instances of the word apparently in both senses.

The earliest quotation, which has been met with since what precedes was written, suggests the possibility that the word in its sense of extra pay has come down to us by oral tradition from the Portuguese, and that it may have originated in Can. batta, 'rice,' and was at first an allowance to native servants to provide their staple food. This might easily get mixt up with others of the suggested sources, involving a modification of sense.

1548. "And for 2 farazes (see ferash) 2 pardaos a month for the two and 4 tangas for bata." . . .—S. Botelho, Tombo, 233. The editor thinks this is for bate, i.e. paddy. But even if so it is used exactly like batta or maintenance money. A following entry has. "To the constable 38,920 reis a year, in which is comprised maintenance (manutenção)."

1707. "... that they would allow Batta or subsistence money to all that should desert us."—In Wheeler, ii. 63.

1765. "... orders were accordingly issued ... that on the 1st January, 1766, the double batta should cease. . . ."—Caraccioli's Clive, iv. 160.

1789. "... batta, or as it is termed in England, bât and forage money, which is here, in the field, almost double the peace allowance."—Munro's Narrative, p. 97.

1799. "He would rather live on half-pay, in a garrison that could boast of a fives court, than vegetate on full batta, where there was none."—Life of Sir T. Munro, i. 227.

1829. "To the Editor of the Bengal Hurkaru.—Sir,—Is it understood that the Wives and daughters of officers on half batta are included in the order to mourn for the Queen of Wirtemberg; or will half-mourning be considered sufficient for them?"—Letter in above, dated 15th April, 1829.

1857. "They have made me a K.C.B. I may confess to you that I would much rather have got a year's batta, because the latter would enable me to leave this country a year sooner."—Sir Hope Grant, in Incidents of the Sepoy War.

1554. "And gold, if of 10 mates or 24 carats, is worth 10 cruzados the tael . . . if of 9 mates, 9 cruzados; and according to whatever the mates may be it is valued; but moreover it has its batao, i.e. its shroffage (carraçagem) or agio (carbo) varying with the season."—A. Nunes, 40.

1810. "... He immediately tells master that the batta, i.e., the exchange, is altered."—Williamson, V. M. i. 203.

Battas, Bataks, &c. n. p. A nation of Sumatra, noted especially for their singular cannibal institutions, combined with the possession of a written character of their own and some approach to literature.

c. 1430. "In ejus insulæ, quam dicunt Bathech, parte, anthropophagi habitant . . . capita humana in thesauris habent, quæ ex hostibus captis abscessa, eis carnibus recondunt, iisque utuntur pro nummis."—Conti in Poggius, De Var. Fort. lib. iv.

c. 1539. "This Embassador, that was Brother-in-law to the King of Battas . . . brought him a rich Present of Wood of Aloes, Calambaa, and five quintals of Benjamon in flowers."—Cogan's Pinto, 15.

c. 1555. "This Island of Sumatra is the first land wherein we know man's flesh to be eaten by certaine people which live in the mountains, called Bacas (read Batas), who vse to glide their teethe."—Galvano, Discoveries of the World (Hak. Soc.), 108.

1613. "In the woods of the interior dwelt Anthropophagi, eaters of human flesh . . . and to the present day continues that abuse and evil custom among the Battas of Sumatra."—Godinho de Eredia, f. 23v.

Bawustye, s. Corrupt. of bobstay in Lascar dialect (Roebuck).

Bay, The, n. p. In the language of the old Company and its servants in the 17th century, The Bay meant the Bay of Bengal and their factories in that quarter.

1683. "And the Councill of the Bay is as expressly distinguished from the Councill of Hugly, over which they have noe such power."—In Hedges, under Sept. 24.

Bayá, s. H. búiā, the Weaver-bird, as it is called in books of Nat. Hist., Ploceus baya, Blyth (Fam. Fringillidae). This clever little bird is not only in its natural state the builder of those remarkable pendent nests which are such striking objects, hanging from eaves or palm-branches; but it is also docile to a singular degree in domestication, and is often exhibited by itinerant natives as the performer of the most delightful tricks, as we have seen, and as is detailed in a paper of Mr. Blyth's quoted by Jerdon. "The usual procedure is, when ladies are present, for the bird on a sign from its master to take a cardamom or sweetmeat in its bill, and deposit it between a lady's lips . . . A miniature cannon is then brought, which the bird loads with coarse grains of powder one by one . . . it next seizes and skilfully uses a small ramrod: and then takes a lighted match from its master, which it applies to the touch-hole." Another common performance is to scatter small beads on a sheet; the bird is furnished with a needle and thread, and proceeds in the prettiest way to thread the beads successively.

1790. "The young Hindu women of Banáras . . . wear very thin plates of gold, called tica's, slightly fixed by way of ornament between the eyebrows; and when they pass through the streets, it is not uncommon for the youthful libertines, who amuse themselves with training Bayá's, to give them a sign, which they understand, and send them to pluck the pieces of gold from the foreheads of their mistresses."—Asiat. Researches, ii. 110.

Bayadère, s. A Hindu dancing-girl. This word is especially used by French writers, from whom it has been sometimes borrowed as if it were a genuine Indian word, particularly characteristic of the persons in question. The word is in fact only a Gallicized form of the Portuguese balladeira, from baillar, to dance.

Some 40 or 50 years ago there was a famous ballet called Le dieu et la bayadère, and under this title Punch made one of the most famous hits of his early days by presenting a cartoon of Lord Ellenborough as the Bayadère dancing before the idol of Somnath.

1526. "XLVII. The dancers and danceresses (bayladores e bayladeiras) who come to perform at a village shall first go and perform at the house of the principal man of the village" (Gancar, q.v.)—Foral de usos costumes dos Gancaves e Lavradores de esta Ilha de Goa, in Arch. Port. Or., fascic. 5, 132.

1598. "The heathenish whore called Balliadera, who is a dancer."—Linachoten, 74.

1599. "In hac icone primum proponitur Inda Balliadera, id est saltatrix, quae in publicis ludis alisque solennitatibus saltando spectaculum exhibet."—De Bry, Text to pl. xii. in vol. ii. (also see p. 90, and vol. vii. 26), &c.

1782. "Surate est renommé par ses Bayadères, dont le véritable nom est Dévédassi: celui de Bayadères que nous leur donnons, vient du mot Balladeiras, qui signifie en Portugais Danseuses."—Sonnerat, i. 7.

1794. "The name of Balliadere, we never heard applied to the dancing girls; or saw but in Kaynal, and 'War in Asia, by an Officer of Colonel Baillie's Detachment'; it is a corrupt Portuguese word.—Moor's Narrative of Little's Detachment, 356.

1825. "This was the first specimen I had seen of the southern Bayadère, who differ considerably from the nâch girls of northern India, being all in the service of different temples, for which they are purchased young."—Heber, ii. 180.

Bazaar, s. Hind. &c. From Pers. bāzār, a permanent market or street of shops. The word has spread westward into Arabic, Turkish, and, in special senses, into European languages, and eastward into India, where it has been generally adopted into the vernaculars. The popular pronunciation is bāzār. In S. India and Ceylon the word is used for a single shop or stall kept by a native. The word seems to have come to S. Europe very early. F. Balducci Pegolotti, in his Mercantile Handbook (c. 1340) gives bazarra as a Genoese word for 'market-place' (Cathay, &c. ii. 286). The word is adopted into Malay as pāsār.

1474. Ambrose Contarini writes of Kazan, that it is "walled like Como, and with bazars (bazzari) like it."—Ramusio, ii. f. 117.

1503. "... bazar, as much as to say the place where things are sold."—Garcia, f. 170.

1564. A privilege by Don Sebastian of Portugal gives authority "to sell garden produce freely in the bazars (bazares), markets, and streets (of Goa) without necessity for consent or license from the farmers of the garden produce, or from any other person whatsoever."—Arch. Port. Or., fasc. 2, 157.

c. 1566. "La Pescaria delle Perle . . .

si fa ogn' anno . . . e su la costa all' in contro piantano vna villa di case, e bazarri di paglia."—Cesare de' Federici, in Ram. iii. 390.

1606. "... The Christians of the Bazar."—Gouvea, 29.

1610. "En la Ville de Cananor il y a vn beau marché tous les jours, qu'ils appellent Basare."—Pyrard de la Val, i. 325.

1638. "We came into a Bussar, or very faire Market place."—W. Bruton, in Hakluyt, v. 50.

1666. "Les Bazards ou Marchés sont dans une grande rue qui est au pié de la montagne."—Thevenot, v. 13.

1672. "... Let us now pass the Pale to the Heathen Town (of Madras) only parted by a wide Parade, which is used for a Buzzar or Mercate-place."—Fryer, 38.

1837. "Lord, there is a honey bazar, repair thither."—Turnour's transl. of Mahavanso, 24.

1873. "This, remarked my handsome Greek friend from Vienna, is the finest wife-bazaar in this part of Europe . . . Go a little way east of this, say to Roumania, and you will find wife-bazaar completely undisguised, the ladies seated in their carriages, the youths filing by, and pausing before this or that beauty, to bargain with papa about the dower, under her very nose."—Fraser's Mag. N. S. vii. p. 617 (Vienna, by M. D. Conway).

Bdellium, s. This aromatic gum-resin has been identified with that of the Balsamodendron Mukul, Hooker, inhabiting the dry regions of Arabia and Western India; gugal of Western India, and mokl in Arabic, called in Pers. bo-i-jahūdān (Jews' scent). What the Hebrew bdōlah of the R. Phison was, which is rendered bdellium since the time of Josephus, remains very doubtful. Lassen has suggested musk as possible. But the argument is only this: that Dioscorides says some called bdellium mādēlkon; that mādēlkon perhaps represents Madālaka, and though there is no such Skt. word as madālaka there might be madāraka, because there is madāra, which means some perfume, no one knows what! (Ind. Alterth. i. 292).

c. A.D. 90. "In exchange are exported from Barbarice (Indus Delta) costus, bdella. . . ."—Periplus, ch. 39.

c. 1230. "Bdallyūn. A Greek word which, as some learned men think, means 'The Lion's Repose.' This plant is the same as mokl."—Ebn El-Baiḥār, i. 125.

1612. "Bdellium, the pund . . . xxs."—Rates and Valuations (Scotland), p. 298.

some note for native craft on the Rāmnād coast (Madura district) of the Gulf of Manar, Vadāulay in the Atlas of India. The proper name seems to be Vēdālar, by which it is mentioned in Bishop Caldwell's Hist. of Tinnevely (p. 235). The place was famous in the Portuguese History of India for a great victory gained there by Martin Affonso de Sousa (Capitão Mór do Mar) over a strong land and sea force of the Zamorin, commanded by a famous Mahomedan Captain, whom the Portuguese called Pate Marcar and the Tuhfat-al-Mujāhidin calls 'Alī Ibrāhīm Markār, 15th February, 1538. Barros styles it "one of the best fought battles that ever came off in India." This occurred under the viceroyalty of Nuno da Cunha, not of Stephen da Gama, as the allusions in Camões seem to intimate. Captain Burton has too hastily identified Beadala with a place on the coast of Malabar, a fact which has perhaps been the cause of this article (see Lusiads, Commentary, p. 477).

1552. "Martin Affonso, with this light fleet, on which he had not more than 400 soldiers, went round Cape Comorin, being aware that the enemy were at Beadala . . ."—Barros, Dec. IV., liv. viii. cap. 13.

c. 1570. "And about this time Aleē Ibrāhīm Murkar, and his brother-in-law Kunjee-Aleē-Murkar, sailed out with 22 grabs in the direction of Kael, and arriving off Bentalah, they landed, leaving their grabs at anchor . . . But destruction overtook them at the arrival of the Franks, who came upon them in their galliots, attacking and capturing all their grabs . . . Now this capture by the Franks took place in the latter part of the month of Shaban, in the year 944 [end of January, 1538]."—Tohfut-ul-Mujāhideen, tr. by Rowlandson, 141.

"E despois junto ao Cabo Comorim Huma façanha faz esclarecida,
A frota principal do Samorim,
Que destruir o mundo não duvida,
Vencerá co o furor do ferro e fogo;
Em si verá Beadala o martio jogo."

Camões, x. 65.

By Burton (but whose misconception of the locality has here affected his translation):

"then well nigh reached the Cape 'clept Comorin, another wreath of Fame by him is won;
the strongest squadron of the Samorim who doubted not to see the world undone, he shall destroy with rage of fire and steel: Be'adāla's self his martial yoke shall feel."

1814. "Vaidālai, a pretty populous village on the coast, situated 13 miles east of Mutupetta, inhabited chiefly by Musulmans and Shānārs, the former carrying on a wood trade."—Account of the Prov. of Ramnad, from Mackenzie Collections in J. R. As. Soc. iii. 170.

Bear-tree, Bair, &c. s. Hind. bēr (Skt. badara and vadara) Zizyphus jujuba, Lam. This is one of the most widely diffused trees in India, and is found wild from the Punjab to Burma, in all which region it is probably native. It is cultivated from Queensland and China to Morocco and Guinea. "Sir H. Elliot identifies it with the lotus of the ancients, but although the large juicy product of the garden Zizyphus is by no means bad, yet, as Madden quaintly remarks, one might eat any quantity of it without risk of forgetting home and friends."—(Punjab Plants, 43.)

1563. "O. The name in Canarese is bōr, and in the Decan bēr, and the Malays call them vidaras, and they are better than ours; yet not so good as those of Balagate . . . which are very tasty."—Garcia De O. 33.

Bearer, s. The word has two meanings in Anglo-Indian colloquial: a. A palankin-carrier; b. (In the Bengal Presidency), a domestic servant who has charge of his master's clothes, household furniture, and (often) of his ready money.

The word in the latter meaning has been regarded as distinct in origin, and is stated by Wilson to be a corruption of Bengali vehāra from Sansk. vyavahāri, a domestic servant. There seems however to be no historical evidence for such an origin, e.g. in any habitual use of the term vehāra, whilst as a matter of fact the domestic bearer (or sirdār bearer, as he is usually styled by his fellow-servants, often even when he has no one under him) was in Calcutta in the penultimate generation, when English gentlemen still kept palankins, usually just what this literally implies, viz., the head-man of a set of palankin-bearers. And throughout the Presidency the bearer, or valet, still, as a rule, belongs to the caste of ka-hārs (see kuhar), or palki-bearers.

c. 1760. ". . . . . The poles which . . . are carried by six, but most commonly four bearers."—Grose, i. 153.

1768-71. "Every house has likewise . . . one or two sets of berras, or palankeen-bearers."—Stavorinus, i. 523.

1778. "They came on foot, the town having neither horses nor palankin-bearers to carry them, and Colonel Coote received them at his head-quarters. . . ."—Orme, iii. 719.

1803. "I was . . . detained by the scarcity of bearers."—Lord Valentia, i. 372.

1782. ". . . imposition . . . that a gentleman should pay a rascal of a Sirdar Bearer monthly wages for 8 or 10 men . . . out of whom he gives 4, or may perhaps indulge his master with 5, to carry his palankeen."—India Gazette, Sept. 2.

c. 1815. "Henry and his Bearer."—(Title of a well-known book of Mrs. Sherwood's.)

1824. ". . . I called to my sirdar-bearer who was lying on the floor, outside the bed-room."—Seely, Ellora, ch. i.

1831. ". . . le grand maître de ma garde-robe, sirdar beehrah."—Jacquemont, Correspondance, i. 114.

1876. "My bearer who was to go with us (Eva's ayah had struck at the last moment and stopped behind) had literally girt up his loins, and was loading a diminutive mule with a miscellaneous assortment of brass pots and blankets."—A True Reformer, ch. iv.

Beebee, s. Hind. from Pers. bībī, a lady. On the principle of degradation of titles, which is so general, this word in application to European ladies has been superseded by the hybrids Mem-Sāhib, or Madam-Sāhib, though it is often applied by native servants to European maid-servants or other English women of that rank in life. The word also is sometimes applied to a prostitute. It is originally, it would seem, Oriental Turki. In Pavet de Courteille's Dict. we have "Bībī, dame, épouse légitime" (p. 181).

In W. India the word is said to be pronounced bobo (see Burton's Sind).

It is curious that among the Saka-lāva of Madagascar the wives of chiefs are termed biby; but there seems hardly a possibility of this having come from Persia or India. The word in Hova means 'animal.'—Sibree's Madagascar, p. 253.

1611. ". . . . the title Bibi . . . is in Persian the same as, among us, sennora, or doña."—Teixeira, Relacion . . . de Hormuz, 19.

c. 1786. "The word Lowndika, which means the son of a slave-girl, was also continually on the tongue of the Nawaub, and if he was angry with an one he called him by this name; but it was also used as an endearing fond appellation to which was attached great favour,* until, one day, Ali Zuman Khan . . . represented to him that the word was low, discreditable, and not fit for the use of men of knowledge and rank. The Nawaub smiled, and said, 'O friend, you and I are both the sons of slave women, and the two Husseins only (on whom be good wishes and Paradise!) are the sons of a Bibi.'—Hist. of Hydar Naik, tr. by Miles, 486.

Beech-de-Mer, s. The old trade way of writing and pronouncing the name, bicho-de-mar (borrowed from the Portuguese) of the sea-slug or holothuria, so highly valued in China. It is split, cleaned, dried, and then carried to the Straits for export to China, from the Maldives, the Gulf of Manar, and other parts of the Indian seas further east. The most complete account of the way in which this somewhat important article of commerce is prepared, will be found in the Tijdschrift voor Nederlandsch Indie, Jaarg. xvii. pt. i. See also Swallo and Tripang.

Beechmán, also Meechilmán, s. Sea-Hind. for 'midshipman' (Roe-buck).

Beegah, s. Hind. bighā. The most common Hindu measure of land-area, and varying much in different parts of India, whilst in every part that has a bighā there is also certain to be a pucka beegah and a kutchu beegah (vide cutchu and pucka), the latter being some fraction of the former. The beegah formerly adopted in the Revenue Survey of the N.W. Provinces, and in the Canal Department there, was one of 3025 sq. yards or  $\frac{5}{8}$  of an acre. This was apparently founded on Akbar's beegah, which contained 3600 sq. Ilāhi gaz, of about 33 inches each. But it is now in official returns superseded by the English acre.

1763. "I never seized a beega or beswa ( $\frac{5}{8}$  bighā) belonging to Calcutta, nor have I ever impressed your gomastahs."—Nawāb Kāsim 'Alī, in Glegg's Mem. of Hastings, i. 129.

* The "Bahadur" could hardly have read Don Quixote! But what a curious parallel presents itself! When Sancho is bragging of his daughter to the "Squire of the Wood," and takes umbrage at the free epithet which the said Squire applies to her (= laundika and more); the latter reminds him of the like term of apparent abuse (hardly reproducible here), with which the mob were wont to greet a champion in the bull-ring after a deft spear-thrust, meaning only the highest fondness and applause!—Part. ii. ch. 13.

1823. "A Begah has been computed at one-third of an acre, but its size differs in almost every province. The smallest Begah may perhaps be computed at one-third, and the largest at two-thirds of an acre."—Malcolm's Central India, ii. 15.

1877. "The Resident was gratified at the low rate of assessment, which was on the general average eleven annas or 1s. 4½d. per beegah, that for the Nizam's country being upwards of four rupees."—Meadows Taylor, Story of my Life, ii. 5.

Beegum, s. A Princess, a Mistress, a Lady of Rank; applied to Mahomedan ladies, and in the well-known case of the Beegum Sumroo to the professedly Christian (native) wife of a European. The word appears to be Or. Turki, bigam, a feminine formation from beg, 'chief, or lord,' like khānum from khān. Hence Pers. begam.

1787. "Among the charges (against Hastings) there is but one engaged, two at most—the Begum's to Sheridan; the Rannee of Goheed (Gohud) to Sir James Erskine. So please your palate."—Ed. Burke to Sir G. Elliot. L. of Ld. Minto, i. 119.

Beejoo, s. Or 'Indian badger,' as it is sometimes called, H. bijū, Mellivora indica, Jerdon. It is also often called in Upper India the Grave-digger, from a belief in its bad practices, probably unjust.

Beer, s. This liquor, imported from England, has been a favourite in India from an early date. Porter seems to have been common in last century, judging from the advertisements in the Calcutta Gazette; and the Pale Ale made, it is presumed, expressly for the India market, appears in the earliest years of that publication. That expression has long been disused in India, and beer, simply, has represented the thing. Hodgson's at the beginning of this century was the beer in almost universal use, replaced by Bass, and Allsopp, and of late years by a variety of other brands.

1690. (At Surat in the English Factory) . . . Europe Wines and English Beer, because of their former acquaintance with our Palates, are most coveted and most desirable Liquors, and tho' sold at high Rates, are yet purchased and drunk with pleasure."—Orington, 395.

1784. "London Porter and Pale Ale, light and excellent . . . 150 Sicca Rs. per hhd. . . ."—In Seaton-Karr, i. 39.

1810. "Porter, pale-ale and table-beer of Great strength, are often drank after meals."—Williamson, V. M. i. 122.

"What are the luxuries they boast them here?"

The lolling couch, the joys of bottled beer."

From 'The Cadet, a Poem in 6 parts, &c. by a late resident in the East.' This is a most lugubrious production, the author finding nothing to his taste in India. In this respect it reads something like a caricature of "Oakfield," without the noble character and sentiment of that book. As the Rev. Hobart Caunter, the author seems to have come to a less doleful view of things Indian, and for some years he wrote the letter-press of the "Oriental Annual."

Beer, Country. At present, at least in Upper India, this expression simply indicates ale made in India (see Country) as at Mastri, Kasauli, and Ootacamund Breweries. But it formerly was (and in Madras perhaps still is) applied to ginger-beer, or to a beverage described in some of the quotations below, which must have become obsolete early in this century. A drink of this nature called Sugar-beer was the ordinary drink at Batavia in the 17th century, and to its use some travellers ascribed the prevalent unhealthiness. This is probably what is described by Jacob Bontius in the first quotation:

1631. There is a recipe given for a beer of this kind, "not at all less good than Dutch beer. . . . Take a hooped cask of 30 amphorae (?), fill with pure river water; add 2lb. black Java sugar, 4oz. tamarinds, 3 lemons cut up, cork well and put in a cool place. After 14 hours it will boil as if on a fire," etc.—Hist. Nat. et Méd. Indice Orient., p. 8.

We doubt the result anticipated.

1789. "They use a pleasant kind of drink, called Country-beer, with their victuals; which is composed of toddy . . . porter, and brown-sugar; is of a brisk nature, but when cooled with saltpetre and water, becomes a very refreshing draught."—Munro, Narrative, 42.

1810. "A temporary beverage, suited to the very hot weather, and called Country-beer, is in rather general use, though water artificially cooled is commonly drunk during the repasts."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 122.

Beer-Drinking. Up to about 1850, and a little later, an ordinary exchange of courtesies at an Anglo-Indian dinner-table in the provinces, especially a mess-table, was to ask a guest, perhaps many yards distant, to "drink beer" with you; in imitation of the English custom of drinking wine together, which became obsolete somewhat earlier.

In Western India, when such an invitation was given at a mess-table, two tumblers, holding half a bottle each, were brought to the inviter, who carefully divided the bottle between the two, and then sent one to the guest whom he invited to drink with him.

1848. "'He aint got distangy manners dammy,' Bragg observed to his first mate; 'he wouldn't do at Government House, Roper, where his Lordship and Lady William was as kind to me . . . and asking me at dinner to take beer with him before the Commander-in-Chief himself . . .'"—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. xxii.

1853. "First one officer, and then another, asked him to drink beer at mess, as a kind of tacit suspension of hostilities."—Oakfield, ii. 52.

Beetlefakkee, n.p. "In some old Voyages coins used at Mocha are so called. The word is Bait-ul-fākhi, the 'Fruit-market,' the name of a bazar there." So C. P. Brown. The place is in fact the Coffee-mart of which Hodeida is the port, from which it is about 30 m. distant inland, and 4 marches north of Mocha. And the name is really Bait al-Fakih, 'The House of the Divine,' from the tomb of the Saint Ahmad Ibn Mūsā, which was the nucleus of the place. (See Ritter, xii. 872; see also Beetlefackie, Milburn, i. 96.)

1690. "Coffee . . . grows in abundance at Beetle-fuckee . . . and other parts."—Ovington, 465.

1710. "They daily bring down coffee from the mountains to Betelfaquy, which is not above 3 leagues off, where there is a market for it every day of the week."—(French) Voyage to Arabia the Happy, E. T., London, 1726, p. 99.

1770. "The tree that produces the Coffee grows in the territory of Betel-faqui, a town belonging to Yemen."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 352.

Begar, Bigarry, s. H. begārī, from Pers. begār, 'forced labour'; a person pressed to carry a load, or to do other work really or professedly for public service. In some provinces begār is the forced labour, and bigārī the pressed man; whilst in Karnāta, begārī is the performance of the lowest village offices without money payment, but with remuneration in grain or land (Wilson). C. P. Brown says the word is Canarese. But the Persian origin is hardly doubtful.

1554. "And to 4 begguaryns, who serve as water carriers to the Portuguese and others in the said intrenchment, 15 leals a day to each . . ."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 78.

1673. "Gocurn, whither I took a Pilgrimage, with one other of the Factors, Four Peons, and Two Biggereens, or Porters only."—Erwyer, 158.

1800. "The bygarry system is not bearable: it must be abolished entirely."—Wellington, i. 244.

1815. Aitchison's Indian Treaties, &c., contains under this year numerous sunnuds issued, in Nepal War, to Hill Chiefs, stipulating for attendance when required with "begarees and sepoys."—ii. 339, seqq.

1882. "The Malauna people were some time back ordered to make a practicable road, but they flatly refused to do anything of the kind, saying they had never done any begâr labour, and did not intend to do any."

Behut, n.p. H. Behat. One of the names, and in fact the proper name, of the Punjab river which we now call Jelum (i.e. Jhilam) from a town on its banks: the Hydaspes or Bidaspes of the ancients. Both Behat and the Greek names are corruptions, in different ways, of the Sansk. name Vitastâ. Sidi 'Alî (p. 200) calls it the River of Bahra. Bahra or Bhera was a district on the river, and the town and tahsil still remain, in Shahpur Dist.

Beiramee, Byramee, also Byram-paut, s. P. bairam, bairamî. The name of a kind of cotton stuff which appears frequently during the flourishing period of the export of these from India; but the exact character of which we have been unable to ascertain. In earlier times, as appears from the first quotation, it was a very fine stuff.

c. 1343. Ibn Batuta mentions, among return presents sent by Sultan Mahommed Tughlak of Delhi to the Great Kaan, "100 suits of raiment called bairamiyah, i.e., of a cotton stuff, which were of unequalled beauty, and were each worth 100 dinârs."*—iv. 2.

1510. "Fifty ships are laden every year in this place (Bengala) with cotton and silk stuffs . . . that is to say bairam . . ."—Vanthema, 212.

1554. "From this country come the muslins called Candaharians, and those of Daulatabâd, Berupâtri, and Bairami."—Sidi 'Alî, in J. A. S. B. v. 460.

"And for 6 beirames for 6 surplices, which are given annually . . . which may be worth 7 pardaos."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 129.

1615. "10 pec. byrams nill (see Anile) of 51 Rs. per corg. . ."—Cocks's Diary, i. 4.

1813. "Byrams of sorts," among Surat piece-goods, in Milburn, i. 124.

Beitcul, n.p. We do not know how this name should be properly written. The place occupies the isthmus connecting Carwar Head in Canara with the land, and lies close to the Harbour of Carwar, the inner part of which is Beitcul Cove.

1711. "Ships may ride secure from the South West Monsoon at Batie Cove (qu. Battecole ?), and the River is navigable for the largest, after they are once got in."—Lockyer, 272.

1727. "The Portugueze have an Island called Anjediva . . . about two Miles from Batcoal."—A. Ham, i. 277.

Belgaum, n.p. A town and district of the Bombay Presidency, in the S. Mahratta country. The proper form is said to be Canarese Vennugrāmā, 'Bamboo-Town.' The name occurs in De Barros under the form "Cidade de Bilgan" (Dec. IV., liv. vii., cap. 5).

Belleric.—See under Myrabolan.

Benamee, adj. P.—H.—be-nāmī, 'anonymous'; a term specially applied to documents of transfer or other contract in which the name entered as that of one of the chief parties (e.g. of a purchaser) is not that of the person really interested. Such transactions are for various reasons very common in India, especially in Bengal, and are not by any means necessarily fraudulent, though they often have been so. In the Indian Penal Code (Act XLV. of 1860), sections 421–423, "on fraudulent deeds and dispositions of Property" appear to be especially directed against the dishonest use of this benamee system.

It is alleged by C. P. Brown on the authority of a statement in the Friend of India (without specific reference) that the proper term is banāmī, adopted from such a phrase as banāmī chitthī, 'a transferable note of hand,' such notes commencing "banām-i-falāna" 'to the name or address of' (Abraham Newlands).

This is conceivable, and probably true, but we have not the evidence, and in any case the present form and interpretation of the term as be-nāmi has become established.

1854. "It is very much the habit in India to make purchases in the name of others, and from whatever causes the practice may have arisen, it has existed for a series of years: and these transactions are known as 'Benamēe transactions;' they are noticed at least as early as the year 1778, in Mr. Justice Hyde's Notes."—Ld. Justice Knight Bruce, in Moore's Reports of Cases on Appeal before the P. C., vol. vi. p. 72.

"The presumption of the Hindoo Law, in a joint undivided family, is that the whole property of the family is joint estate . . . where a purchase of real estate is made by a Hindoo in the name of one of his sons, the presumption of the Hindoo Law is in favour of its being a benamēe purchase, and the burthen of proof lies on the party in whose name it was purchased, to prove that he was solely entitled."—Note by the Editor of above Vol., p. 53.

1861. "The decree Sale law is also one chief cause of that nuisance, the benamēe system. . . . It is a peculiar contrivance for getting the benefits and credit of property, and avoiding its charges and liabilities. It consists in one man holding land, nominally for himself, but really in secret trust for another, and by ringing the changes between the two . . . relieving the land from being attached for any liability personal to the proprietor."—W. Money, Java, ii. 261.

1862. "Two ingredients are necessary to make up the offence in this section (§ 423 of Penal Code). First a fraudulent intention, and secondly a false statement as to the consideration. The mere fact that an assignment has been taken in the name of a person not really interested, will not be sufficient. Such . . . known in Bengal as benamēe transactions . . . have nothing necessarily fraudulent."—J. D. Mayne's Comm. on the Indian Penal Code, Madras, 1862, p. 257.

Bencœolen, n.p. A settlement on the West Coast of Sumatra, which long pertained to England, viz. from 1685 to 1824, when it was given over to Holland in exchange for Malacca, by the Treaty of London. The name is a corruption of Malay Bangkaulu, and it appears as Mangkoulou or Wénkoulœou in Pauthier's Chinese geographical quotations, of which the date is not given (Marc Pol, p. 566, note). The English factory at Bencœolen was from 1714 called Fort Marlborough.

1690. "We . . . were forced to bear away to Bencouli, another English Factory on the same Coast. . . . It was two days before I went ashore, and then I was importuned by the Governor to stay there, to be Gunner of the Fort."—Dampier, i. 512.

1727. "Bencolon is an English colony, but the European inhabitants not very numerous."—A. Ham. ii. 114.

1788. "It is nearly an equal absurdity, though upon a smaller scale, to have an establishment that costs nearly 40,000*l.* at Bencœolen, to facilitate the purchase of one cargo of pepper."—Cornwallis, i. 390.

Bendameer, n.p. Pers. Bandamīr. A popular name, at least among foreigners, of the River Kur (Araxes) near Shiraz. Properly speaking the word is the name of a dam constructed across the river by the Amīr Fanā Khusrūh, otherwise called 'Aded-ud-daulah, a prince of the Buweih family, (A.D. 965), which was thence known in later days as the Band-i-Amīr, "The Prince's Dam." The work is mentioned in the Geog. Dict. of Yākut (c. 1220) under the names of Sikru Fannā - Khusrāh Khurrah and Kirdu Fannā Khusrāh (see Barb. Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, 313, 480). Fryer repeats a rignmarole that he heard about the miraculous formation of the dam or bridge by Band Haimero (!) a prophet, "wherefore both the Bridge and the Plain, as well as the River, by Boterus is corruptly called Bindamire" (Fryer, 258).

c. 1475. "And from thence, a daies iorney, ye come to a great bridge vpon the Byndamy, which is a notable great ryver. This bridge they said Salomon caused to be made."—Barbaro, (Old E. T.) Hak. Soc., 80.

1621. . . . "having to pass the Kur by a longer way across another bridge called Bend Emīr, which is as much as to say the Tie (ligatura), or in other words the Bridge, of the Emīr, which is two leagues distant from Chehil minar . . . and which is so called after a certain Emīr Hamza the Dilemite who built it. . . . Fra Filippo Ferrari, in his Geographical Epitome, attributes the name of Bendmir to the river, but he is wrong, for Bendmir is the name of the bridge and not of the river."—P. della Valle, ii. 264.

1686. "Il est bon d'observer, que le commun Peuple appelle le Bend-Emīr en cet endroit ab pulneu, c'est à dire le Fleuve du Pont Neuf; qu'on ne l'appelle par son nom de Bend-Emīr que proche de la Digue, qui lui a fait donner ce nom."—Chardin (ed. 1711), ix. 45.

1809. "We proceeded three miles further, and crossing the River Bend-emir, entered the real plain of Merdasht."—Morier (First Journey) 124. See also (1811) 2nd Journey, pp. 73-74, where there is a view of the Band-Amir.

1813. "The river Bund Emeer, by some ancient Geographers called the Cyrus,* takes its present name from a dyke (in Persian a bund) erected by the celebrated Ameer Azad-a-Doula Delemi."—Macdonald Kinneir, Geog. Mem. of the Persian Empire, 59.

"There's a bower of roses by Bendameer's stream.

And the nightingale sings round it all the day long."—Lalla Rookh.

1850. "The water (of Lake Neyriz) . . . is almost entirely derived from the Kur (known to us as the Bund Amir River) . . ."—Abbott, in J. R. G. S., xxv. 73.

1878. We do not know whether the Band-i-Amir is identical with the quasi synonymous Pul-i-Khān by which Col. Macgregor crossed the Kur on his way from Shiraz to Yezd. See his Khorassan, i. 45.

Bendára, s. A term used in the Malay countries as a title of one of the higher ministers of state,—Malay bandahāra, Jav. bendārā, 'Lord.' The word enters into the numerous series of purely honorary Javanese titles, and the etiquette in regard to it is very complicated. (See Tijdschr. v. Nederl. Indië, year viii. No. 12, 253 segg.). It would seem that the term is properly bāndārā, a 'treasurer,' and taken from the Skt. bhāṇḍārin, 'a steward or treasurer.' Haex in his Malay-Latin Dict. gives Bandāri, 'Oeconomus, quæstor, expenditor.'

1509. "Whilst Sequeira was consulting with his people over this matter, the King sent the Bendhara or Treasure-Master on board."—Valentijn, v. 322.

1539. "There the Bandara (Bendara) of Malacca, (who is as it were Chief Justicer among the Mahometans) (o supremo no mando, na honra e ne justicia dos mouros) was present in person by the express commandment of Pedro de Faria for to entertain him."—Pinto (orig. cap. xiv.) in Cogam, p. 17.

1552. "And as the Bendara was by nature a traitor and a tyrant, the counsel they gave him seemed good to him."—Castanheda, ii. 389, also iii. 433.

1561. "Então manson . . . que dizer que matára o seu bandara polomao conselho que lhe deve."—Correia, Lendas, ii. 225.

1613. "This administration (of Malacca) is provided for a three years' space with a governor . . . and with royal officers of revenue and justice, and with the native Bendara in charge of the government of the lower class of subjects and foreigners."—Godinho de Eredia, 6 v.

1631. "There were in Malacca five principal officers of dignity . . . the second is Bendara, he is the superintendent of the executive (reador da fazenda) and governs the Kingdom: sometimes the Bendara holds both offices, that of Puduca raja and of Bendara."—D'Albuquerque, Commentaries (orig.) 358-359.

"O principal sogeito no governo De Mahomet, e privança, era o Bendára, Magistrado supremo."

Malacca Conquistada, iii. 6.

1726. "Bandares or Adassing are those who are at the Court as Dukes, Counts, or even Princes of the Royal House."—Valentijn (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 8.

1810. "After the Raja had amused himself with their speaking, and was tired of it . . . the bintara with the green eyes (for it is the custom that the eldest bintara should have green shades before his eyes, that he may not be dazzled by the greatness of the Raja, and forget his duty) brought the books and packets, and delivered them to the bintara with the black baju, from whose hands the Raja received them, one by one, in order to present them to the youths."—A Malay's account of a visit to Govt. House, Calcutta, transl. by Dr. Leyden in Maria Graham, p. 202.

1883. "In most of the States the reigning prince has regular officers under him, chief among whom . . . the Bandanara or treasurer, who is the first minister. . ."—Bird, The Golden Chersonese, 26.

Bendy, Bindy, s. (See also bandicoy, which is the form in S. India). Hind. bhindā, Dakh. bhendī, Mahr. bhendā. Called also in Hind. rām-turāi. The fruit of the plant Abelmoschus esculentus, also Hibiscus esc. It is called in Arab. bāmīyah (see Lane's Mod. Egypt., ed. 1837, i. 199), whence in modern Greek παμία. In Italy the vegetable is called corni de' Greci. The Latin name Abelmoschus is from the Arabic habb-ul-mushk, 'grain of musk' (Dozy).

Bendy-Tree, s. This, according to Sir G. Birdwood, is the Thespesia populnea, Lam., and gives a name to ‘Bendy Bazar’ in Bombay. See Portia.

Bengal, n.p. The region of the Ganges Delta and the districts immediately above it; but often in English use with a wide application to the whole territory garrisoned by the Bengal army. This name does not appear, so far as we have been able to learn, in any Mahommedan or Western writing before the latter part of the 13th century. In the earlier part of that century the Mahommedan writers generally call the province Lakhnaot, after the chief city, but we have also the old form Bang, from the indigenous Vaṅga. Already, however, in the 11th century we have it as Vaṅgālam on the Inscription of the great Tanjore Pagoda. This is the oldest occurrence that we can cite.

The alleged City of Bengala of the Portuguese which has greatly perplexed geographers, probably originated with the Arab custom of giving an important foreign city or seaport the name of the country in which it lay (compare the city of Solmandala under Coromandel). It long kept a place in maps. The last occurrence that we know of is in a chart of 1743, in Dalrymple’s Collection, which identifies it with Chittagong, and it may be considered certain that Chittagong was the place intended by the older writers. See Varthema and Ovington. The former, as regards his visiting Banghella, deals in fiction; a thing clear from internal evidence, and expressly alleged by the judicious Garcia De Orta.*

c. 1590. “Bungaleh originally was called Bung; it derived the additional al from that being the name given to the mounds of earth which the ancient Rajahs caused to be raised in the low lands, at the foot of the hills.”—Ayeen Akbery, by Gladwin, ii. 4 (ed. 1800).

1690. “Arracan . . . is bounded on the North-West by the Kingdom of Bengala, some Authors making Chatigam to be its first Frontier City; but Teixeira, and generally the Portuguese Writers, reckon that as a City of Bengala; and not only so, but place the City of Bengala it self . . . more South than Chatigam. Tho’ I confess a late French Geographer has put Bengala into his Catalogue of imaginary Cities. . . .”—Ovington, 554.

Bengal, s. This was also the designation of a kind of piece goods exported from that country to England, in the 17th Century. But long before, among the Moors of Spain, a fine muslin seems to have been known as al-bangala, surviving in Spanish albengala. (See Dozy & Eng. s. v.)

Bengalee, n.p. A native of Bengal. In the following early occurrence in Portuguese, Bengala is used :

1552. "In the defence of the bridge died three of the King's captains and Tuam Bandam, to whose charge it was committed, a Bengali (Bengala) by nation, and a man sagacious and crafty in stratagems rather than a soldier (cavalheiro)."—Barros, II., vi., iii.

A note to the Seir Mutaqherin quotes a Hindustani proverb: Bangālī jāngālī, Kashmīrī bepīrī, i.e. 'The Bengalee is ever an entangler, the Cashmeere without religion.'

Benighted, The, adj. An epithet applied by the denizens of the other Presidencies, in facetious disparagement to Madras. At Madras itself "all Carnatic fashion" is an habitual expression among older English-speaking natives, which appears to convey a similar idea. See Madras.

Benjamin, Benzoin, &c., s. A kind of incense, derived from the resin of the Styrac benzoin, Dryander, in Sumatra, and from an undetermined species in Siam. It got from the Arab traders the name of lubān-Jāwī, i.e. 'Java Frankincense,' corrupted in the middle ages into such forms as we give. The first syllable of the Arabic term was doubtless taken as an article—lo bengioi, whence bengioi, benzoin, and so forth. This etymology is given correctly by De Orta, and by Valentijn, and suggested by Barbosa in the quotation below. Spanish forms are benjui, menjui; Modern Port. beijoim, beijuim; Ital. belzuino, &c.

N.B.—The terms Jāwā, Jāwī were applied by the Arabs to the Malay countries generally (especially Sumatra), and their products. (See Marco Polo, ii. 266; and the first quotation here.)

Beriberi, s. An acute disease, obscure in its nature and pathology, generally but not always presenting dropsical symptoms, as well as paralytic weakness and numbness of the lower extremities, with oppressed breathing. In cases where debility, oppression, anxiety and dyspnoea are extremely severe, the patient sometimes dies in 6 to 30 hours. Though recent reports seem to refer to this disease as almost confined to natives, it is on record that in 1795, in Trincomalee, 200 Europeans died of it.

The word has been alleged to be Singhaliese beri, 'debility.' This kind of reduplication is really a common Singhaliese practice. It is also sometimes alleged to be a W. Indian Negro term; and other worthless guesses have been made at its origin. The Singhaliese origin is on the whole most probable. In the quotations from Bontius and Bluteau, the disease described seems to be that formerly known as barbiers (q. v.). Some authorities have considered these diseases as quite distinct, but Sir Joseph Fayrer, who has paid attention to beriberi and written upon it (see The Practitioner, January, 1877), regards Barbiers as "the dry form of beri-beri," and Dr. Lodewijks, quoted below, says briefly that "the Barbiers of some French writers is incontestably the same disease." (On this it is necessary to remark that the use of the term Barbiers is by no means confined to French writers, as a glance at the quotations under that word will show). The disease prevails endemically in Ceylon, and in Peninsular India in the coast-tracts, and up to 40 or 60 m. inland; also in Burma and the Malay region, including all the islands at least as far as New Guinea, and also Japan, where it is known as kakké. It is very prevalent in certain Madras Jails. The name had become somewhat old-fashioned, but it has recurred of late years, especially in hospital reports from Madras and Burma. It is frequently epidemic, and some of the Dutch physicians regard it as infectious. See a pamphlet, Beri-Beri door J. A. Lotewijks, ond-officier van Gezondheit bij het Ned. Indische Leger, Harderwijk, 1882. In this pamphlet it is stated that in 1879 the total number of beriberi patients in the military hospitals of Netherlands-India, amounted to 9873, and the deaths among these to 1682. In the great military hospitals at Achin there died of beri-beri between 1st November, 1879, and 1st April, 1880, 574 persons, of whom the great majority were dwangarbeiders, i.e. 'forced labourers.' These statistics show the extraordinary prevalence and fatality of the disease in the Archipelago. Dutch literature on the subject is considerable.

Sir George Birdwood tells us that during the Persian Expedition of 1857 he witnessed beri-beri of extraordinary virulence, especially among the East African stokers on board the steamers. The sufferers became dropsically distended to a vast extent, and died in a few hours.

In the first quotation scurvy is evidently meant. This seems much allied by causes to beriberi, though different in character.

Beryl, s. This word is perhaps a very ancient importation from India to the West, it having been supposed that its origin was the Skt. vaidūrya, Prak. velūriya, whence Pers. billaur, and Greek βήρυλλος. Bochart points out the probable identity of the two last words by the transposition of l and r. Another transposition appears to have given Ptolemy his 'Οροῦδια ὄρη (for the Western Ghats), representing probably the native Vaidūrya mountains. In Ezekiel xxviii. 13, the Sept. has βηρύλλιον, where the Hebrew now has tarshish. Professor Max Müller has treated of the possible relation between vaidūrya and vidāla, 'a cat,' and in connexion with this observes that "we should, at all events, have learnt the useful lesson that the chapter of accidents is sometimes larger than we suppose."* This is a lesson which many articles in our book suggest; and, in dealing with the same words, it may be indicated that the resemblance between the Greek αἰλουρος, bilaur, a common Hindi word for a cat, and the Pers. billaur, 'beryl,' are at least additional illustrations of the remark quoted.

Betel, s. The leaf of the Piper betel, L., chewed with the dried areca-nut (which is thence improperly called betel-nut, a mistake as old as Fryer—1673—see p. 40), chunam, &c., by the natives of India and the Indo-Chinese countries. The word is Malayāl. veṭṭila, i.e. veru + ila = 'simple or mere leaf,' and comes to us through the Port. betre and betle. Pawn, q.v., is the term more generally used by modern Anglo-Indians. In former days the betel-leaf was in S. India the subject of a monopoly of the E. I. Co.

1298. "All the people of this city (Cael) as well as of the rest of India, have a custom of perpetually keeping in the mouth a certain leaf called Tembul . . . the lords and gentlefolks and the King have these leaves prepared with camphor and other aromatic spices, and also mixt with quicklime . . ."—Marco Polo, ii. 358; see also *Abdurrazak in India in XV. Bezoar, s. This word belongs, not to the A. Indian colloquial, but to the language of old oriental trade and materia medica. The word is a corruption of the Persian name of the thing, pādzahr, 'pellens venenum,' or pāzahr. The first form is given by Meninski as the etymology of the word, and this is accepted by Littré. The quotations of the latter from Ambrose Paré show that the word was used generically for 'an antidote,' and in this sense it is used habitually by Avicenna. No doubt the term came to us, with so many others, from the Arab medical writers, so much studied in the Middle Ages, and this accounts for the b, as Arabic has no p, and writes bāzahr. But its usual application was, and is, limited to certain hard concretions found in the bodies of animals, to which antidotal virtues were ascribed, and especially to one obtained from the stomach of a wild goat in the Persian province of Lar. Of this animal and the bezoar an account is given in Kaempfer's Amoenitates Exoticae, pp. 398 seqq. The Bezoar was sometimes called Snake-stone, and erroneously supposed to be found in the head of a snake. It may have been called so really because, as Ibn Baithar states, such a stone was laid upon the bite of a venomous creature (and was believed) to extract the poison.

Mooden Sheriff, in his Suppt. to the Indian Pharmacopoeia, says there are various bezoars in use (in native mat. med.), distinguished according to the animal producing them, as a goat-, camel-, fish-, and snake-bezoar; the last quite distinct from snake-stone (q. v.)

1826. "What is spikenard? what is numiai? what is pahzar? compared even to a twinkle of a royal eye-lash?"—Hajji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 148.

Bhat, s. Hind. etc. bhāt, (Skt. bhaṭṭa, a title of respect, probably connected with bharṭṛi, a 'supporter or master') a man of a tribe of mixed descent, whose members are professed genealogists and poets; a bard. These men in Rajputana and Guzerat had also extraordinary privileges as the guarantors of travellers, whom they accompanied, against attack or robbery. See an account of them in Forbes's Rās Mālā, I. ix. &c.

c. 1555. "Among the infidel Bānyāns in this country (Guzerat) there is a class of litterati known as Bāts. These undertake to be guides to traders and other travellers . . . when the caravans are waylaid on the road by Rāshbūts, i. e., Indian horsemen, coming to pillage them, the Bāt takes out his dagger, points it at his own breast, and says: 'I have become surety! If aught befalls the caravan I must kill myself!' On these words the Rashbūts let the caravan pass unharmed."—Sidi Ali, 95.

1775. "The Hindoo rajahs and Maharratta chieftains have generally a Bhaut in the family, who attends them on public occasions . . . sounds their praise, and proclaims their titles in hyperbolical and figurative language . . . many of them have another mode of living; they offer themselves as security to the different governments for payment of their revenue, and the good behaviour of the Zemindars, patels, and public farmers; they also become guaranties for treaties between native princes, and the performance of bonds by individuals."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 89. See Traga.

1810. "India, like the nations of Europe, had its minstrels and poets, concerning whom there is the following tradition: At a marriage of Siva and Parvatty, the immortals having exhausted all the amusements then known, wished for something new, when Siva, wiping the drops of sweat from his brow, shook them to earth, upon which the Bawts, or Bards, immediately sprang up."—Marra Graham, 169.

Bheel, n. p. Skt. Bhilla; H. Bhāl. The name of a race inhabiting the hills and forests of the Vindhya, of Malwa, and of the N.-Western Deccan, and believed to have been the aborigines of Rajputāna; some have supposed them to be the Φυλλῖται of Ptolemy. They are closely akin to the Coolies (q. v.) of Guzerat, and are believed to belong to the Kolarian division of Indian aborigines. But no distinct Bhil language survives.

1785. "A most infernal yell suddenly issued from the deep ravines. Our guides informed us that this was the noise always made by the Bheels previous to an attack."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 480.

1825. "All the Bheels whom we saw today were small, slender men, less broad-shouldered . . . and with faces less Celtic than the Fuharees of the Rajmahal. . . . Two of them had rude swords and shields, the remainder had all bows and arrows."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 75.

Bheel, s. A word used in Bengal—bhīl: a marsh or lagoon. Same as Jheel, q. v.

1879. "Below Shouy-doung there used to be a big bheel, wherein I have shot a few duck, teal, and snipe."—Pollok, Sport in B. Burma, i. 26.

Bheesty, s. The universal word in the Anglo-Indian households of N. India for the domestic (corresponding to the sakkā of Egypt) who supplies the family with water, carrying it in a mussuck (q. v.) or goatskin, slung on his back. The word is Pers. bihishtī, a person of bihisht or paradise, though the application appears to be peculiar to Hindustan. We have not been able to trace the history of this term, which does not apparently occur in the Ām, or in the old travellers, and is not given in Meninski's lexicon. Vullers gives it only as from Shakespear's Hindustani Dict. It is one of the fine titles which Indian servants rejoice to bestow on one another, like Mehtar, Khalifa, &c. The title in this case has some justification. No class of men (as all Anglo-Indians will agree) is so diligent, so faithful, so unobtrusive, and uncomplaining as that of the bikishtis. And often in battle they have shown their courage and fidelity in supplying water to the wounded in face of much personal danger.

1773. "Bheestee, Waterman" (&c.)—Fergusson, Dict. of the Hindostan Language, &c.

1781. "I have the happiness to inform you of the fall of Bijah Gurb on the 9th inst. with the loss of only 1 sepooy, 1 beasty, and a cossy (?) killed . . ."—Letter in India Gazette of Nov. 24th.

1810. ". . . If he carries the water himself in the skin of a goat, prepared for that purpose, he then receives the designation of Bheesty."—Williamson, V. M. i. 229.

1829. "Dressing in a hurry, find the drunken bheesty . . . has mistaken your boot for the goglet in which you carry your water on the line of march."—Camp Miseries, in John Shipp, ii. 149.

N.B.—We never knew a drunken bheesty.

1878. "Here comes a seal carrying a porpoise on its back. No! it is only our friend the bheesty."—In my Indian Garden, 79.

Bhikty, s. The usual Calcutta name for the fish Lates calcarifer. See Cockup.

Bhounsla, n. p. Properly Bhoslah or Bhoislah, the surname of Sivaji the founder of the Mahratta empire. It was also the surname of Parsoji and Raghuji, the founders of the Mahratta dynasty of Berar, though not of the same family as Sivaji.

1673. "Seva Gi, derived from an Ancient Line of Rajahs, of the Cast of the Bounceloes, a Warlike and Active Offspring."—Fryer, 171.

c. 1730. "At this time two parganas, named Púna and Súpa, became the jagir of Sáhu Bhoslah. Sivaji became the manager . . . He was distinguished in his tribe for courage and intelligence; and for craft and trickery he was reckoned a sharp son of the devil."—Kháfi Khán, in Elliot, vii. 257.

1780. "It was at first a particular tribe governed by the family of Bhosselah, which has since lost the sovereignty."—Seir Mutaqherin, iii. 214.

1782. ". . . le Bonzolo, les Marates, et les Mogols."—Sonnerat, i. 60.

Bhyacharra, s. Hind. bhayācharā. This is a term applied to settlements made with the village as a community, the several claims and liabilities being regulated by established customs, or special traditional rights. Wilson interprets it as "fraternal establishments."

Bichána, s. Bedding of any kind. Hind. bichhānā.

Bidree or Bidry, s. H. Bidrī. The name applied to a kind of ornamental metal-work, made in the Deccan, and deriving its name from the city of Bidar (or Bedar) which was the chief place of manufacture. The work was, amongst natives, chiefly applied to hooka-bells, rose-water bottles and the like. The term has acquired vogue in England of late amongst amateurs of "art manufacture." The ground of the work is pewter alloyed with one-fourth copper: this is inlaid (or damascened) with patterns in silver; and then the pewter ground is blackened. A short description of the manufacture is given by Dr. George Smith in the Madras Lit. Soc. Journal, N.S. i. 81-84. The ware was first described by B. Heyne in 1813.

Bilabundy, s. Hind. bilabandi. An account of the revenue settlement of a district, specifying the name of each mahal (estate), the farmer of it, and the amount of the rent (Wilson). In the N.W.P. it usually means an arrangement for securing the payment of revenue (Elliot). G. P. Brown says, quoting Raikes, p. 109, that the word is bila-bandi, 'hole-stopping,' viz. stopping those vents through which the coin of the proprietor might ooze out. This, however, looks very like a 'striving after meaning,' and Wilson's suggestion that it is a corruption of behri-bandi, from behri, a share, a quota, is probably right.

Bilayut, Billaït, &c. n. p. Europe. The word is properly Arabic, Wilāyat, 'a kingdom, a province,' variously used with specific denotation, as the Afghans term their own country often by this name; and in India again it has come to be employed for distant Europe. In Sicily Il Regno is used for the interior of the island, as we use Mofussil in India. Wilāyat is the usual form in Bombay.

Bilayutee pawnee, Bilātee panee. The adjective bilāyati is applied specifically to a variety of exotic articles, e.g. bilāyati baingan (see Brinjal), to the tomato, and most especially bilāyati pānī, 'European water,' the usual name of soda-water in Anglo-India.

Bildār, s. Hind. from Pers. beldār, 'a spade-wielder,' an excavator or digging labourer. Term usual in the Public Works' Department of Upper India for men employed in that way.

"Ye Lyme is alle oute! Ye Masouns lounge aboute!

Ye Beldars have alle struck, and are smoaking attē their Eese!

Ye Brickses are alle done! Ye Kyne are Skynne and Bone,

And ye Threasourur has bolted with xii thousand Rupees!"

Ye Dreme of an Executive Engineere.

Bilooch, Belooch, n. p. The name (Balūch or Bilūch) applied to the race inhabiting the regions west of the Lower Indus, and S.E. of Persia, called from them Bilūchistān; they were dominant in Sind till the English conquest in 1843.

A.D. 643. "In the year 32 H. 'Abdulla bin 'A'mar bin Rabi' invaded Kirmān and took the capital Kuwāshir, so that the aid of 'the men of Kūj and Balūj' was solicited in vain by the Kirmānis."—In Elliot, i. 417.

c. 1200. "He gave with him from Kandhār and Lār, mighty Balochis, servants. . . with nobles of many castes, horses, elephants, men, carriages, charioteers, and chariots."—The Poem of Chand Bardāi, in Ind. Ant. i. 272.

c. 1211. "In the desert of Khabis there was a body . . . of Buluchis who robbed on the highway. . . These people came out and carried off all the presents and rarities in his possession."—Ubbi in Elliot, ii. 193.

1556. "We proceeded to Gwādir, a trading town. The people here are called Balūj; their prince was Malik Jalaluddin, son of Malik Dinār."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 73.

1613. "The Boloches are of Mahomet's Religion. They deale much in Camels, most of them robbers. . . ."—N. Whittington in Purchas, i. 485.

1727. "They were lodged in a Caravan-seray, when the Ballowches came with about 300 to attack them; but they had a brave warm Reception, and left four Score of their Number dead on the Spot, without the Loss of one Dutch Man."—A. Ham. i. 107.

1813. Milburn calls them Bloaches (Or. Com. i. 145).

1844. "Officers must not shoot Peacocks: if they do the Belooches will shoot officers—at least so they have threatened, and M.-G. Napier has not the slightest doubt but that they will keep their word. There are no wild peacocks in Scinde,—they are all private property and sacred birds, and no man has any right whatever to shoot them."—Gen. Orders by Sir C. Napier.

Binky-Nabob, s. This title occurs in documents regarding Hyder and Tippoo, e.g., in Gen. Stewart's desp. of 8th March, 1799: "Mohammed Rezza, the Binky Nabob." It is properly benkī-nawāb, from Canarese benkī, 'fire,' and means the Commandant of the Artillery.

Bird of Paradise. The name given to various beautiful birds of the family Paradisæidae, of which many species are now known, inhabiting N. Guinea and the smaller islands adjoining it. The largest species was called by Linnaeus Paradisæa apoda, in allusion to the fable that these birds had no feet (the dried skins brought for sale to the Moluccas having usually none attached to them). The name Manucode which Buffon adopted for these birds occurs in the form Manucodiata in some of the following quotations. It is a corruption of the Javanese name Manuk-dewata, 'the Bird of the Gods,' which our popular term renders with sufficient accuracy.

c. 1430. "In majori Java avis præcipua reperitur sine pedibus, instar palumbi, pluma levi, cauda oblonga, semper in arboribus quiescens: caro non editur, pellis et cauda habentur pretiosiores, quibus pro ornamento capitis utuntur."—N. Conti in Poggius de Varietate Fortunæ lib. iv.

1522. "The Kings of the said (Moluccas) began only a few years ago to believe in the immortality of souls, taught by no other argument than this, that they had seen a most beautiful little bird, which never alighted on the ground or on any other terrestrial object, but which they had sometimes seen to come from the sky, that is to say, when it was dead and fell to the ground. And the Machometan traders who traffic in those islands assured them that this little bird was a native of Paradise, and that Paradise was the place where the souls of the dead are; and on this account the princes attached themselves to the sect of the Machometans, because it promised them many marvellous things regarding this place of souls. This little bird they called by the name of Manu- codiata. . . .”—Letter of Mazmillian of Transylvania, Sec. to the Emp. Charles V., in Ramusio, i. f. 351v; see also f. 352.

c. 1524. “He also (the K. of Bachian) gave us for the King of Spain two most beautiful dead birds. These birds are as large as thrushes; they have small heads, long beaks, legs slender like a writing pen, and a span in length; they have no wings, but instead of them long feathers of different colours, like plumes; their tail is like that of the thrush. All the feathers, except those of the wings (?), are of a dark colour; they never fly except when the wind blows. They told us that these birds come from the terrestrial Paradise, and they call them ‘bolon dinata,’ that is, divine birds.”—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 143.

1598. “. . . in these Ilands (Moluccas) onlie is found the bird, which the Portingales call Passaros de Sol, that is Foule of the Sunne, the Italians call it Manu codiata, and the Latinists Paradiseas, by us called Paradice birdes, for ye beauty of their feathers which passe al other birds: these birds are never seene alive, but being dead they are found vpon the Iland; they fle, as it is said, alwaies into the Sunne, and keepe themselves continually in the ayre . . . . for they haue neither feet nor wings, but onely head and bodie, and the most part tayle . . . .”—Linschoten, 35.

“Olha cá pelos mares do Oriente
As infinitas ilhas espalhadas

Aqui as aureas aves, que não decem
Nunca á terra, e só mortas aparecem.”

Camões, x. 132.

Englished by Burton :

“Here see o’er oriental seas bespread infinite island-groups and alwhere strewn here dwell the golden fowls, whose home is air, and never earthward save in death may fare.”

1645. “. . . the male and female Manu-codiatae, the male having a hollow in the back, in which ’tis reported the female both lays and hatches her eggs.”—Evelyn’s Diary, 4th Feb.

1674.

That like a Bird of Paradise,
Or herald’s martlet, has no legs . . . .”

Hudibras, Pt. II. Cant. 3.

1691. “As for the story of the Manu-codiata or Bird of Paradise, which in the former Age was generally received and accepted for true, even by the Learned, it is now discovered to be a fable, and rejected and exploded by all men” (i. e., that it has no feet).—Ray, Wisdom of God Manifested in the Works of the Creation, ed. 1692, Pt. 2, 147.

1868. “When seen in this attitude, the Bird of Paradise really deserves its name, and must be ranked as one of the most beautiful and wonderful of living things.”—Wallace, Malay Archip. 7th ed. 464.

Birds’ Nests. The famous edible nests, formed with mucus, by certain swiftlets, Collocalia nidifica, and C. linchi. Both have been long known on the eastern coasts of the B. of Bengal, and in the Malay Islands. The former is also now known to visit Darjeeling, the Assam Hills, the Western Ghats, &c., and to breed on the islets off Malabar and the Concan.

Bish, Bikh, etc., n. Hind. from Skt. visha, ‘poison.’ The word has several specific applications, as (a) to the poison of various species of aconite, particularly Aconitum ferox, otherwise more specifically called (Skt.) vatsanābha (‘calf’s navel’), corrupted into bachnab, bechnāg, &c.

But it is also applied (b) in the Himalaya to the effect of rarefied atmosphere at great heights on the body, an effect which there and over Central Asia is attributed to poisonous emanations from the soil, or from plants; a doctrine somewhat naively accepted by Hue in his famous narrative. The Central Asiatic (Turki) expression for this is Esā, smell.

1554. “Entre les singularités que le consul de Florentins me monstra, me feist gouter vne racine que les Arabes nomment Bisch: laquelle me causa si grande chaleur en la bouche, qui me dura deux iours, qu’il me sembloit y auoir du feu. . . Elle est bien petite comme vn petit naueau: les autres (auteurs?) l’ont nommée Napellus. . .”—Pierre Belon, Observations, &c. f. 97.

1661-2. “Est autem Langur mons omnium altissimus, ita ut in summitate ejus viatores vix respirare ob aëris subtilitatem queant: nequeis ob virulentas nonnullarum herbarum exhalationes aestivo tempore, sine manifesto vitæ periculo transiri possit.”—P.P. Dorville and Grueber, in Kircher, China Illustrata, 65.

It is curious to see these intelligent Jesuits recognise the true cause, but accept the fancy of their guides as an additional one!

1812. "Here begins the Esh—this is a Turkish word signifying Smell. . . it implies something the odour of which induces indisposition; far from hence the breathing of horse and man, and especially of the former, becomes affected."—Mir 'Izzet Ullah, in J. R. As. Soc. i. 283.

1815. "Many of the coolies, and several of the Mewattee and Ghoorkha sepoys and chuprasees now lagged, and were hardly able to proceed, and every one complained of the bis or poisoned wind. I now suspected that the supposed poison was nothing more than the effect of the rarefaction of the atmosphere from our great elevation."—Fraser, Journal of a Tour, &c. 1820, p. 442.

1819. "The difficulty of breathing which at an earlier date Andrada, and more recently Moorcroft had experienced in this region, was confirmed by Webb; the Butias themselves felt it, and call it bis ki huwa, i.e. poisonous air; even horses and yaks . . suffer from it."—Webb's Narrative, quoted in Ritter, Asien, ii. 532, 649.

1845. "Nous arrivâmes à neuf heures au pied du Bourhan-Bota. La caravane s'arrêta un instant . . on se montrait avec anxiété un gaz subtil et léger, qu'on nommait vapeur pestilentielle, et tout le monde paraissait abattu et découragé. . . Bientôt les chevaux se refusent à porter leurs cavaliers, et chacun avance à pied et à petits pas . . tous les visages blémissent, on sent le cœur s'affaîdir, et les jambes ne peuvent plus fonctionner. . . Une partie de la troupe, par mesure de prudence s'arrêta . . le reste par prudence aussi épuisa tous ses efforts pour arriver jusqu'au bout, et ne pas mourir asphyxié au milieu de cet air chargé d'acide carbonique," &c.—Huc et Gabet, ii. 211.

Bisnagar, Bisnaga, Beejanugger, n.p. These and other forms stand for the name of the ancient city which was the capital of the most important Hindu kingdom that existed in the Peninsula of India, during the later middle ages, ruled by the Rāya dynasty. The place is now known as Humpy (Hampi) and is entirely in ruins. It stands on the S. of the Tungabhadra R., 36 m. to the N.W. of Bellary. The name is a corruption of Vijayanagara (City of Victory), or Vidya nagara (City of Learning) both of which forms occur in inscriptions. But the latter seems to have been applied only since the place, in the 13th century, became the seat of a great revival of Hinduism, under the famous Sayana Mādhava, who wrote commentaries on the Vedas, and much besides. Both the city and the kingdom were commonly called by the early Portuguese Narsinga (q.v.) from Narasimha (c. 1490–1508), who was king at the time of their first arrival.

c. 1420. "Profectus hinc est procul a mari milliarius trecentis, ad civitatem ingentem, nomine Bizenegaliā, ambitu milliārum sexaginta, circa præruptos montes sitam."—Conti, in Poggins de Var. Fortunae, iv.

1442. ". . . the chances of a maritime voyage had led Abd-er-razzak, the author of this work, to the city of Bidjanagar. Cent.*, 22.

c. 1470. "The Hindu sultan Kadam is a very powerful prince. He possesses a numerous army, and resides on a mountain at Bichenegher."—Athan. Nikitin, in India in XV. Cent., 29.

1516. "45 leagues from these mountains inland, there is a very large city, which is called Bijanagher. . . ."—Barbosa, 85.

1611. "Le Roy de Bisnagar, qu'on appelle aussi quelquefois le Roy de Narzinga, est puissant."—Wytfliet, H. des Indes, ii. 64.

Bison, s. The popular name, among Southern Anglo-Indian sportsmen, of the great wild-ox called in Bengal gaur and gavial (Gavaeus gaurus, Jerdon). It inhabits sparsely all the large forests of India, from near Cape Comorin to the foot of the Himalayas (at least in their eastern portion), and from Malabar to Tenasserim.

1831. "Once an unfortunate nativesuperintendent or mistari was pounded to death by a savage and solitary bison."—Saty. Review, Sept. 10, p. 335.

Blacan-matee, n.p. This is the name of an island adjoining Singapore, which forms the beautiful 'New Harbour' of that port. Mal. Bālā-kang-māti. The island (Blacan-mati) appears in one of the charts of Godinho de Eredia (1613) published in his Malaca, &c. (Brussels, 1882), and though, from the excessive looseness of such old charts, the island seems too far from Singapore, we are satisfied after careful comparison with the modern charts that the island now so-called is intended.

Black, s. Adj. and substantive denoting natives of India. Old-fashioned, and heard, if still heard, only from the lower class of Europeans; even in the last generation its habitual use was chiefly confined to these, and to old officers of the Queen's Army.

1782. "... the 35th Regiment, commanded by Major Popham, which had lately behaved in a mutinous manner... was broke with infamy. ... The black officers with halters about their necks, and the sepoys stript of their coats and turbands were drummed out of the Cantonments."—India Gazette, March 30.

1787. "As to yesterday's particular charge, the thing that has made me most inveterate and unrelenting in it is only that it related to cruelty or oppression inflicted on two black ladies. . . ."—Lord Minto, in Life, &c., i. 128.

1789. "I have just heard from a Friend at the India House, y<sup>t</sup> the object of Treves' ambition at present is to be appointed to the Adaulet of Benares, wh<sup>i</sup> is now held by a Black named Alii Caun. Understanding that most of the Adaulets are now held by Europeans, and as I am informed y<sup>t</sup> it is the intention y<sup>t</sup> the Europeans are to be so placed in future, I sh<sup>d</sup> be vastly happy if without committing any injustice you c<sup>d</sup> place young Treves in y<sup>t</sup> situation."—George P. of Wales, to Lord Cornwallis, in C.'s Corresp. ii. 29.

1832-3. "And be it further enacted that . . . in all captures which shall be made by H. M.'s Army, Royal Artillery, provincial, black, or other troops. . . ."—Act 2 & 3 Will. IV. ch. 53, sec. 2.

The phrase is in use among natives, we know not whether originating with them, or adopted from the usage of the foreigner. But kālā ādmā, 'black man,' is often used by them in speaking to Europeans of other natives. A case in point is perhaps worth recording. A statue of Lord William Bentinck, on foot, and in bronze, stands in front of the Calcutta Town Hall. Many years ago a native officer, returning from duty at Calcutta to Barrackpore, where his regiment was, reported himself to his adjutant (from whom we had the story in later days). 'Anything new, Subadār Sahib?' said the Adjutant. 'Yes,' said the Subadār, 'there is a figure of the former Lord Sahib arrived.' 'And what do you think of it?' 'Sahib,' said the Subadār, 'abhi hai kālā ādmī kā sā, jab potā ho jaegā jab aachhā hogā!' ('It is now just like a native ('a black man'); when the whitewash is applied it will be excellent.'

In some few phrases the term has become crystallised and semi-official. Thus the native dressers in a hospital were, and probably still are, called Black Doctors.

1787. "The Surgeon's assistant and Black Doctor take their station 100 paces in the rear, or in any place of security to which the Doolies may readily carry the wounded."—Regulations for the H. C.'s Troops on the Coast of Coromandel.

Black Act. This was the name given in odium by the non-official Europeans in India to Act XI., 1836, of the Indian Legislature, which laid down that no person should by reason of his place of birth or of his descent be, in any civil proceeding, excepted from the jurisdiction of the Courts named, viz.: Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, Zillah and City Judge's Courts, Principal Sudder Ameens, Sudder Ameens, and Moonsiff's Court, or, in other words, it placed European subjects on a level with natives as to their subjection in civil causes to all the Company's courts, including those under Native Judges.

This Act was drafted by T. B. Macaulay, then Legislative Member of the Governor-General's Council, and brought great abuse on his head. Recent agitation caused by the "Ilbert Bill," proposing to make Europeans subject to native magistrates in regard to police and criminal charges, has been, by advocates of the latter measure, put on all fours with the agitation of 1836. But there is much that discriminates the two cases.

1876. "The motive of the scurrility with which Macaulay was assailed by a handful of sorry scribblers was his advocacy of the Act, familiarly known as the Black Act, which withdrew from British subjects resident in the provinces their so called privilege of bringing civil appeals before the Supreme Court at Calcutta."—Trevelyan's Life of Macaulay, 2d ed. i. 398.

Black-Buck, s. The ordinary name of the male antelope (Antelope bezoartica, Jerdon), from the dark hue of its back, by no means however literally black.

1690. "The Indians remark, 'tis September's Sun which caused the black lines on the Antelopes' Backs."—Orington, 189.

Black Cotton Soil.—See Regur.

Black Language. An old-fashioned expression, for Hindustani and other vernaculars, which used to be common among officers and men of the Royal Army, but was almost confined to them.

Black Partridge, s. The popular Indian name of the common francolin of S.E. Europe and Western Asia, (Francolinus vulgaris, Stephens), notable for its harsh quasi-articulate call, interpreted in various parts of the world into very different syllables. The rhythm of the call is fairly represented by two of the imitations which come nearest one another, viz., that given by Sultan Baber (Persian): 'Shūr dāram, shakrak' ('I've got milk and sugar'!) and (Hind.) one given by Jerdon: 'Lasan piyāz adrak' ('Garlic, onion, and ginger!') A more pious one is: 'Khudā terī kudrat, 'God is thy strength!' Another mentioned by Capt. Baldwin is very like the truth; "Be quick, pay your debts!" But perhaps the Greek interpretation recorded by Athenaeus (ix. 39) is best of all: τρις τοῖς κακούργοις κακά, 'Three-fold ills to the ill-doers!'—See Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. xviii. and note 1.

Black Town, n.p. Still the popular name of the native city of Madras, as distinguished from the Fort and southern suburbs occupied by the English residents, and the bazars which supply their wants.

Black Town is also used at Bombay.—See last quotation under Bombay.

1673. Fryer calls the native town of Madras "the Heathen Town," and "the Indian Town."

1727. "The Black Town (of Madras) is inhabited by Gentous, Mahometans, and Indian Christians. . . . It was walled in towards the Land, when Governor Pu ruled it."—A. Ham. i. 367.

1780. "Adjoining the glacis of Fort St. George, to the northward, is a large town commonly called the Black Town, and which is fortified sufficiently to prevent any surprise by a body of horse."—Hodges, p. 6.

" . . . Cadets upon their arrival in the country, many of whom . . . are obliged to take up their residence in dirty punch-houses in the Black Town. . ."—Munro's Narrative, 22.

Black Wood. The popular name for what is in England termed 'rose-wood;' produced chiefly by several species of Dalbergia, and from which the celebrated carved furniture of Bombay is made.—See Sissoo.

1879. (In Babylonia). "In a mound to the south of the mass of city ruins called Jum-juma, Mr. Rassam discovered the remains of a rich hall or palace . . . the cornices were of painted brick, and the roof of rich Indian blackwood."—Athenæum, July 5, 22.

Blanks, s. This word is used for 'whites' or 'Europeans' (Port. branco) in the following, but we know not if anywhere else in English:

1718. "The Heathens . . . too shy to venture into the Churches of the Blanks (so they call the Christians), since these were generally adorned with fine cloaths and all manner of proud apparel."—(Ziegenbalg and Plutsch), Propagation of the Gospel, &c. Pt. I. 3rd ed. p. 70.

Blimbee, s. Malayāl. vilimbi; Hind. belambū, Malay. bālimbing. The fruit of Averrhoa bilimbi, L. The genus was so called by Linnaeus in honour of Averrhoes, the Arab commentator on Aristotle and Avicenna. It embraces two species cultivated in India for their fruits; neither known in a wild state. See for the other, Cumrunga.

Bloodsucker, s. A harmless lizard (Lacerta cristata) is so called, because when excited it changes in colour (especially about the neck) from a dirty yellow or grey, to a dark red.

1810. "On the morn, however, I discovered it to be a large lizard, termed a blood-sucker."—Morton's Life of Leyden, 110.

Bobachee, s. A cook (male). This is an Anglo-Indian vulgarisation of bāwarchī, a term originally brought, according to Hammer, by the hordes of Chingiz Khan into Western Asia. At the Mongol Court the Bāwarchī was a high dignitary, 'Lord Sewer' or the like (see Hammer's Golden Horde, 235, 461). The late Prof. A. Schiefner, however, stated to us that he could not trace a Mongol original for the word, which appears to be Or. Turki.

c. 1333. "Chaque émir a un bāwerdjy, et lorsque la table a été dressée, cet officier s'assied devant son maître . . . le bāwerdjy coupe la viande en petits morceaux. Ces gens-là possèdent une grande habileté pour dépecer la viande."—In Babuta, ii. 407.

c. 1590. Bāwarchī is the word used for cook in the original of the Ain (Blochmann's Eng. Tr. i. 58).

1810. ". . . the dripping . . . is returned to the meat by a bunch of feathers . . . tied to the end of a short stick. This little neat, cleanly, and cheap dripping-ladle, answers admirably; it being in the power of the babachy to baste any part with great precision."—Williamson, V. M. i. 238.

"And every night and morning
The bobachee shall kill
The sempiternal moorghee,
And we'll all have a grill,"

The Dawk Bungalow, 223.

Bobachee-Connah, s. H. Bāwarchī-khāna, 'Cook-house,' i.e. Kitchen; generally in a cottage detached from the residence of a European household.

Bobby-bob! interj. The Anglo-Indian colloquial representation of a common exclamation of Hindus when in surprise or grief—'Bāp-re! or Bāp-re Bāp' 'O, Father!' (we have known a friend from north of Tweed whose ordinary interjection was 'My great-grandmother!'). Blumenroth's Philippine Vocabulary gives Nacū != Madre mia! as a vulgar exclamation of admiration.

1834. "They both hastened to the spot, where the man lay senseless, and the syce by his side muttering Bāpre bāpre."—The Baboo, i. 48.

1830. "When the band struck up (my Arab) was much frightened, made bobby, set his foot in a hole and nearly pitched me."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2d ed. 106.

1866. "But what is the meaning of all this bobby?"—The Dawk-Bungalow, p. 387.

Bobby is used in 'pigeon English,' and of course a Chinese origin is found for it, viz., pa-pi, Cantonese, 'a noise.'

Bobby-pack, s. A pack of hounds of different breeds, or (oftener) of no breed at all, wherewith young officers hunt jackals or the like; presumably so-called from the noise and disturbance that such a pack are apt to raise. And hence a 'scratch pack' of any kind, as a 'scratch match' at cricket, &c. (See a quotation under Bunow).

1878. "... on the mornings when the 'bobbera' pack went out, of which Macpherson was 'master,' and I 'whip,' we used to be up by 4 A.M."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 142.

The following occurs in a letter received from an old Indian by one of the authors, some years ago:

"What a Cabinet — has put together! — a regular bobby-pack."

Bocca Tigris, n.p. The name applied to the estuary of the Canton River. It appears to be an inaccurate reproduction of the Portuguese Boca do Tigre, and that to be a rendering of the Chinese name Hu-Mén, "Tiger Gate." Hence in the second quotation Tigris is supposed to be the name of the river.

1747. "At 8 o'clock we passed the Bog of Tyggers, and at noon the Lyon's Tower."—A Voy. to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748.

1770. "The City of Canton is situated on the banks of the Tigris, a large river . . ."—Raynal (tr. 1777) ii. 258.

Bocha, s. H. bochā. A kind of chair-palankin formerly in use in Bengal, but now quite forgotten.

1810. "Ladies are usually conveyed about Calcutta . . . in a kind of palanquin called a bochah . . . being a compound of our sedan chair with the body of a chariot. . . I should have observed that most of the gentlemen residing at Calcutta ride in bochahs."—Williamson, V. M. i. 322.

Bogue, n.p. This name is applied by seamen to the narrows at the mouth of the Canton River, and is a corruption of Boca.—(See Bocca Tigris.)

Boliah, Bauleah, s. Beng. Bāūlia. A kind of light accommodation boat with a cabin, in use on the Bengal rivers. We do not find the word in any of the dictionaries. Ives, in the middle of last century, describes it as a boat very long, but so narrow that only one man could sit in the breadth, though it carried a multitude of rowers. This is not the character of the boat so-called now.

1757. "To get two bolias, a Goordore, and 87 dandies from the Nazir."—Ives, 157.

1810. "On one side the picturesque boats of the natives, with their floating huts; on the other the bolios and pleasure-boats of the English."—Maria Graham, 142.

1811. "The extreme lightness of its construction gave it incredible . . . speed. An example is cited of a Governor General who in his Bawaleea performed in 8 days the voyage from Lucknow to Calcutta, a distance of 400 marine leagues."—Solymns, iii. The drawing represents a very light skiff, with only a small kiosque at the stern.

1824. "We found two Bholiahs, or large row-boats, with convenient cabins. . . ."—Heber, i. 26.

1834. "Rivers's attention had been attracted by seeing a large beauliah in the act of swinging to the tide."—Baboo, i. 14.

Bolta, s. A turn of a rope. See Hind. from Port. volta (Roebuck).

Bombasa, n.p. The Island of Mombasa, off the E. African coast, is so called in some old works. Bombāsi is used in Persia for a negro slave, see quotation.

1516. "... Another island, in which there is a city of the Moors called Bombaza, very large and beautiful."—Barbosa, 11. See also Colonial Papers under 1609, i. 188.

1883. "... the Bombassi, or coal-black negro of the interior, being of much less price, and usually only used as a cook."—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.

Bombay, n.p. It has been alleged, often and positively (as in the quotations below from Fryer and Grose) that this name is an English corruption from the Portuguese Bombahia, 'good bay.' The grammar of the alleged etymon is bad, and the history is no better; for the name can be traced long before the Portuguese occupation, long before the arrival of the Portuguese in India. C. 1430, we find the islands of Mahim and Mumba-Devi, which united form the existing island of Bombay, held, along with Salsette, by a Hindu Rāi, who was tributary to the Mahommedan King of Guzerat. (See Rās Mālā, ii. 350.) The same form reappears (1516) in Barbosa's Tana-Mayambu (p. 68), in the Estado da India under 1525, and (1563) in Garcia De Orta, who writes both Mombaim and Bombaim. The latter author, mentioning the excellence of the areca produced there, speaks of himself as having had a grant of the island from the King of Portugal (see below). It is customarily called Bombaim on the earliest English Rupee coinage.—See under Rupee. The shrine of the goddess Mumba-Devi from which the name is supposed to have been taken, stood on the Esplanade till the middle of last century, when it was removed to its present site in the middle of what is now the most frequented part of the native town.

1507. "Sultan Mahommed Bigarrahal of Guzerat having carried an army against Chaiwal, in the year of the Hijra 913, in order to destroy the Europeans, he effected his designs against the towns of Bassai (Bassein, q. v.) and Manbai, and returned to his own capital. . . ."—Mirat-i-Ahmedi (Bird's transl.) 214-15.

1516. . . . "a fortress of the before-named King (of Guzerat), called Tana mayambu, and near it is a Moorish town, very pleasant, with many gardens . . . a town of very great Moorish mosques, and temples of worship of the Gentiles . . . it is likewise a sea port, but of little trade."—Barbosa, 69.

The name here appears to combine, in a common oriental fashion, the names of the adjoining town of Thāna (q. v.) and Bombay.

1525. "E a Ilha dez Mombaym, que no forall velho estaua em catorze mill e quatro cento fedias . . . j<sup>o</sup> xiiij. iiiij. fedias.

"E os anos otros estaua arrendada por mill trezentos setenta e cinque pardaos . . . j<sup>o</sup> iiiij. lxxv. pardaos.

"Hoy aforada a mestre Dioguo pelo dito governador, por mill quatro centos trinta dous pardaos méo . . . j<sup>o</sup> iiiij. xxxij. pardaos méo."—Tombo do Estado da India, 160-161.

1552. . . . "a small stream called Bate which runs into the Bay of Bombain, and which is regarded as the demarcation between the Kingdom of Guzerate and the Kingdom of Decan."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

"The Governor advanced against Bombaym on the 6th February, which was moreover the very day on which Ash Wednesday fell."—Couto, iv., v. 5.

1554. "Item of Mazaguao 8500 fedcas. Item of Monbaym, 17,000 fedcas.

Rents of the lands surrendered by the King of Canbaya in 1543, from 1535 to 1548."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 139.

1563. "... and better still is (that the areca) of Mombaim, an estate and island which the King our Lord has graciously granted me on perpetual lease."—Garcia De Orta, f. 91 v.

"SERVANT. Sir, here is Simon Toscano your tenant at Bombaim, who has brought this basket of mangoes for you to make a present to the Governor; and he says that when he has moored his vessel he will come here to put up."—Ibid. f. 134 v.

1644. "Description of the Port of Mombaym . . . The Viceroy Conde de Linhares sent the 8 councillors to fortify this Bay, so that no European enemy should be able to enter. These Ministers visited the place, and were of opinion that the width (of the entrance) being so great, becoming even wider and more unobstructed further in, there was no place that you could fortify so as to defend the entrance . . ."—Bocarro, MS. f. 227.

1666. "Ces Tchérons . . . demeurent pour la plupart à Baroche, à Bambaye et à Amedabad."—Thévenot, v. 40.

"De Bacaim à Bombaim il y a six lieues."—Ib. 248.

1673. "December the Eighth we paid our Homage to the Union-flag flying on the Fort of Bombaim."—Fryer, 59.

* "Terra e ilha de que El-Rei nosso senhor me fez mercê, aforada em fatiota." Em fatiota is a corruption apparently of emphyteuta, i.e. properly the person to whom land was granted on a lease such as the Civil Law called emphyteusis. "The emphyteuta was a perpetual lessee who paid a perpetual rent to the owner."—English Cyc. s.v. Emphyteusis.

1673. "Bombaim . . . ventures furthest out into the Sea, making the Mouth of a spacious Bay, from whence it has its Etymology; Bombaim."—Id. 62.

1676. "Since the present King of England married the Princess of Portugall, who had in Portion the famous Port of Bombeye . . . they coin both Silver, Copper, and Tinn."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 6.

1677. "Quod dicta Insula de Bombaim, una cum dependentiis suis, nobis ab origine bonâ fide ex pacto (sicut oportuit) tradita non fuerit."—King Charles II. to the Viceroy L. de Mendoza Furtado, in Descn., &c., of the Port and Island of Bombay, 1724, p. 77.

1690. "This Island has its Denomination from the Harbour, which . . . was originally called Boon Bay, i.e. in the Portuguese Language, a Good Bay or Harbour."—Ovington, 129.

1711. Lockyer declares it to be impossible, with all the Company's Strength and Art, to make Bombay "a Mart of great Business."—P. 83.

c. 1760. . . . "One of the most commodious bays perhaps in the world, from which distinction it received the denomination of Bombay, by corruption from the Portuguese Buona-Bahia, though now usually written by them Bombaim."—Grose, i. 29.

1770. "No man chose to settle in a country so unhealthy as to give rise to the proverb, That at Bombay a man's life did not exceed two monsoons."—Raynal (E. T. 1777) i. 389.

1809. "The largest pagoda in Bombay is in the Black Town. . . . It is dedicated to Momba Devee . . . who by her images and attributes seems to be Parvati, the wife of Siva."—Maria Graham, 14.

Bombay Box-work. This well-known manufacture, consisting in the decoration of boxes, desks, &c., with veneers of geometrical mosaic, somewhat after the fashion of Tunbridge ware, is said to have been introduced from Shiraz to Surat a century ago, and some 30 years later from Surat to Bombay. The veneers are formed by cementing together fine triangular prisms of ebony, ivory, green-stained ivory, stag's horn, and tin, so that the sections when sawn across form the required pattern, and such thin sections are then attached to the panels of the box with strong glue.

Bombay Duck.—See Bummelo.

Bombay Marine. This was the title borne for many years by the meritorious but somewhat depressed service which in 1830 acquired the style of the "Indian Navy," and on 30th April, 1863, ceased to exist. The detachments of this force which took part in the China War (1841-42) were known to their brethren of the Royal Navy, under the temptation of alliteration, as the "Bombay Buccaneers." In their earliest employment against the pirates of Western India and the Persian Gulf, they had been known as "the Grab Service." But, no matter for these names, the history of this Navy is full of brilliant actions and services. We will quote two noble examples of public virtue!

(1) In July, 1811, a squadron under Commodore John Hayes, took two large junks issuing from Batavia, then under blockade. These were lawful prize, laden with Dutch property, valued at £600,000. But Hayes knew that such a capture would create great difficulties, and embarrassments in the English trade at Canton; and he directed the release of this splendid prize.

(2) 30th June, 1815, Lieut. Boyce in the brig 'Nautilus' (180 tons, carrying ten 18-pr. carronades, and four 9-prs.) encountered the U. S. sloop-of-war 'Peacock' (539 tons, carrying twenty 32-pr. carronades, and two long 18-prs.). After he had informed the American of the ratification of peace, Boyce was peremptorily ordered to haul down his colours, which he answered by a flat refusal. The 'Peacock' opened fire, and a short but brisk action followed, in which Boyce and his first lieutenant were shot down. The gallant Boyce had a special pension from the Company (£435 in all), and lived to his 93rd year to enjoy it.*

We take the facts from the History of this Navy by one of its officers, Lieut. C. R. Low.

1780. "The Hon. Company's schooner, Carinjar, with Lieut. Murry Commander, of the Bombay Marines is going to Archin (sic, see Acheen) to meet the Ceres and the other Europe ships from Madras, to put on board of them the St. Helena stores."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 8th.

Bonito, s. A fish (Thynnus pelamys, Day) of the same family (Scombridæ) as mackerel and tunny, very common in the Indian Seas. The name is Portuguese, and apparently is the adj. bonito, 'fine.'

c. 1610. "On y pesche vne quantité

* Lieut. Low erroneously stated the pension to be from the United States Govt. (H. of Ind. Navy, i. 294).

admirable de gros poissons, de sept ou huit sortes, qui sont néanmoins quasi de même race et espèce . . . comme bonites, albaciores, daurades, et autres."—Pyrrard, i. 137.

1615. "Bonitoes and albicores are in colour, shape, and taste much like to Mackerils, but grow to be very large."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1464.

c. 1620.

"How many sail of well-mann'd ships
As the Bonito does the Flying-fish
Have we pursued. . . ."

Beaum. & Flët., The Double Marriage, ii. 1.

c. 1760. "The fish undoubtedly takes its name from relishing so well to the taste of the Portuguese . . . that they call it Bonito, which answers in our tongue to delicious."—Grose, i. 5.

"While on the yard-arm the harpooner sits, Strikes the boneta, or the shark ensnares."—Grainger, B. ii.

1773. "The Captain informed us he had named his ship the Bonnetta, out of gratitude to Providence; for once . . . the ship in which he then sailed was becalmed for five weeks, and during all that time, numbers of the fish Bonnetta swam close to her, and were caught for food; he resolved therefore that the ship he should next get, should be called the Bonnetta."—Boswell, Journal of a Tour, &c., under Oct. 16, 1773.

Bonze, s. A term long applied by Europeans in China to the Buddhist clergy, but originating with early visitors to Japan. Its origin is however not quite clear. The Chinese Fan-seng, 'a religious person,' is in Japanese pron. bonzi or bonzō; but Köppen prefers fū-sze, 'Teacher of the Law,' pron. in Japanese bo-zi.* It will be seen that some of the old quotations favour one, and some the other of these sources. On the other hand Bundhya (for Skt. vandhya, 'to whom worship or reverence is due, very reverend') seems to be applied in Nepal to the Buddhist clergy, and Hodgson considers the Japanese bonze (bonzō?) traceable to this. (Essays, 1874, p. 63.) The same word, as bandhe or bande, is in Tibetan similarly applied.—(See Jaeschke's Dict. p. 365.)

The word first occurs in Jorge Alvarez's account of Japan, and next, a little later, in the letters of St. Francis Xavier. Cocks in his Diary uses forms approaching boze.

1549. "I find the common secular people here less impure and more obedient to reason than their priests whom they call bonzos."—Letter of St. F. Xavier, in Coleridge's Life, ii. 238.

1552. "Erubescunt enim, et incredibiliter confunduntur Bonzii, ubi male cohaerere, ac pugnare inter sese ea, quae docent, palam ostenditur."—Scti. Fr. Xaverii Epist. V. xvii., ed. 1607.

1572. ". . . sacerdotes . . . qui ipsorum linguā Bonzii appellantur."—E. Acosta, 58.

1585. "They have amongst them (in Japan) many priests of their idols whom they do call Bonsos, of the which there be great convents."—Parkes's Tr. of Mendoza, (1589) ii. 300.

c. 1606. "Capt. Saris has Bonzees."—Purchas, i. 374.

1618. "And their is 300 boze (or pagon pristes) have allowance and mentaynance for eaver to pray for his sole, in the same sorte as munkes and fryres use to doe amongst the Roman papistes."—Cocks, ii. 75.

He also spells bosses (i. 143).

1727. ". . . "Or perhaps make him fadge in a China bonzee in his Calendar, under the name of a Christian Saint."—A. Ham. i. 253.

Bora, s. Hind. and Guz. bohrā, and bohorā, which H. H. Wilson refers to the Sansk. vyavahārī, 'a trader, or man of affairs,' from which are formed the ordinary Hind. words byoharā, byohariyā (and a Guzerati form which comes very near bohorā). This is confirmed by the quotation from Nurullah below, but it is not quite certain. Dr. John Wilson (see below) gives an Arabic derivation which we have been unable to verify.

There are two classes of Bohrās belonging to different Mahomedan sects, and different in habit of life.

1. The Shī'a Bohrās, who are essentially townspeople, and especially congregate in Surat, Burhanpur, Uj-jain, &c. They are those best known far and wide by the name, and are usually devoted to trading and money-lending. Their original seat was in Guzerat, and they are most numerous there, and in the Bombay territory generally, but are also to be found in various parts of Central India and the N.-W. Provinces. The word in Bombay is often used as synonymous with pedlar or boxwālā (q.v.). They are generally well-to-do people, keeping very cleanly and comfortable houses.

These Bohrās appear to form one of the numerous Shi'a sects, akin in character to, and apparently of the same origin as, the Ismāliyah (or Assassins of the Middle Ages), and claim as their original head and doctor in India one Ya'kūb, who emigrated from Egypt, and landed at Cambay A.D. 1137. But the chief seat of the doctrine is alleged to have been in Yemen, till that country was conquered by the Turks in 1538. A large exodus of the sect to India then took place. Like the Ismālis they attach a divine character to their Mullah or chief Pontiff, who now resides at Surat. They are guided by him in all things, and they pay him a percentage on their profits. But there are several sectarian subdivisions. Dāūdī Bohrās, Sulaimānī Bohrās, &c.

2. The Sunni Bohrās. These are very numerous in the Northern Concan and Guzerat. They are essentially peasants, sturdy, thrifty, and excellent cultivators, retaining much of Hindu habit; and are, though they have dropped caste distinctions, very exclusive and "denominational" (as the Bombay Gazetteer expresses it). Exceptionally, at Pattan (in Baroda State) there is a rich and thriving community of trading Bohrās of the Sunni section; they have no intercourse with their Shi'a namesakes.

The history of the Bohrās is still very obscure; nor does it seem ascertained whether the two sections were originally one. Some things indicate that the Shi'a Bohrās may be, in accordance with their tradition, in some considerable part of foreign descent, and that the Sunni Bohrās, who are unquestionably of Hindu descent, may have been native converts of the foreign immigrants, afterwards forcibly brought over to Sunnism by the Guzerat Sultans. But all this must be said with much reserve. The history is worthy of investigation.

The quotation from Ibn Batuta, which refers to Gandari on the Baroda river, south of Cambay, alludes most probably to the Bohrās, and may perhaps, though not necessarily, indicate

c. 1343. "When we arrived at Kandahār . . . we received a visit from the principal Muslims dwelling at his (the pagan King's) Capital, such as the Children of Khajah Bohrah, among whom was the Nākhoda Ibrahim, who had 6 vessels belonging to him."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 58.

c. 1620. Nurullah of Shuster, quoted by Colebrooke, speaks of this class as having been converted to Islam 300 years before. He says also: "Most of them subsist by commerce and mechanical trades; as is indicated by the name Bohrah, which signifies 'merchant' in the dialect of Gujerat."—In As. Res., vii. 338.

1673. " . . . The rest (of the Mahomedans) are adopted under the name of the Province or Kingdom they are born in, as Mogul . . . or Schisms they have made, as Bilham, Jemottec, and the lowest of all is Borrah."—Fryer, 93.

1810. "The Borahs are an inferior set of travelling merchants. The inside of a Borah's box is like that of an English country shop, spelling-books, prayer-books, lavender water, eau de luce, soap, tapes, scissors, knives, needles, and thread make but a small part of the variety."—Maria Graham, 33.

1825. "The Boras (at Broach) in general are unpopular, and held in the same estimation for parsimony that the Jews are in England."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 119; also see 72.

1853. "I had the pleasure of baptizing Ismail Ibrahim, the first Bohorā who, as far as we know, has yet embraced Christianity in India. . . . He appears thoroughly divorced from Muhammad, and from 'Ali the son-in-law of Muhammad, whom the Bohoris or Initeds, according to the meaning of the Arabic word, from which the name is derived, esteem as an improvement on his father-in-law, having a higher degree of inspiration, which has in good measure, as they imagine, manifested itself among his successors, recognised by the Borahs and by the Ansariyah, Ismāliyah, Drus, and Meta-wileh of Syria. . . ."—Letter of Dr. John Wilson, in Life, p. 456.

1863. " . . . India, between which and the north-east coast of Africa, a considerable trade is carried on, chiefly by Borah merchants of Guzerat and Cutch."—Badger, Introd. to Varthema, Hak. Soc. xlix.

Borneo, n.p. This name, as applied to the great Island in its entirety, is taken from that of the chief Malay state existing on it when it became known to Europeans, Bruné, Burné, Brunai or Burnai, still existing and known as Brunei.

1516. "In this island much camphor for eating is gathered, and the Indians value it highly. . . . This island is called Borney."—Barbosa, 203-4.

1584. "Camphora from Brimeo (misreading probably for Bruneo) neare to China."—Barret, in Hakl., ii. 412.

1614. In Sainsbury, i. 313, it is written Burnea.

1727. "The great island of Borneo or Borneo, the largest except California, in the known world."—A. Ham. ii. 44.

Boro-Bodor, or -Budur, n.p. The name of a great Buddhistic monument of Indian character in the district of Kadū in Java; one of the most remarkable in the world. It is a quasi-pyramidal structure occupying the summit of a hill, which apparently forms the core of the building. It is quadrangular in plan, the sides however broken by successive projections; each side of the basement, 406 feet. Including the basement, it rises in six successive terraces, four of them forming corridors, the sides of which are panelled with bas-reliefs, which Mr. Fergusson calculates would, if extended in a single line, cover three miles of ground. These represent scenes in the life of Sakya Muni, scenes from the Jatakas, or pre-existences of Sakya, and other series of Buddhistic groups. Above the corridors the structure becomes circular, rising in three shallower stages, bordered with small dagobas (72 in number), and a large dagoba crowns the whole. The 72 dagobas are hollow, built in a kind of stone lattice, and each contains, or has contained, within, a stone Buddha in the usual attitude. In niches of the corridors also are numerous Buddhas larger than life and about 400 in number. Mr. Fergusson concludes from various data that this wonderful structure must date from A.D. 650 to 800.

This monument is not mentioned in Valentijn's great History of the Dutch Indies (1726), nor does its name ever seem to have reached Europe till Sir Stamford Raffles, the British Lieut.-Governor of Java, visited the district in January, 1814. The structure was then covered with soil and vegetation, even with trees of considerable size. Raffles caused it to be cleared, and drawings and measurements to be made. His History of Java, and Crawford's Hist. of the Indian Archipelago, made it known to the world. The Dutch Government in 1874 published a great collection of illustrative plates, with a descriptive text.

The meaning of the name by which this monument is known in the neighbourhood has been much debated. Raffles writes it Bóro Bólo. The most probable interpretation, and that accepted by Friedrich and other scholars of weight, is that of 'Myriad Buddhas.' This would be in some analogy to another famous Buddhist monument in a neighbouring district, at Bram-banan, which is called Chandi Sewu, or the "Thousand Temples," though the number has been really 238.

Bosh, s. and interj. This is alleged to be taken from the Turkish bosh, signifying "empty, vain, useless, void of sense, meaning or utility" (Red-house's Dict.). But we have not been able to trace its history or first appearance in English.

Bosmán, Bochmán, s. Boatswain. Lascar's Hind. (Roebuck).

Botickeer, s. Port. botiqueiro. A shop or stall-keeper.—See Boutique.

1567. "Item, pareceo que . . . os botiqueiros não tenham as buticas apertas nos dias de festa, senão depois la messa da terça."—Decree 31 of Council of Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 4.

1727. ". . . He past all over, and was forced to relieve the poor Botickeers or Shopkeepers, who before could pay him Taxes."—A. Ham., i. 268.

Bo Tree, s. The name given in Ceylon to the Pippal tree (see Peepul) as revered by the Buddhists. Singh. bo-gās.—See in Emerson Tennent, ii. 632 seqq., a chronological series of notices of the Bo-tree from B.C. 288 to A.D. 1739.

1675. "Of their (the Veddas) worship there is little to tell, except that like the Cingaleze, they set round the high trees Bogas, which our people call Paod-trees, with a stone base and put lamps upon it."—Ryklof Van Goens in Valentijn (Ceylon), 209.

1681. "I shall mention but one Tree more as famous and highly set by as any of the rest, if not more so, tho it bear no fruit, the benefit consisting chiefly in the Holiness of it. This tree they call Bogahah; we the God-Tree."—Knor, 18.

Bottle-Tree, s. Qu. Adansonia digitata, or 'baobab?' Its aspect is somewhat suggestive of the name, but we have not been able to ascertain.

1880. "Look at this prisoner slumbering peacefully under the suggestive bottle-tree."—Ali Baba, 153.

Boutique, s. A common word in Ceylon and the Madras Presidency (to which it is now peculiar) for a small native shop or booth: Port. butica or botea. From Bluteau (Suppt.) it would seem that the use of butica was peculiar to Portuguese India.

1554. "... nas quaes buticas ninguém pode vender senão os que se concertam com o Rendeiro."—Botelho, Tombo do Estado da Índia, 50.

c. 1561. "The Malabars who sold in the botecas."—Correa, i. 2, 267.

Bowla, s. A portmanteau. Hind. bāola, from Port. barul, and bahu, 'a trunk.'

Bowly, Bowry, s. Hind. bāolī and bāorī, Mahr. bāvādi. C. P. Brown (Zillah Dict. s.v.) says it is the Tel. bāvidi; bāvī and bāvidi = 'well.' This is doubtless the same word, but in all its forms it is probably connected with Sansk. vavra, 'a hole, a well,' or with vāpi, 'an oblong reservoir, a pool or lake.' There is also in Singhalese vāva, 'a lake or pond,' and in inscriptions vaviya. There is again Maldivian vevu, 'a well,' which comes near the Guzerati forms mentioned below. A great and deep rectangular well (or tank dug down to the springs), furnished with a descent to the water by means of long flights of steps, and generally with landings and loggie where travellers may rest in the shade. This kind of structure, almost peculiar to Western and Central India, though occasionally met with in Northern India also, is a favourite object of private native munificence, and though chiefly beneath the level of the ground, is often made the subject of most effective architecture. Some of the finest specimens are in Guzerat, where other forms of the word appear to be wāo and wāin.

One of the most splendid of these structures is at Asārwa in the suburbs of Ahmedabad, known as the Well of Dhāi (or 'the Nurse') Harīr, built in 1485 by a lady of the household of Sultan Mahommed Bigara (that famous 'Prince of Cambay' celebrated by Butler—see under Cambay), at a cost of 3 lakhs of rupees.

There is an elaborate model of a great Guzerati bāolī in the India Museum at S. Kensington.

We have seen in the suburbs of Palermo a regular bāolī, excavated in the tufaceous rock that covers the plain. It was said to have been made at the expense of an ancestor of the present proprietor (Count Ranchibile) to employ people in a time of scarcity.

c. 1343. "There was also a bāin, a name by which the Indians designate a very spacious kind of well, revetted with stone, and provided with steps for descent to the water's brink. Some of these wells have in the middle and on each side pavilions of stone, with seats and benches. The Kings and chief men of the country rival each other in the construction of such reservoirs on roads that are not supplied with water."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 13.

1775. "Near a village called Sevasee Contra I left the line of march to sketch a remarkable building . . . on a near approach I discerned it to be a well of very superior workmanship, of that kind which the natives call Bhouree or Bhoulie."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 102.

1808. "'Who-so digs a well deserves the love of creatures and the grace of God,' but a Vavidee is said to value 10 Koos (or wells) because the water is available to bipeds without the aid of a rope."—R. Drummond, Illustrations of Guzeratte, &c.

1825. "These boolees are singular contrivances, and some of them extremely handsome and striking. . . ."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 37.

1856. "The wāo (Sansk. vāpikā) is a large edifice of a picturesque and stately as well as peculiar character. Above the level of the ground a row of four or five open pavilions, at regular distances from each other . . . is alone visible. . . . The entrance to the wāo is by one of the end pavilions," &c., &c.—Rās Māla, i. 257.

1876. "To persons not familiar with the East such an architectural object as a bowlee may seem a strange perversion of ingenuity, but the grateful coolness of all subterranean apartments, especially when accompanied by water, and the quiet gloom of these recesses, fully compensate in the eyes of the Hindu for the more attractive magnificence of the ghâts. Consequently the descending flights of which we are now speaking, have often been more elaborate and expensive pieces of architecture than any of the buildings above ground found in their vicinity."—Fergusson, Indian and Eastern Architecture, 486.]

Boxwallah, s. Hybrid Hind. Bakas—(i.e. box) wālā. A native itinerant pedlar, or packman, as he would be called in Scotland by an analogous term. The Boxwālā sells cutlery, cheap nick-nacks and small wares of all kinds, chiefly European. In former days he was a welcome visitor to small stations and solitary bungalows. The Borā of Bombay is often a boxwālā, and the boxwālā in that region is commonly called Borā.—(See Borā.)

In Southern India and in China a native personal servant is so termed, and is habitually summoned with the vocative 'Boy!' The same was formerly common in Jamaica and other W. I. Islands. Similar uses are familiar of puer (e.g. in the Vulgate Dixit Giezi puer Vari Dei. II Kings, v. 20), Ar. walad, παιδάριον, garçon, knabe (Germ. Knabe); and this same word is used for a camp-servant in Shakspeare, when Fluellen says: "Kill the Poys and the luggage!" 'tis expressly against the laws of arms."—See also Grose's Mil. Antiquities, i. 183, and Latin quotation from Xavier under Conecopoly. The word however came to be especially used for 'Slave-boy,' and applied to slaves of any age. The Portuguese used moço in the same way. In 'Pigeon English' also 'servant' is Boy, whilst 'boy' in our ordinary sense is discriminated as 'smallo-boy!'

b. A Palankin-bearer.

From the name of the caste, Telug. and Malayāl. bōyi, Tam. bōvi, &c. Wilson gives bhoi as Hind. and Mahr. also. The word is in use northward at least to the Nerbudda R. In the Konkan, people of this class are called Kahār bhār (see Ind. Ant. ii. 154, iii. 77). P. Paolino is therefore in error, as he often is, when he says that the word boy as applied by the English and other Europeans to the coolies or fachini who carry the dooly, "has nothing to do with any Indian language." In the first and third quotations (under b), the use is more like a, but any connexion with English at the dates seems impossible.

Boya, s. A buoy. Sea Hind. (Roe-buck).

Brab, s. The Palmyra Tree or Borassus flabelliformis. The Portuguese called this Palmeira brava ('wild' palm), whence the English corruption. The term is unknown in Bengal, where the tree is called 'fan-palm,' 'palmyra,' or by the Hind. name tāl or tār.

1623. "The book is made after the fashion of this country, i.e., not of paper which is seldom or never used, but of palm leaves, viz., of the leaves of that which the Portuguese call palmum brama (sic), or wild palm."—P. della Valle, ii. 681.

1809. "The Palmyra . . . here called the brab, furnishes the best leaves for thatching, and the dead ones serve for fuel."—Maria Graham, p. 5.

Brahmin, Brahman, Bramin, s. In some parts of India called Bahman; Sansk. Brāhmaṇa. This word now means a member of the priestly caste, but the original meaning and use were different. Haug (Brahma und die Brahmanen, pp. 8-11) traces the word to the root brīh, 'to increase,' and shows how it has come to have its present signification. The older English form is Brachman, which comes to us through the Greek and Latin authors.

1714. "The Dervis at first made some scruple of violating his promise to the dying brachman."—The Spectator, No. 578.

Brahminy Bull, s. A bull devoted to Śiva and let loose; generally found frequenting Hindu bazars, and fattened by the run of the bunyas' shops.

The term is sometimes used more generally (brahminy bull, -ox, or -cow) to denote the humped Indian ox as a species.

1872. "He could stop a huge Brahmini bull, when running in fury, by catching hold of its horns."—Govinda Samanta, i. 85.

Brahminy Duck, s. The common Anglo-Indian name of the handsome bird Casarca rutila (Pallas), or 'Ruddy Sheldrake'; constantly seen on the sandy shores of the Gangetic rivers in single pairs, the pair almost always at some distance apart. The Hindi name is chakwā, and the chakwā-chakwī (male and female of the species) afford a common-place comparison in Hindi literature for faithful lovers and spouses. "The Hindus have a legend that two lovers for their indiscretion were transformed into Brahminy Ducks, that they are condemned to pass the night apart from each other, on opposite banks of the river, and that all night long each, in its turn, asks its mate if it shall come across, but the question is always met by a negative—"Chakwa, shall I come?" "No, Chakwi." "Chakwi, shall I come?" "No, Chakwa."—(Jerdon).

The same author says the bird is occasionally killed in England.

Brahminy Kite, s. The Milvus Pondicerianus of Jerdon, Haliastur Indus, Boddaert. The name is given because the bird is regarded with some reverence by the Hindus as sacred to Vishnu. It is found throughout India.

c. 1328. "There is also in this India a certain bird, big, like a Kite, having a white head and belly, but all red above, which boldly snatches fish out of the hands of fishermen and other people, and indeed [these birds] go on just like dogs."—Friar Jordanus, 36.

1673. "... 'tis Sacrilege with them to kill a Cow or a Calf; but highly piacular to shoot a Kite, dedicated to the Brachmins, for which Money will hardly pacify."—Fryer, 33.

Brahmo-Somāj. The Bengali pron. of (Sansk.) Brahma Samāja, 'assemblage of Brahmists'; Brahma being the Supreme Being according to the Indian philosophic systems. The reform of Hinduism so called was begun by Ram Mohun Roy (Rāma Mohana Rāi) in 1830. Professor A. Weber has shown that it does not constitute an independent Indian movement, but is derived from European Theism.

1876. "The Brahmo Somaj, or Theistic Church of India, is an experiment hitherto unique in religious history."—Collet, Brahmo Year-book, 5.

Brandul, s. 'Backstay,' in Sea Hind. Port. brandal (Roebuck).

Brandy Coortee, or -coatee, s. Or sometimes simply Brandy. A corruption of bārānī, 'a cloak,' literally pluviale, from Pers. bārān, rain. Bārānī-kurtī seems to be a kind of hybrid shaped by the English word coat, though kurta and kurtī are true Pers. words for various forms of jacket or tunic.

Brandy pawnee, s. Brandy and water. A specimen of genuine Urdū, i.e. Camp jargon, which hardly needs interpretation. Hind. pānī, 'water.' Williamson (1810) has brandy-shraub-pawny (V. M. ii. 123).

1866. "The brandy pawnee of the East, and the 'sangaree' of the West Indies, are happily now almost things of the past, or exist in a very modified form"—Waring, Tropical Resident, 177.

Brass, s. A brace. Sea dialect.
—(Roebuck.)

Bratty, s. A word, used only in the South, for the cakes of dried cowdung, used as fuel more or less all over India. It is Tam. varatti, 'dried dung.' Various terms are current elsewhere, but in Upper India the most common is upla.—Vide Oopla.

Brava, n.p. A sea-port on the east coast of Africa, lat. 1° 7' N., long. 44° 3', properly Barāwa.

1516. "... a town of the Moors, well walled, and built of good stone and white-wash, which is called Brava . . . It is a place of trade, which has already been destroyed by the Portuguese, with great slaughter of the inhabitants . . ."—Barbosa, 15.

Brazil-wood, s. This name is now applied in trade to the dye-wood imported from Pernambuco, which is derived from certain species of Cesalpinia indigenous there. But it originally applied to a dyewood of the same genus which was imported from India, and which is now known in trade as Sappan (q.v.). The history of the word is very curious. For when the name was applied to the newly discovered region in S. America, probably as Barros alleges, because it produced a dye-wood similar in character to the brazil of the East, the trade-name gradually became appropriated to the S. American product, and was taken away from that of the E. Indies. See some further remarks in Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 368-370.

This is alluded to also by Camões (x. 140):

"But here where Earth spreads wider, ye shall claim realms by the ruddy Dye-wood made renown'd:
these of the 'Sacred Cross' shall win the name:
by your first Navy shall that world be found." Burton.

The medieval forms of brazil were many; in Italian it is generally verzi, verzino, or the like.

1330. "And here they burn the brazil-wood (verzino) for fuel. . ."—Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c. p. 77.

1552. "... when it came to the 3d of May, and Pedralvares was about to set sail, in order to give a name to the land thus newly discovered, he ordered a very great Cross to be hoisted at the top of a tree, after mass had been said at the foot of the tree, and it had been set up with the solemn benediction of the priests, and then he gave the country the name of Sancta Cruz. . . But as it was through the symbol of the Cross that the Devil lost his dominion over us . . . as soon as the red wood called Brazil began to arrive from that country, he wrought that that name should abide in the mouth of the people, and that the name of Holy Cross should be lost, as if the name of a wood for colouring cloth were of more moment than that wood which imbues all the sacraments with the tincture of salvation, which is the Blood of Jesus Christ."—Burros, I. v. 2.

1554. "The baar of brazil contains 20 faraçolas, weighing it in a coir rope, and there is no picotaa."—A. Nunes, 18.

1641. "We went to see the Rasp-house where the lusty knaves are compell'd to labour, and the rasping of Brazil and Logwood is very hard labour."—Evelyn's Diary, August.

Bridgemān, s. Anglo-Sepoy Hind. brijmān, denoting a military prisoner, of which word it is a quaint corruption.

Brinjal, s. The name of a vegetable called in the W. Indies the Egg-plant, and more commonly known to the English in Bengal under that of bangun (prop. baingan). It is the Solanum Melongena, L., very commonly cultivated on the shores of the Mediterranean as well as in India and the East generally. Though not known in a wild state under this form, there is no reasonable doubt that S. Melongena is a derivative of the common Indian S. insanum, L. The word in the form brinjal is from the Portuguese, as we shall see. But probably there is no word of the kind which has undergone such an extraordinary variety of modifications, whilst retaining the same meaning, as this.

The Sansk. is bhāṇṭāki, Hind. bhāṇṭā, baigan, baingan, Pers. badīngān, badiṅgān, Arab. badīnjān, Span. alberengena, berengena, Port. beringela, bringela, bringella, Low Latin melangolus, merangolus, Ital. melangola, melanzana, mela insana, &c.—(See P. della Valle, below), French aubergine (from alberengena), melongène, merangène, and provincially belingène, albergaine, albergine, albergame. (See Marcel Devic, p. 46.) Littré, we may remark, explains (dormitante Homero?) aubergine as 'espèce de morelle,' giving the etym. as "diminutif de auberger" (in the sense of a kind of peach). Melongena is no real Latin word, but a factitious

It looks as if the Sansk. word were the original of all. The Hind. baingan again seems to have been modified from the Pers. badīngān, and the latter also through the Arabic to have been the parent of the Spanish berengena and so of all the other European names except the English "egg-plant." The Italian mela insana is the most curious of these corruptions, framed by the usual effort after meaning, and connecting itself with the somewhat indigestible reputation of the vegetable as it is eaten in Italy, which is a fact. When cholera is abroad it is considered (e.g. in Sicily) to be an act of folly to eat the melanzana. There is however, behind this, some notion (exemplified in the quotation from Lane's Egyptians below) connecting the badīngān with madness. And it would seem that the old Arab medical writers give it a bad character as an article of diet. Thus Avicenna says the badīngān generates melancholy and obstructions. To the N. O. Solanaceae many poisonous plants belong.

The word has been carried, with the vegetable, to the Archipelago, probably by the Portuguese, for the Malays call it berinjala.

1554. (At Goa.) "And the excise from garden stuff under which are comprised these things, viz.: Radishes, beetroot, garlick, onions green and dry, green tamarinds, lettuces, combalinguas (?), ginger, oranges, dill, coriander, mint, cabbage, salted mangoes, brinjelas, lemons, gourds, citrons, cucumbers, which articles none may sell in retail except the Rendeiro of this excise, or some one who has got permission from him . . ."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 49.

c. 1580. "Trifolium quoque virens comedunt Arabes, mentham Judaici crudam, . . . mala insana. . ."—Prosper Alpinus, i. 65.

1611. "We had a market there kept upon the Strand of diuers sorts of prouisions, towit . . . Pallingenis, cucumbers . . ."—N. Downton, in Purchas, i. 298.

1616. "It seems to me to be one of those fruits which are called in good Tuscan petronciani, but which by the Lombards are called melanzane, and by the vulgar at Rome marignani; and if my memory does not deceive me, by the Neapolitans in their patois molegnane."—P. della Valle, i. 197.

1738. "Then follow during the rest of the summer, calabashes . . . bedin-janas, and tomatas."—Shaw's Travels, 2d ed. 1757, p. 141.

c. 1740. "This man (Balaji Rao), who had become absolute in Hindostan as well as in Decan, was fond of bread made of Badjah . . . he lived on raw Bringelas, on unripe mangoes, and on raw red pepper."—Seir Mutakherin, iii. 229.

1782. Sonnerat writes Béringédes.—i. 186.

1783. Forrest spells brinjalles (V. to Merqui, 40); and (1810) Williamson biringal (V. M. i. 133). Forbes (1813), biringal and berenjal (Or. Mem., i. 32, ii. 50).

1810. "I saw last night at least two acres covered with brinjaal, a species of Solanum."—Maria Graham, 24.

1826. "A plate of poached eggs, fried in sugar and butter; a dish of badenjans, slit in the middle and boiled in grease."—Hajji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 150.

1835. "The neighbours unanimously declared that the husband was mad . . . One exclaimed: 'There is no strength nor power but in God! God restore thee!' Another said: 'How sad! He was really a worthy man.' A third remarked: 'Badingāns are very abundant just now.'"—Lane, Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1860, 299.

1860. "Amongst other triumphs of the native cuisine were some singular, but by no means inelegant chefs d'œuvre, brinjals boiled and stuffed with savoury meats, but exhibiting ripe and undressed fruit growing on the same branch."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 161.

This dish is mentioned in the Sanskrit Cookery Book, which passes as by King Nala. It is managed by wrapping part of the fruit in wet cloths whilst the rest is being cooked.

Brinjarry, s. Also Binjarree, Bunjarree, and so on. But the first form has become classical from its constant occurrence in the Indian Despatches of Sir Arthur Wellesley. The word is properly Hind. banjārā, and Wilson derives it from Skt. banij, 'trade.' It is possible that the form brinjārā may have been suggested by a supposed connexion with the Pers. birinj, 'rice,' (It is alleged in the Dict. of Words used in the E. Indies, 2nd ed. 1805, to be derived from brinj, 'rice,' and ara, 'bring'!). The Brinjarries of the Decan are dealers in grain and salt, who move about, in numerous parties, with cattle, carrying their goods to different markets, and who in the days of the Decan wars were the great resource of the commissariat, as they followed the armies with supplies for sale. They talk a kind of Mahratta or Hindi patois.

Most classes of Banjārās in the west appear to have a tradition of having first come to the Decan with Moghul camps as commissariat carriers.

In a pamphlet called Some Account of the Bunjarrah Class, by N. R. Cumberlege, District Sup. of Police, Basein, Berar. Bombay, 1882, the author attempts to distinguish between brinjarees as 'grain-carriers,' and bunjarrahs, from bunjār, 'waste land' (meaning bānjār, or bānjar). But this seems fanciful.

In the N.W. Provinces the name is also in use, and is applied to a numerous tribe spread along the skirt of the Himalaya from Hardwār to Gorakpur, some of whom are settled, whilst the rest move about with their cattle, sometimes transporting goods for hire, and sometimes carrying grain, salt, lime, forest produce, or other merchandize for sale.

Vanjāras, as they are called about Bombay, used to come down from Rajputana and Central India, with large droves of cattle, laden with grain, &c., taking back with them salt for the most part. These were not mere carriers, but the actual dealers, paying ready money, and they were orderly in conduct.

c. 1505. "As scarcity was felt in his camp (Sultan Sikandar Lodi's) in consequence of the non-arrival of the Banjāras, he despatched 'Azam Humāyūn for the purpose of bringing in supplies."—Ni'amat Ullah, in Elliot, v. 100 (written c. 1612).

1516. "The Moors and Gentiles of the cities and towns throughout the country come to set up their shops and cloths at Cheul . . . they bring these in great caravans of domestic oxen, with packs, like donkeys, and on the top of these long white sacks placed crosswise, in which they bring their goods; and one man drives 30 or 40 beasts before him."—Barbosa, 71.

1563. " . . . This King of Dely took the Balagat from certain very powerful gentoos, whose tribe are those whom we now call Venezaras, and from others dwelling in the country, who are called Colles; and all these, Colles, and Venezaras, and Reisbutois, live by theft and robbery to this day."—Garcia De O, f. 34.

c. 1632. "The very first step which Mohabut Khan [Khān Khānān] took in the Deccan, was to present the Bunjaras of Hindostan with elephants, horses, and cloths; and he collected (by these conciliatory measures) so many of them that he had one chief Bunjaras at Agra, another in Goojrat, and another above the Ghats, and established the advanced price of 10 seers per rupee (in his camp) to enable him to buy it cheaper."—MS. Life of Mohabut Khan (Khan Khānān), in Briggs's paper quoted below, 183.

pour le reuendre dans l'Indosthan . . . ou ils vont avec des Chafilas ou Caravances de cinq ou six, et quelque fois de neuf ou dix mille bestes de somme . . ."—Mandelslo, 245.

1793. "Whilst the army halted on the 23d, accounts were received from Captain Read . . . that his convoy of brinjarries had been attacked by a body of horse."—Dirom, 2.

1800. "The Binjarries I look upon in the light of servants of the public, of whose grain I have a right to regulate the sale . . . always taking care that they have a proportionate advantage."—A. Wellesley, in Life of Sir T. Munro, i. 264.

"The Brinjarries drop in by degrees."—Wellington, i. 175.

1810. "Immediately facing us a troop of Brinjarees had taken up their residence for the night. These people travel from one end of India to the other, carrying salt, grain, and assafetida, almost as necessary to an army as salt."—Maria Graham, 61.

1813. "We met there a number of Vanjarrahs, or merchants, with large droves of oxen, laden with valuable articles from the interior country, to commute for salt on the sea-coast."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 206.

"As the Deccan is devoid of a single navigable river, and has no roads that admit of wheel-carriages, the whole of this extensive intercourse is carried on by laden bullocks, the property of that class of people known as Bunjaras."—Acc. of Origin, Hist., and Manners of . . . Bunjaras, by Capt. John Briggs, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 61.

1825. "We passed a large number of Brinjarrees who were carrying salt . . . They . . . had all bows . . . arrows, sword and shield . . . Even the children had, many of them, bows and arrows suited to their strength, and I saw one young woman equipped in the same manner."—Heber, ii. 94.

1877. "They were brinjarries, or carriers of grain, and were quietly encamped at a village about 24 miles off; trading most unsuspiciously in grain and salt."—Meadows Taylor, Life, ii. 17.

Broach, n. p. Bharōch, an ancient and still surviving city of Guzerat, on the River Nerbudda. The original forms of the name are Bhrigu-kachchha, and Bhāru-kachchha, which last form appears in the Sunnar Cave Inscription No. ix., and this was written with fair correctness by the Greeks as Bapvṛyāsa and Bapvōrṇ. "Illiterate Guzerattees would in attempting to articulate Bhreeghoo-Kachetra (sic), lose the half in coalescence, and call it Barigache."—Drummond, Illus. of Guzerattees, &c.

c. B.C. 20. "And then laughing, and stript naked, anointed, and with his loin-cloth on, he leaped upon the pyre. And this inscription was set upon his tomb: Zarmanochēgas the Indian from Bargosē having rendered himself immortal after the hereditary custom of the Indians, lieth here.”—Nicolaus Damascenus in Strabo, xv. 72.

c. A.D. 80. “On the right, at the very mouth of the gulf, there is a long and narrow strip of shoal . . . And if one succeeds in getting into the gulph, still it is hard to hit the mouth of the river leading to Barygaza, owing to the land being so low. . . . and when found it is difficult to enter, owing to the shoals of the river near the mouth. On this account there are at the entrance fishermen employed by the King . . . to meet ships as far off as Syrastrène, and by these they are piloted up to Barygaza.”—Periplus, sect. 43.

It is very interesting to compare Horsburgh with this ancient account. “From the sands of Swallow to Broach a continued bank extends along the shore, which at Broach river projects out about 5 miles . . . The tide flows here . . . velocity 6 knots . . . rising nearly 30 feet. . . . On the north side of the river, a great way up, the town of Broach is situated; vessels of considerable burden may proceed to this place, as the channels are deep in many places, but too intricate to be navigated without a pilot.”—India Directory (in loco).

c. 718. Barūs is mentioned as one of the places against which Arab attacks were directed.—See Elliot, i. 441.

c. 1300. “. . . a river which lays between the Sarsul and Ganges . . . has a south-westerly course till it falls into the sea near Bährūch.”—Al-Birūnī, in Elliot, i. 49.

A.D. 1321. “After their blessed martyrdom, which occurred on the Thursday before Palm Sunday, in Thana of India, I baptized about 90 persons in a certain city called Parocco, 10 days’ journey distant therefrom . . .”—Friar Jordanus, in Cathay, &c., 226.

1552. “A great and rich ship said to belong to Meleque Gupij, Lord of Baroche.”—Barros, II. vi. 2.

1555. “Sultan Ahmed on his part marched upon Barūj.”—Sidi ‘Alī, 85.

1617. Cocks (i. 330) says: “We gave our host . . . a peece of backar (?) baroche to his children to make them 2 coates.”

1623. “Before the hour of complines . . . we arrived at the city of Barochi, or Behrug as they call it in Persian, under the walls of which, on the south side, flows a river called Nerbēdā.”—P. della Valle, ii. 529.

1756. “Bandar of Bhrōch”—(Bird’s tr. of) Mīrat-i-Ahmadi, 115.

1803. “I have the honour to enclose . . . papers which contain a detailed account of the . . . capture of Baroach.”—Wellington, ii. 289.

Buck, v. To prate, to chatter, to talk much and egotistically. Hind. baknā.

1880. “And then . . . he bucks with a quiet stubborn determination that would fill an American editor, or an Under Secretary of State with despair. He belongs to the 12-foot-tiger school, so perhaps he can’t help it.”—Ala Baba, 164.

Buckshaw, s. We have not been able to identify the fish so called, or the true form of the name. Perhaps it is only H. bachcha, Mahr. bachchā, (Pers. bacha, Skt. vatsa), ‘the young of any creature.’ But the Konkani Dictionary gives ‘boussa—peixe pequeno de qualquer sorte,’ ‘little fish of any kind.’ This is perhaps the real word; but it also may represent bachchā. The practice of manuring the coco-palms with putrid fish is still rife, as residents of the Government House at Parell never forget. The fish in use is refuse bummelo (q.v.).

1673. “. . . Cocoe Nuts, for Oyl, which latter they dunging with (Bubsho) Fish, the Land-Breezes brought a poysonous Smell on board Ship.”—Fryer, 55.

1727. “The Air is somewhat unhealthy, which is chiefly imputed to their dunging their Cocoa-nut trees with Buckshoa, a sort of small Fishes which their Sea abounds in.”—A. Ham, i. 181.

c. 1760. “. . . manure for the coco-nut-tree . . . consisting of the small fry of fish, and called by the country name of Buckshaw.”—Grose, i. 31.

Buckshaw, s. This is also used in Cocks’s Diary (i. pp. 63, 99) for some kind of Indian piece-goods, we know not what.

Bucksheesh, Buxeesh, s. Pers. through Pers. Hind. bakhshish. Buona mano, Trinkgeld, pourboire; we don’t seem to have in England any exact equivalent for the word, though the thing is so general; ‘something for (the driver)’ is a poor expression; tip is accurate, but is slang; ‘gratuity’ is official or dictionary English.

c. 1760. “. . . Buxie money.”—Ives, 51.

1810. “. . . each mile will cost full one rupee (i.e., 2s. 6d.), besides various little disbursements by way of buxeesh, or presents, to every set of bearers.”—Williamson, V. M., ii. 235.

1823. “These Christmas-boxes are said to be an ancient custom here, and I could almost fancy that our name of box for this particular kind of present . . . is a corruption of buckshish, a gift or gratuity, in Turkish, Persian, and Hindoostanee.”—Heber, i. 45.

manded buxees."—W. Arnold, Oakfield, i. 239.

Buckaul, s. Ar. Hind. bakkāl, 'a shopkeeper;' a bunya (q. v. under Banyan). In Ar. it means rather a 'second-hand' dealer.

1800. "... a buccal of this place told me he would let me have 500 bags to-morrow."—Wellington, i. 196.

1826. "Should I find our neighbour the Bagaal . . . at whose shop I used to spend in sweetmeats all the copper money that I could purloin from my father."—Haji Baba, ed. 1835, 295.

Buckyne, s. Hind. bakāyan, the tree Melia sempervirens, Roxb. (N. O. Meliaceae). It has a considerable resemblance to the nīm tree (see Neem); and in Bengali it is called mahā-nīm, which is also the Skt. name (mahānimb). It is sometimes erroneously called Persian Lilac.

Buddha, Buddhism, Buddhist. These words are often written with a quite erroneous assumption of precision, Bhudda, &c. All that we shall do here is to collect some of the earlier mentions of Buddha and the religion called by his name.

c. 200. "Εἰσι δὲ τῶν Ἰνδῶν οἱ τοῖς Βούττα πειθέμενοι παραγγέλμασι" ὃν δὲ ὑπερβολὴν σημειώτης εἰς θεὸν τετιμῆκασι."—Clemens Alexandrinus, Stromaton, Liber I. (Oxford ed., 1715, i. 359).

c. 240. "Wisdom and deeds have always from time to time been brought to mankind by the messengers of God. So in one age they have been brought to mankind by the messenger called Buddha to India, in another by Zarādusht to Persia, in another by Jesus to the West. Thereupon this revelation has come down, this prophecy in this last age, through me, Māni, the messenger of the God of truth to Babylonia."—The Book of Māni, called Shābūr-kān, quoted by Albiruni, in his Chronology, tr. by Sachau, p. 190.

c. 400. "Apud Gymnosophistas Indiae quasi per manus hujus opinionis auctoritas traditur, quod Buddam principem dogmatis eorum, e latere suo virgo generaret. Nec hoc mirum de barbaris, quum Minervam quoque de capite Jovis, et Liberum patrem de femore ejus procreatos, docta finxit Graecia."—St. Jerome, Adv. Jovinianum, Lib. i. ed. Vallarsii, ii. 309.

c. 840. "An certē Bragmanorum sequemur opinionem, ut quemadmodum illi sectae suae auctorem Buddam, per virginis latus narrant exortum, ita nos Christum fuisse praedicemus? Vel magis sic nascitur Dei sapientia de virginis cerebro, quomodo Minerva de Jovis vertice, tamquam Liber Pater de femore? Ut Christicolam de virginis partu non sollemnis natura, vel auctoritas sacrae lectionis, sed superstitioni Gentilis, et commenta perdoceant fabulosa."—Ratramni Corbeiensis L. de Nativitate Xti., cap. iii. in L. D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. i. p. 54, Paris, 1723.

c. 870. "The Indians give in general the name of budd to anything connected with their worship, or which forms the object of their veneration. So, an idol is called budd."—Bildiduri, in Elliot, i. 123.

c. 904. "Budāsaf was the founder of the Sabaeen Religion . . . he preached to mankind renunciation (of this world) and the intimate contemplation of the superior worlds . . . There was to be read on the gate of the Naobihar* at Balkh an inscription in the Persian tongue of which this is the interpretation; 'The words of Budāsaf: In the courts of kings three things are needed, Sense, Patience, Wealth.' Below had been written in Arabic: 'Budāsaf lies. If a free man possesses any one of the three, he will flee from the courts of Kings.'"—Mas'udi, iv. 45 and 49.

1000. "... pseudo-prophets came forward, the number and history of whom it would be impossible to detail. . . The first mentioned is Budhāsaf, who came forward in India."—Albiruni, Chronology, by Sachau, p. 186.

This name given to Buddha is especially interesting as showing a step nearer the true Bodhisattva, the origin of the name Iōdaṣaf, under which Buddha became a Saint of the Church, and as elucidating Prof. Max Müller's ingenious suggestion of that origin (see Chips, &c., iv. 184; see also Academy, Sept. 1, 1883, p. 146).

c. 1030. "A stone was found there in the temple of the great Budda on which an inscription . . . purporting that the temple had been founded 50,000 years ago. . ."—Al'Ubbi, in Elliot, ii. 39.

c. 1060. "This madman then, Manes (also called Scythianus) was by race a Brachman, and he had for his teacher Budas, formerly called Terebinthus, who having been brought up by Scythianus in the learning of the Greeks became a follower of the sect of Empedocles (who said there were two first principles opposed to one another), and when he entered Persia declared that he had been born of a virgin, and been brought up among the hills. . . and this Budas (alias Terebinthus) did perish, crushed by an unclean spirit."—Georg. Cedrenus, Hist. Comp., Bonn ed. 455 (old ed. i. 259).

* Naobihār = nava-vihāra, ('New Buddhist Monastery') is still the name of a district adjoining Balkh.

This wonderful jumble, mainly copied, as we see, from Socrates (supra), seems to bring Buddha and Manes together. "Many of the ideas of Manicheism were but fragments of Buddhism."—E. B. Cowell, in Smith's Dict. of Christ. Biog.

1610. "... This Prince is called in the histories of him by many names: his proper name was Dramā Rājo; but that by which he has been known since they have held him for a saint is the Budao, which is as much as to say 'Sage' . . . and to this name the Gentiles throughout all India have dedicated great and superb Pagodas."—Couto, Dec. V., Liv. vi. cap. 2.

c. 1666. "There is indeed another, a seventh Sect, which is called Bauté, whence do proceed 12 other different sects; but this is not so common as the others, the Votaries of it being hated and despised as a company of irreligious and atheistical people, nor do they live like the rest."—Bernier, (E. T.) ii. 107.

1685. "Above all these they have one to whom they pay much veneration, whom they call Bodu: his figure is that of a man."—Ribeiro, f. 40b.

1728. "Before Gautama Budhum there have been known 26 Budhums—viz. : . . ."—Valentijn, v. (Ceylon) 369.

1770. "Among the deities of the second order, particular honours are paid to Budou, who descended upon earth to take upon himself the office of mediator between God and mankind."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 91.

"The Budzoists are another sect of Japan, of which Budzo is the founder . . . The spirit of Budzoism is dreadful. It breathes nothing but penitence, excessive fear, and cruel severity."—Ibid., i. 138.

Raynal in the two preceding passages shows that he was not aware that the religions alluded to in Ceylon and in Japan were the same.

1779. "Il y avoit alors dans ces parties de l'Inde, et principalement à la Côte de Coromandel et à Ceylan, un Culte dont on ignore absolument les Dogmes; le Dieu Baouth, dont on ne connoit aujourd'hui, dans l'Inde que le Nom et l'objet de ce Culte; mais il est tout-à-fait aboli, si ce n'est, qu'il se trouve encore quelques familles d'Indiens séparées et méprisées des autres Castes, qui sont restées fidèles à Baouth, et qui ne reconnoissent pas la religion des Brames."—Voyage de M. Gentil, quoted by W. Chambers in As. Res. i. 170.

1801. "It is generally known that the religion of Bouddhou is the religion of the people of Ceylon, but no one is acquainted with its forms and precepts. I shall here relate what I have heard upon the subject."—M. Joinville in As. Res. vii. 399.

1806. "... the head is covered with the cone that ever adorns the head of the Chinese deity Fo, who has often been supposed to be the same as Boudah."—Salt, Caves of Salsette, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo., i. 50.

1810. "Among the Bhuddists there are no distinct castes."—Maria Graham, 89.

Budgerow, s. A lumbering keel-less barge, formerly much used by Europeans travelling on the Gangetic rivers. Two-thirds of the length aft was occupied by cabins with Venetian windows. Wilson gives the word as H. and B. bajrā; Shakespear gives H. bajrā and bajra with an improbable suggestion of derivation from bajar, 'hard or heavy.' Among Blochmann's extracts from Mahomedan accounts of the conquest of Assam we find, in a detail of Mir Jumla's fleet in his expedition of 1662, mention of 4 bajras (J. As. Soc. Ben. xli. pt. i. 73). The same extracts contain mention of war-sloops called bach'haris (pp. 57, 75, 81), but these last must be different. Bajra may possibly have been applied in the sense of 'thunderbolt.' This may seem unsuited to the modern budgerow, but it is not more so than the title of 'lightning darter' is to the modern burkundauze (q.v.)! We remember how Joinville says of the approach of the great galley of the Count of Jaffa:—"Sembloit que foudre cheist des cieux." It is however perhaps more probable that bajrā may have been a variation of buglā. And this is especially suggested by the existence of the Portuguese form pajeres, and of the Arab. form bagara (see under Buggalow). Mr. Edye, Master Shipwright of the Naval Yard in Trincomalee, in a paper on the Native Craft of India and Ceylon, speaks of the Baggala, or Budgerow, as if he had been accustomed to hear the words used indiscriminately (see J. R. A. S., vol. i. p. 12).

Budgroom, s. Port. bazarucco. A coin of low denomination, and of varying value and metal (copper, tin, lead, and tutenague) formerly current at Goa and elsewhere on the Western coast, as well as at some other places on the Indian seas. It was also adopted from the Portuguese in the earliest English coinage at Bombay. In the earliest Goa coinage, that of Albuquerque (1510), the leal or bazarucco was equal to 2 reis, of which reis there went 420 to the gold cruzado (Gerson da Cunha). The name appears to have been a native one in use in Goa at the time of the conquest, but its etymology is uncertain. In Van Noort's Voyage (1648) the word is derived from bazar, and said to mean 'market-money', (perhaps bāzār-rūka, the last word being used for a copper coin in Canarese). C. P. Brown (MS. notes) makes the word=badaga-rūka, which he says would in Canarese be 'base-penny,' and he ingeniously quotes Shakespeare's "beggarly denier," and Horace's "vilem assem." This is adopted in substance by Mr. E. Thomas, who points out that rūkā or rūkkā is in Mahratti (see Molesworth, s. v.), one twelfth of an anna. But the words of Khāfi Khān below suggest that the word may be a corruption of the Persian buzurg, 'big,' and according to Wilson, budrūkh (s. v.) is used in Mahratti as a dialectic corruption of buzurg. This derivation may be partially corroborated by the fact that at Mocha there is, or was formerly, a coin (which had become a money of account only, 80 to the dollar) called kabir, i. e. 'big' (see Ovington, 463, and Milburn, i. 98). If we could attach any value to Pyrrard's spelling—bousuruques—this would be in favour of the same etymology; as is also the form besorg given by Mandelslo.

1866. "Cholmondeley. Why the shaitan didn't you come before, you lazy old budzart!"—The Darak Bungalow, p. 215.

Buffalo, s. This is of course originally from the Latin bubalus, which we have also in older English forms, buffle and buff and bugle, through the French. The present form probably came from India, as it seems to be the Portuguese bufalo.

The proper meaning of bubalus, according to Pliny, was not an animal of the ox-kind (βοῦβαλς was a kind of African antelope); but in Martial, as quoted, it would seem to bear the vulgar sense, rejected by Pliny.

At an early period of our connexion with India the name of buffalo appears to have been given erroneously to the common Indian ox, whence came the still surviving misnomer of London shops, 'buffalo humps.' (See also the quotation from Ovington). The buffalo has no hump. Buffalo tongues are another matter, and an old luxury as the first quotation shows. The ox having appropriated the name of the buffalo, the true Indian domestic buffalo was differentiated as the "water buffalo," a phrase still maintained by the British soldier in India. This has probably misled Mr. Blochmann, who uses the term 'water-buffalo' in his excellent English version of the Ān (e.g. i. 219). We find the same phrase in Barkley's Five Years in Bulgaria, 1876: "Besides their bullocks every well-to-do Turk had a drove of water-buffaloes" (32). Also in Collingwood's Rambles of a Naturalist (1868), p. 43, and in Miss Bird's Golden Chersonese (1883), 60, 274.

The domestic buffalo is apparently derived from the wild buffalo (Bubalus arni, Jerd.), whose favourite habitat is in the swampy sites of the Sunderbunds and Eastern Bengal, but whose haunts extend n. eastward to the head of the Assam valley, in the Terai west to Oudh, and south nearly to the Godavery; not beyond this in the Peninsula, though the animal is found in the north and north-east of Ceylon.

The domestic buffalo exists not only in India but in Java, Sumatra, and Manilla, in Mazanderan, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Adherbijan, Egypt, Turkey, and Italy. It does not seem to be known how or when it was introduced into Italy.—(See Hehn.)

Buggalow, s. Mahr. baglā, bagalā. A name commonly given on the W. coast of India to Arab vessels of the old native form. It is also in common use in the Red Sea (baḳalā) for the larger native vessels, all built of teak from India. It seems to be a corruption of the Span. and Port. bajel, bazel, baicel, bacella, from the Lat. vascellum (see Diez, Etym. Wörterb. i. 439, s.v.) Cobarruvias (1611) gives in his Sp. Dict. "Bazel, quasi vasel," as a generic name for a vessel of any kind going on the sea, and quotes St. Isidore, who identifies it with phaselus, and from whom we transcribe the passage below. It remains doubtful whether this word was introduced into the East by the Portuguese, or had at an earlier date past into Arabic marine use. The latter is most probable. In Correa (c. 1561) this word occurs in the form pajer, pl. pajeres (j and x being interchangeable in Sp. and Port.). See Lendas, i. 2, pp. 592, 619, &c. In Pinto we have another form. Among the models in the Fisheries Exhibition (1883), there was "A Zaroogat or Bagarah from Aden."

c. 1539. "Partida a nao pera Goa, Fernão de Morais . . . seguiu sua viagem a volta do porto de Dabul, onde chegou ao outro dia as nove horas, e tomando nelle hū paguel de Malavares, carregado de algodão e de pimenta, poz logo a tormento o Capitão e o piloto delle, os quaes confessarão. . . ."—Pinto, ch. viii.

1842. "As store and horse boats for that service, Capt. Oliver, I find, would prefer the large class of native buggalas, by which so much of the trade of this coast with Scinde, Cutch . . . is carried on."—Sir G. Arthur, in Ind. Admin. of Lord Ellenborough, 222.

Buggy, s. In India this is a (two-wheeled) gig with a hood, like the gentleman's cab that was in vogue in London about 1830–40, before broughams came in. Latham puts a (?) after the word, and the earliest examples that he gives are from the second quarter of this century (from Praed and I. D'Israeli). Though we trace the word much further back, we have not discovered its birthplace or etymology. The word, though used in England, has never been very common there; it is better known both in Ireland and in America. Littré gives boghei as French also. The American buggy is defined by Noah Webster as "a light one-horse, four-wheel vehicle, usually with one seat, and with or without a calash-top." Outhbert Bede shows (N. and Q. ser. v. vol. iv. p. 445) that the adjective 'buggy' is used in the Eastern Midlands for 'conceited.' This suggests a possible origin.

1773. "Thursday 3d (June). At the sessions at Hicks's Hall, two boys were indicted for driving a post-coach and four against a single horse-chaise, throwing out the driver of it, and breaking the chaise to pieces. Justice Welch, the Chairman, took notice of the frequency of the brutish custom among the post drivers, and their insensibility in making it a matter of sport, ludicrously denominating mischief of this kind 'Running down the Buggies.' The prisoners were sentenced to be confined in Newgate for 12 months.—Gentleman's Magazine, xliii. 297.

Bugis, n. p. Name given by the Malays to the dominant race of the Island of Célèbes, originating in the S.-western limb of the Island; the people calling themselves Wugi. But the name used to be applied in the Archipelago to native soldiers in European service, raised in any of the islands. Compare the analogous use of Telinga (q. v.) formerly in India.

1878. "The Bugis are evidently a distinct race from the Malays, and come originally from the southern part of the Island of Celebes."—McNair, Perak, 130.

Bulbul, s. The word bulbul is originally Persian (no doubt intended to imitate the bird's note), and applied to a bird which does duty with Persian poets for the nightingale. Whatever the Persian bulbul may be correctly, the application of the name to certain species in India "has led to many misconceptions about their powers of voice and song," says Jerdon. These species belong to the family Brachipodidae, or short-legged thrushes, and the true bulbuls to the sub-family Pycnonotinae, e.g. genera Hyppisipetes, Hemixos, Alcurus, Criniger, Ixos, Kelaartia, Rubigula, Brachipodius, Otocompsa, Pycnonotus (P. pygæus, common Bengal Bulbul; P. haemorrhous, common Madras Bulbul). Another sub-family, Phyllornithinae, contains various species which Jerdon calls green Bulbuls.

1784. "We are literally lulled to sleep by Persian nightingales, and cease to wonder that the Bulbul, with a thousand tales, makes such a figure in Persian poetry."—Sir W. Jones, in Memoirs, &c., ii. 37.

1813. "The bulbul or Persian nightingale. . . I never heard one that possessed the charming variety of the English nightingale . . . whether the Indian bulbul and that of Iran entirely correspond I have some doubts."—Forbes, Oriental Memoirs, i. 50.

1848. "'It is one's nature to sing and the other's to hoot,' he said laughing, 'and with such a sweet voice as you have yourself, you must belong to the Bulbul faction.'"—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. xxvii.

Bulgar, or Bolgar, s. Pers. bul-ghār. The general Asiatic name for what we now call 'Russia leather,' from the fact that the region of manufacture and export was originally Bolghār on the Volga, a kingdom which stood for many centuries, and gave place to Kazan in the beginning of the 15th century. The word was usual also among Anglo-Indians till the beginning of this century, and is still in native Hindustani use. A native (mythical) account of the manufacture is given in Baden Powell's Punjab Handbook, 1872, and this fanciful etymology: "as the scent is derived from soaking in the pits (ghār), the leather is called Balgār" (p. 124).

c. 1333. "I wore on my feet boots (or stockings) of wool; over these a pair of linen lined, and over all a thin pair of Borghāli, i.e. of horse-leather lined with wolf skin."—Un Batuta, ii. 445.

"To 50 pair of Bulger Hides at 13 per pair, Rs.702 : 0 : 0."—Long, 193.

1786. Among "a very capital and choice assortment of Europe goods" we find "Bulgar Hides."—Cal. Gazette, June 8, in Seton-Karr, i. 177.

1811. "Most of us furnished at least one of our servants with a kind of bottle, holding nearly three quarts, made of bulghār . . . or Russia-leather."—W. Ouseley's Travels, i. 247.

In Tibetan the word is bulhari.

Bulkut, s. A large decked ferry-boat; from Telug. bulla, a board. (C. P. Brown.)

Bullumteer, s. Anglo-Sepoy dialect for 'Volunteer.' This distinctive title was applied to certain regiments of the old Bengal Army, whose terms of enlistment embraced service beyond sea; and in the days of that army various ludicrous stories were current in connexion with the name.

Bumba, s. Hind. bamba, from Portug. bomba, 'a pump.' Haec (1631), gives: "Bomba, organum pneumaticum quo aqua hauritur," as a Malay word. This is incorrect, of course, as to the origin of the word, but it shows its early adoption into an Eastern language. The word is applied at Ahmedabad to the water-towers, but this is modern.

"'Alija, disse o mestre rijamente, Alija tudo ao mar, não falte acordo Vão outros dar á bomba, não cessando; A' bomba que nos imos alagando,'"
Camões, vi. 72.

By Burton:

"'Heave!' roared the Master with a mighty roar,
'Heave overboard your all, together's the word!
Others go work the pumps, and with a will:
The pumps! and sharp, look sharp, before she fill!'"

Bummelo, s. A small fish, abounding on all the coasts of India and the Archipelago; Harpodon nehereus of Buch. Hamilton; the specific name being taken from the Bengali name nehare. The fish is a great delicacy when fresh caught and fried. When dried it becomes the famous Bombay duck (q. v.), which is now imported into England.

The origin of either name is obscure. Molesworth gives the word as Mah-ratti, with the spelling bombil, or bombila (p. 595 a). Bummelo occurs in the Supp. (1727) to Bluteau's Dict. in the Portuguese form bambulim, as "the name of a very savoury fish in India." The same word bambulim is also explained to mean 'humas pregas na saya a moda,' 'certain plaits in the fashionable ruff,' but we know not if there is any connexion between the two. The form Bombay Duck has an analogy in Digby chicks which are sold in the London shops, also a kind of dried fish, pilchards we believe, and the name may have originated in imitation of this or some similar English term.

In an old chart of Chittagong River (by B. Plaisted, 1764, published by A. Dalrymple, 1785) we find a point called Bumbello Point.

1673. "Up the Bay a Mile lies Massigoung, a great Fishing-Town, peculiarly notable for a Fish called Bumbelow, the Sustenance of the Poorer sort."—Fryer, 67.

1785. "My friend General Campbell, Governor of Madras, tells me that they make Speldings in the East Indies, particularly at Bombay, where they call them Bumbaloos."—Note by Boswell in his Tour to the Hebrides, under August 18th, 1773.

1810. "The bumbelo is like a large sandeel; it is dried in the sun, and is usually eaten at breakfast with kedgerree."—Maria Graham, 25.

1813. Forbes has bumbalo; Or. Mem., i. 53.

1877. "Bummalow or Bobil, the dried fish still called 'Bombay Duck.'"—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 68.

Buncus, Bunco, s. An old word for cheroot. Apparently from the Malay bungkus, 'a wrapper.'

1711. "Tobacco . . . for want of Pipes they smoke in Buncos, as on the Coromandel Coast. A Bunco is a little Tobacco wrapt up in the Leaf of a Tree, about the Bigness of one's little Finger, they light one End, and draw the Smoke thro' the other . . . these are curiously made up, and sold 20 or 30 in a bundle."—Lockyer, 61.

1726. "After a meal, and on other occasions it is one of their greatest delights, both men and women, old and young, to eat Pinang (areca), and to smoke tobacco, which the women do with a Bongkos, or dry leaf rolled up, and the men with a Gorregorri (a little can or flower pot), whereby they both manage to pass most of their time."—Valentijn, v. Chorom., 55.

(In the retinue of Grandees in Java):

"One with a coconut shell mounted in gold or silver to hold their tobacco or bongkooses (i.e. tobacco in rolled leaves)." — Valentijn, iv. 61.

1760. "The tobacco leaf, simply rolled up, in about a finger's length, which they call a buncus, and is, I fancy, of the same make as what the West Indians term a segar; and of this the Gentoos chiefly make use."—Grose, i. 146.

Bund, s. Any artificial embankment, a dam, dyke, or causeway. Hind. band. The root is both Sansk. (bandh) and Persian, but the common word, used as it is without aspirate, seems to have been taken from the latter. The word is common in Persia (e.g. see under Bendameer).

It is also naturalized in the Anglo-Chinese ports. It is there applied specially to the embanked quay along the shore of the settlements. In Hong Kong alone this is called (not bund, but) praia (Port 'shore'), probably adopted from Macao.

1810. "The great bund or dyke."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 279.

1860. "The natives have a tradition that the destruction of the bund was effected by a foreign enemy."—Tenment's Ceylon, ii. 504.

1875. ". . . It is pleasant to see the Chinese . . . being propelled along the bund in their hand carts."—Thomson's Malacca, &c., 408.

1876. ". . . So I took a stroll on Tien-Tsin bund."—Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 28.

Bunder, s. Pers. bandar, a landing-place or quay; a seaport; a harbour; (and sometimes also a custom-house). The old Italian scala, mod. scalo, is the nearest equivalent in most of the senses that occurs to us. We have (c. 1565) the Mir-Bandar, or Port Master, in Sind. (Elliot, i. 277).

c. 1344. "The profit of the treasury, which they call bandar, consists in the right of buying a certain portion of all sorts of cargo at a fixed piece, whether the goods be only worth that or more; and this is called the Law of the Bandar."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 120.

c. 1346. "So we landed at the bandar, which is a large collection of houses on the sea-shore."—Ib. 228.

1552. "Coga-atar sent word to Affonso d'Albuquerque that on the coast of the main land opposite, at a port which is called Bandar Angon . . . were arrived two ambassadors of the King of Shiraz."—Barros, II., ii. 4.

1673. "We fortify our Houses, have Bunders or Docks for our Vessels, to which belong Yards for Seamen, Soldiers, and Stores."—Fryer, 115.

1809. "On the new bunder, or pier."—Maria Graham, 11.

Bunder, is in S. India the popular native name of Masulipatam (q. v.), or Machli-bandar.

Bunder-boat, s. A boat in use on the Bombay coast for communicating with ships at anchor, and also much employed by officers of the civil departments (Salt, &c.) in going up and down the coast. It is rigged as Bp.

Heber describes, with a cabin amidships.

1825. "We crossed over . . . in a stout boat called here a bundur boat. I suppose from 'bundur' a harbour, with two masts, and two lateen sails . . ."—Heber, ii. 121.

Bundobust, s. P. H.—band-o-bast, lit. 'tying and binding.' Any system or mode of regulation; discipline; a revenue settlement.

c. 1843. 'There must be bahut achch'hā bandobast (i.e., very good order or discipline), in your country,' said an aged Khānsamā (in Hindustani) to one of the present writers. 'When I have gone to the Sandheads to meet a young gentleman from Bilāyat, if I gave him a cup of tea, 'tānki tānki,' said he. Three months afterwards this was all changed; bad language, violence, no more tānki.'

1880. "There is not a more fearful wild-fowl than your travelling M.P. This unhappy creature, whose mind is a perfect blank regarding Faujdarī and Bandobast . . ."—Ali Baba, 181.

Bundook, s. Hind. bandūk, from Arab. bunduq. The common Hind. term for a musket or matchlock. The history of the word is very curious. Bunduq, pl. banādīk, was a name applied by the Arabs to filberts (as some allege) because they came from Venice (Banādīk, comp. German Venedig). The name was transferred to the nut-like pellets shot from cross-bows, and thence the crossbows or arblasts were called bunduq, elliptically for kaus al-b., 'pellet-bow.' From crossbows the name was transferred again to fire-arms, as in the parallel case of arquebus.

Bungalow, s. Hind. and Mahr. banglā. The most usual class of house occupied by Europeans in the interior of India; being on one story, and covered by a pyramidal roof, which in the normal bungalow is of thatch, but may be of tiles without impairing its title to be called a bungalow. Most of the houses of officers in Indian cantonments are of this character. In reference to the style of a house, bungalow is sometimes employed in contradistinction to the (usually more pretentious) pukka house; by which latter term is implied a masonry house with a terraced roof. A bungalow may also be a small building of the type which we have described, but of temporary material,

The word has been adopted also by the French in the East, and by Europeans generally in Ceylon, China, Japan, and the coast of Africa.

Wilson writes the word banglā, giving it as a Bengālī word, and as probably derived from Banga = Bengal. This is fundamentally the etymology mentioned by Bp. Heber in his Journal (see below), and that etymology is corroborated by our first quotation, from a native historian, as well as by that from F. Buchanan. It is to be remembered that in Hindustan proper the adjective 'of or belonging to Bengal' is constantly pronounced as bangālā, or banglā. Thus one of the eras used in Eastern India is distinguished as the Banglā era. The probability is that, when Europeans began to build houses of this character in Behar and Upper India, these were called Banglā or 'Bengal-fashion' houses; that the name was adopted by the Europeans themselves and their followers, and so was brought back to Bengal itself, as well as carried to other parts of India.

A.H. 1041 = A.D. 1633. "Under the rule of the Bengalis (darahd-i-Bangālīyān), a party of Frank merchants, who are inhabitants of Sundīp, came trading to Sātganw. One kos above that place they occupied some ground on the banks of the estuary. Under the pretence that a building was necessary for their transactions in buying and selling, they erected several houses in the Bengālī style."—Bādshāhnāma in Elliot, vii. 31.

1758. "I was talking with my friends in Dr. Fullerton's bangla when news came of Ram Narain's being defeated."—Seir Mutaqherin, ii. 103.

1780. "To be Sold or Let, A Commodious Bungalo and out Houses . . . situated on the Road leading from the Hospital to the Burying Ground, and directly opposite to the Avenue in the front of Sir Elijah Impey's House . . ."—The India Gazette, Dec. 23rd.

1781-83. "Bungelows are buildings in India, generally raised on a base of brick, one, two, or three feet from the ground, and consist of only one story: the plan of them usually is a large room in the center for an eating and sitting room, and rooms at each corner for sleeping; the whole is covered with one general thatch, which comes low to each side; the spaces between the angle rooms are viranders or open porticoes . . . sometimes the center viranders at each end are converted into rooms."—Hodges, Travels, 146.

1784. "To be let at Chinsurah. . . .

That large and commodious House. . . . The outbuildings are—a warehouse and two large bottle-connahs, 6 store-rooms, a cook-room, and a garden, with a bungalow near the house.”—Cal. Gazette, in Seton-Karr, i. 40.

1787. “At Barrackpore many of the Bungalows much damaged, though none entirely destroyed.”—Ibid., p. 213.

1793. “. . . the bungalo, or Summer-house. . . .”—Dirom, 211.

“For Sale, a Bungalo situated between the two Tombstones, in the Island of Coulaba.”—Bombay Courier, Jan. 12.

1794. “The candid critic will not however expect the parched plains of India, or bungaloes in the land-winds, will hardly tempt the Aonian maids wont to disport on the banks of Tiber and Thames. . . .”—Hugh Boyd, 170.

1809. “We came to a small bungalo or garden-house, at the point of the hill, from which there is, I think, the finest view I ever saw.”—Maria Graham, 10.

c. 1810. “The style of private edifices that is proper and peculiar to Bengal consists of a hut with a pent roof constructed of two sloping sides which meet in a ridge forming the segment of a circle. . . . This kind of hut, it is said, from being peculiar to Bengal, is called by the natives Banggolo, a name which has been somewhat altered by Europeans, and applied by them to all their buildings in the cottage style, although none of them have the proper shape, and many of them are excellent brick houses.”—Buchanan's Dinagepore (in Eastern India, ii. 922).

1817. “The Yorū-bangala is made like two thatched houses or bangalas, placed side by side. . . . These temples are dedicated to different gods, but are not now frequently seen in Bengal.”—Ward's Hindoos, Bk. II., ch. 1.

c. 1818. “As soon as the sun is down we will go over to the Captain's bungalow.”—Mrs. Sherwood, Stories, &c., ed. 1873, p. 1.

The original editions of this book contain an engraving of “The Captain's Bungalow at Cawnpore” (c. 1811-12), which shows that no material change has occurred in the character of such dwellings down to the present time.

1824. “The house itself of Barrackpore . . . barely accommodates Lord Amherst's own family; and his aides-de-camp and visitors sleep in bungalows built at some little distance from it in the Park. Bungalow, a corruption of Bengalee, is the general name in this country for any structure in the cottage style, and only of one floor. Some of these are spacious and comfortable dwellings. . . .”—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 33.

1875. “The little groups of officers dispersed to their respective bungalows to dress and breakfast.”—The Dilemma, ch. i.

Bungalow, Dawk-, s. A rest-house for the accommodation of travellers, formerly maintained (and still to a reduced extent) by the paternal care of the Government in India. The matériel of the accommodation was humble enough, but comprised the things essential for a weary traveller—shelter, a bed and table, a bath-room, and a servant furnishing food at very moderate cost. On principal lines of thoroughfare these bungalows were at a distance of 10 to 15 miles apart, so that it was possible for a traveller to make his journey by marches without carrying a tent. On some other less frequented roads they were at 40 or 50 miles apart, adapted to a night's run in a palankin.

1853. “Dāk-bungalows have been described by some Oriental travellers as the ‘Inns of India.’ Playful satirists!”—Oakheld, ii. 17.

1866. “The Dawk Bungalow; or, Is his Appointment Pucka?” By G. O. Trevelyan, in Fraser's Magazine, vol. 73, p. 215.

1878. “I am inclined to think the value of life to a dak bungalow fowl must be very trifling.”—In my Indian Garden, 11.

Bungy, s. Hind. bhangī. The name of a low caste, habitually employed as sweepers, and in the lowest menial offices. Its members are found throughout Northern and Western India, and every European household has a servant of this class. The colloquial application of the term bungy to such servants is however peculiar to Bombay. In the Bengal Pry. he is generally called mehtar (q. v.), and by politer natives halāikhōr (q. v.), &c. In Madras totī is the usual word. Wilson suggests that the caste-name may be derived from bhang (see Bang), and this is possible enough, as the class is generally given to strong drink and intoxicating drugs.

1826. “The Kalpa or Skinner, and th Bunghee, or Sweeper, are yet one step below the Dher.”—Tr. Lit. Soc. Bombay, iii. 362.

Bunow, s. and v. Hind. banāo, used in the sense of ‘preparation, fabrication,’ &c., but properly the imperative of banānā, ‘to make, prepare, fabricate.’ The Anglo-Indian word is applied to anything fictitious or factitious, 'a cram, a shave, a sham;' or, as a verb, to the manufacture of the like. The following lines have been found among old papers belonging to an officer who was at the Court of the Nawab Sa'adat 'Ali at Lucknow, at the beginning of this century:—

"Young Grant and Ford the other day
Would fain have had some Sport,
But Hound nor Beagle none had they,
Nor aught of Canine sort.
A luckless Parry* came most pat
When Ford—'we've Dogs enow!

And Red Coat to his Back;
A Persian Sword to clog his side,
And Boots Hussar sub-nyah,‡

"Appointed to be said or sung in all Mosques, Mutts, Tuckeahs, or Bedgahs within the Reserved Dominions."||

1853. "You will see within a week if this is anything more than a banau."—Oakfield, ii. 58.

Burdwan, n.p. A town 67 m. N.W. of Calcutta—Burdwān, but in its original (Skt.) form Vardhamāna, a name which we find in Ptolemy (Bardamana), though in another part of India. Some closer approximation to the ancient form must have been current till the middle of last century, for Holwell, writing in 1765, speaks of "Burdwan, the principal town of Burdomaan" (Hist. Events, &c., i. 112; see also 122, 125).

Burgher. This word has two distinct applications.

a. s. This is used only in Ceylon. It is the Dutch word burger, 'citizen.' The Dutch admitted people of mixed descent to a kind of citizenship, and these people were distinguished by this name from pure natives. The word now indicates any persons who claim to be of partly European descent, and is used in the same sense as 'half-caste' and 'Eurasian' in India Proper.

1807. "The greater part of them were admitted by the Dutch to all the privileges of citizens under the denomination of Burghers."—Cordiner, Desc. of Ceylon.

1877. "About 60 years ago the Burghers of Ceylon occupied a position similar to that of the Eurasians of India at the present moment."—Calcutta Review, cxvii., 180-1.

b. n.p. People of the Nilgherry Hills, properly Badagas or "North-erners."—See under Badega.

Burkundauze, s. An armed retainer; an armed policeman, or other armed unmounted employé of a civil department. From Arabo-Pers. burk-andāz, 'lightning-darter,' a word of the same class as jān-bāz, &c.

1726. "2000 men on foot, called Bircandes, and 2000 pioneers to make the road, called Bieldars."—Valentijn, iv., Suratte, 276.

1793. "Capt. Welsh has succeeded in driving the Bengal Berkendosses out of Assam."—Cornwallis, ii. 207.

1794. "Notice is hereby given that all persons desirous of sending escorts of burkundazes or other armed men, with merchandize, are to apply for passports."—In Seton-Kurr, ii. 139. See Buxerry.

Burma, or Burmah (with Burmese, &c.), n.p. The name by which we designate the ancient kingdom and nation occupying the central basin of the Irawadi River. "British Burma" is constituted of the provinces conquered from that kingdom in the two wars of 1824-26 and 1852-53, viz. (in the first) Arakan, Martaban, Tenasserim, and (in the second) Pegu.

The name is taken from Mran-mā, the national name of the Burmese people, which they themselves generally pronounce Bam-mā, unless when speaking formally and emphatically. Sir Arthur Phayre considers that this name was in all probability adopted by the mongoloid tribes of the Upper Irawadi, on their conversion to Buddhism by missionaries from Gangetic India, and is identical with that (Brām-mā) by which the first and holy inhabitants of the world are styled in the (Pali) Buddhist Scriptures. Brahma-desa was the term applied to the country by a Singhalese monk returning thence to Ceylon, in conversation with one of the present writers. It is however the view of Bp. Bigandet

§ "See, I have fubriated a Major!"

|| The writer of these lines is believed to have been Captain Robert Skirving of Croys, Gallo-way, a brother of Archibald Skirving, a Scotch artist of repute, and the son of Archibald Skirving, of East Lothian, the author of a once famous ballad on the battle of Preston-Pans. Captain Skirving served in the Bengal army from about 1780 to 1806, and died about 1840.

and of Prof. Forchhammer, supported by considerable arguments, that Mran, Myan, or Myen was the original name of the Burmese people, and is traceable in the names given to them by their neighbours; e.g. by Chinese Mien (and in Marco Polo); by Kakhyens Myen or Mren; by Shans, Mān; by Sgaw Karens, Payo; by Pgaw Karens, Payān; by Paloungs, Parān, etc.)* Prof. F. considers that Mran-mā (with this honorific suffix) does not date beyond the 14th century.

1516. "Having passed the Kingdom of Bengale, along the coast which turns to the South, there is another Kingdom of Gentiles called Berma. . . . They frequently are at war with the King of Peigu. We have no further information respecting this country, because it has no shipping."—Barbosa, 181.

c. 1545. "How the King of Bramā undertook the conquest of this kingdom of Sūto (Siam), and of what happened till his arrival at the city of Odiā."—F. M. Pinto (orig.) cap. 185.

1606. "Although one's whole life were wasted in describing the superstitions of these Gentiles—the Pegus and the Bramas—one could not have done with the half, therefore I only treat of some, in passing, as I am now about to do."—Couto, viii. cap. xii.

1727. "The Dominions of Barma are at present very large, reaching from Moravi near Tanacerin, to the Province of Yunan in China."—A. Ham., ii. 41.

1759. "The Bāraghmahs are much more numerous than the Peguese and more addicted to commerce; even in Pegu their Numbers are 100 to 1."—Letter in Dalrymple, O. R., i. 99. The writer appears desirous to convey by his unusual spelling some accurate reproduction of the name as he had heard it. His testimony as to the predominance of Burmese in Pegu, at that date even, is remarkable.

1793. "Burmah borders on Pegu to the north, and occupies both banks of the river as far as the frontiers of China."—Rennell's Memoir, 297.

Burra-Beebee. H. barī bībī, 'Grande dame.' This is a kind of slang word applied in Anglo-Indian society to the lady who claims precedence at a party.

1807. "At table I have hitherto been allowed but one dish, namely the Burro Bebee, or lady of the highest rank."—Lord Minto on India, 29.

1848. "The ladies carry their burrah-bibiship into the steamers when they go to England. . . . My friend endeavoured in vain to persuade them that whatever their social importance in the 'City of Palaces,' they would be but small folk in London."—Chow Chow, by Viscountess Falkland, i. 92.

Burra-khana. 'Big dinner;' a term of the same character as the preceding, applied to a vast and solemn entertainment.

Burra-Sahib. Hind. barā, 'great'; 'the great Sāhib (or Master),' a term constantly occurring, whether in a family to distinguish the father or the elder brother, in a station to indicate the Collector, Commissioner, or whatever officer may be the recognized head of the society, or in a department to designate the head of that department, local or remote.

Burrampooter, n.p. Properly (Skt.) Brahmaputra ('the son of Brahmā'), the great River Brahmaputr of which Assam is the valley. Rising within 100 miles of the source of the Ganges, these rivers, after being separated by 17 degrees of longitude, join before entering the sea. There is no distinct recognition of this great river by the ancients, but the Diardanes or Oidanes, of Curtius and Strabo, described as a large river in the remoter parts of India, abounding in dolphins and crocodiles, probably represented this river under one of its Skt. names Hladini.

1552. Barros does not mention the name before us, but the Brahmaputra seems to be his river of Caor, which traversing the kingdom so called (see Gaur) and that of Comotay (q.v.), and that of Cirote (Silhet) issues above Chatigāo (Chittagong) in that notable arm of the Ganges which passes through the island of Sornagam (q.v.).

c. 1590. "There is another very large river called Berhumpooter, which runs from Khatai to Coach (see Cooch Behar) and from thence through Bazooah to the sea."—Ajeen Akberry (Gladwin) ed. 1800, ii. 6.

1726. "Out of the same mountains we see . . . a great river flowing which . . . divides into two branches, whereof the easterly one on account of its size is called the Great Barrempooter."—Valentijn, v. 154.

1767. "Just before the Ganges falls into ye Bay of Bengall, it receives the Baramputrey or Assam River. The Assam River is larger than the Ganges . . . it is a perfect Sea of fresh Water after the Junction of the two Rivers. . . ."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, d. 10th March.

1793. ". . . till the year 1765, the Burrampooter, as a capital river, was unknown in Europe. On tracing this river in * Forchhammer argues further that the original name was Ran or Yan, with m, ma, or pa as a pronominal prefix.

1765, I was no less surprised at finding it nith er larger than the Ganges, than at its coo-se previous to its entering Bengal . . . I co-uld no longer doubt that the Burram-pot-er and Sanpoo were one and the same river."—Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed., 356.

Burel, s. H. bharal; Ovis nahura, Hodgson. The blue wild sheep of the Himalaya.

Bursantee, s. Hind. barsāti, from barsā, 'the Rains.'

a. The word properly is applied to a disease to which horses are liable in the rains, pustular eruptions breaking out on the head and fore parts of the body.

b. But the word is also sometimes applied to a water-proof cloak, or the like; thus:

1880. "The scenery has now been arranged for the second part of the Simla season. . . and the appropriate costume for both sexes is the decorous bursatti."—Pictorial Mail, July 8th.

Bus, adv. Pers.-H. bas, 'enough.' Used commonly as a kind of interjection: Enough! Stop! Ohe jam satis! Busa, basta! Few Hindustani words stick closer by the returned Anglo-Indian. The Italian expression, though of obscure etymology, can hardly have any connexion with bas. But in use it always feels like a mere expansion of it!

1858. "And, if you pass, say my dear good-natured friends, 'you may get an appointment. Bus! (you see my Hindustanee knowledge already carries me the length of that emphatic monosyllable) . . .'"—Oakfield, 2nd ed. i. 42.

1727. "Bowchier is also a Maritim Town. . . It stands on an Island, and has a pretty good Trade."—A. Ham., i. 90.

Bustee, s. An inhabited quarter, a village. H. basti, from Skt. vas = 'dwelt.' Many years ago a native in Upper India said to a European assistant in the Canal Department: "You Peringis talk much of your country and its power, but we know that the whole of you come from five villages" (pā-ach basti). The word is applied in Calcutta to the separate groups of huts in the humbler native quarters, the sanitary state of which has often been held up to reprobation.

Butler, s. In the Madras and Bombay Presidencies this is the title usually applied to the head-servant of any English or quasi-English household. He generally makes the daily market, has charge of domestic stores, and superintends the table. As his profession is one which affords a large scope for feathering a nest at the expense of a foreign master, it is often followed at Madras by men of comparatively good caste.

1616. "Yosky the butler, being sick, asked lycense to goe to his howse to take phisick."—Cocks, i. 135.

1689. ". . . the Butlers are injoin'd to take an account of the Place each Night, before they depart home, that they (the Peons) might be examin'd before they stir, if ought be wanting."—Ovington, 393.

1782. "Wanted a Person to act as Steward or Butler in a Gentleman's House, he must understand Hairdressing."—India Gazette, March 2.

1789. "No person considers himself as comfortably accommodated without entertaining a Dubash at 4 pagodas per month, a Butler at 3, a Peon at 2, a Cook at 3, a Compradore at 2, and kitchen boy at 1 pagoda."—Munro's Narrative of Operations, p. 27.

1873. "Glancing round, my eye fell on the pantry department . . . and the butler trimming the reading lamps."—Camp Life in India, Fraser's Mag., June, 696.

1879. ". . . the moment when it occurred to him (i.e. the Nyoung-young Prince of Burma) that he ought really to assume the guise of a Madras butler, and be off to the Residency, was the happiest inspiration of his life."—Standard, June 11.

Butler-English. The broken English spoken by native servants in the Madras Presidency; which is not very much better than the Pigeon-English of China. It is a singular dialect; the present participle (e.g.) being used for the future indicative, and the preterite indicative being formed by 'done'; thus I telling = 'I will tell'; I done tell = 'I have told'; done come = 'actually arrived.' Peculiar meanings are also attached to words; thus family = 'wife.' The oddest characteristic about this jargon is (or was) that masters used it in speaking to their servants as well as servants to their masters.

Buxee, s. A military paymaster; Hind. bakhshī. This is a word of complex and curious history.

In origin it is believed to be the Mongol or Turki corruption of the Sansk. bhikṣu, 'a beggar,' and thence a Buddhist religious mendicant or member of the ascetic order, bound by his discipline to obtain his daily food by begging.* Bakshi was the word commonly applied by the Tartars of the host of Chingiz and his successors, and after them by the Persian writers of the Mongol era, to the regular Buddhist clergy; and thus the word appears under various forms in the works of medieval European writers from whom examples are quoted below. Many of the class came to Persia and the west with Hulākū and with Bātū Khān; and as the writers in the Tartar camps were probably found chiefly among the bakshis, the word underwent exactly the same transfer of meaning as our clerk, and came to signify a literatus, scribe, or secretary. Thus in the Latino-Perso-Turkish vocabulary, which belonged to Petrarch and is preserved at Venice, the word scriba is rendered in Comanian, i.e. the then Turkish of the Crimea, as Bacsi. The change of meaning did not stop here.

Abu'l-Fazl in his account of Kashmīr (in the Āin) recalls the fact that bakshī was the title given by the learned among Persian and Arabic writers to the Buddhist priests whom the Tibetans styled lāmās. But in the time of Baber, say circa 1500, among the Mongols the word had come to mean surgeon; a change analogous again, in some measure, to our colloquial use of doctor. The modern Mongols, according to Pallas, use the word in the sense of 'Teacher,' and apply it to the most venerable or learned priest of a community. Among the Kirghiz Kazzāks, who profess Mahomedanism, it has come to bear the character which Marco Polo more or less associates with it, and means a mere conjuror or medicine-man; whilst in Western Turkestan it signifies a 'Bard' or 'Minstrel.'

By a farther transfer of meaning, of which all the steps are not clear, in another direction, under the Mahom-edan Emperors of India the word bakshī was applied to an officer high in military administration, whose office is sometimes rendered 'Master of the Horse' (of horse, it is to be remembered, the whole substance of the army consisted), but whose duties sometimes, if not habitually, embraced those of Paymaster-General, as well as, in a manner, of commander-in-chief, or chief of the staff. More properly perhaps this was the position of the Mir Bakshī, who had other bakshīs under him. Bakshīs in military command continued in the armies of the Maharrats, of Hyder Ali, and of other native powers. But both the Persian spelling and the modern connexion of the title with pay indicate a probability that some confusion of association had arisen between the old Tartar title and the Pers. baksh, 'portion,' bakshīdān, 'to give,' bakshīsh, 'payment.' In the early days of the Council of Fort William we find the title Buxee applied to a European Civil officer, through whom all payments were made (see Long and Seton-Karr, passim). This is obsolete, but the word is still in the Anglo-Indian Army the recognised designation of a Paymaster.

This is the best known existing use of the word. But under some Native Governments it is still the designation of a high officer of state. And according to the Calcutta Glossary it has been used in the N. W. P. for 'a collector of a house-tax' (?) and the like; in Bengal for 'a superintendent of peons'; in Mysore for 'a treasurer,' &c.—See an interesting note on this word in Quatremère, H. des Mongols, 184 segg.; also see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 61, note.

1298. "There is another marvel performed by those Bacsi, of whom I have been speaking as knowing so many enchantments. . . ."—Marco Polo, Bk. I. ch. 61.

c. 1300. "Although there are many Bakshis, Chinese, Indian and others, those of Tibet are most esteemed."—Rashīduddīn, quoted by D'Oshson, ii. 370.

c. 1300. "Et sciendum, quod Tartar quosdam homines super omnes de mundo honorant: boxitas, scilicet quosdam pontifices ydolorum."—Ricoldus de Montecrucis, in Peregrinatores IV., p. 117.

c. 1308. "Ταῦτα γὰρ Κοντζήμαξις ἐπ' ἀνὰ κων πρὸς βασιλέα διεβεβαίων· πρῶτος δὲ τῶν ἱερομάγων, τοῦνομα αὐτοῦ ἐξελληνίσθηται."—Georg. Pachymeres de Andronico Palaeologo, Lib. viii.

* In a note with which we were favoured by the late Prof. Anton Schiefner, he expressed doubts whether the Bakshi of the Tibetans and Mongols was not of early introduction through the Uigurs from some other corrupted Sanskrit word, or even of pre-buddhistic derivation from an Iranian source. We do not find the word in Jaeschke's Tibetan Dictionary.

The last part of the name of this Kutzi-mpazis, 'the first of the sacred magi,' appears to be Bakshsi; the whole perhaps to be Khoja-Bakshsi, or Kuchin Bakshsi.

1420. "In this city of Kamcheu there is an idol temple 500 cubits square. In the middle is an idol lying at length, which measures 50 paces. . . . Behind this image . . . figures of Bakshis as large as life. . . ."—Shah Rukh's Mission to China, in Cathay, i. cciii.

1615. "Then I moved him for his favor for an English Factory to be Resident in the Towne, which hee willingly granted, and gave present order to the Buxy, to draw a Pirma both for their coming vp, and for their residence."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 541.

c. 1660. ". . . obliged me to take a Salary from the Grand Mogol in the quality of a Phisitian, and a little after from Danechmend-Kan, the most knowing man of Asia, who had been Bakshis, or Great Master of the Horse."—Bernier (Eng. Tr.), p. 2.

1701. "The friendship of the Buxie is not so much desired for the post he is now in, but that he is of a very good family, and has many relations near the King."—In Wheeler, i. 378.

1706-7. "So the Emperor appointed a nobleman to act as the bakshi of Kám Baksh, and to him he intrusted the Prince, with instructions to take care of him. The bakshi was Sultan Hasan, otherwise called Mir Malang."—Dowson's Elliot, vii. 385.

1712. "Chan Djeahaan . . . first Baksi general, or Muster-Master of the horsemen."—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte), 295.

1753. "The Buxey acquaints the Board he has been using his endeavours to get sundry artificers for the Negrals."—In Long, 43.

1756. Barth. Plaisted represents the bad treatment he had met with for "strictly adhering to his duty during the Buxy-ship of Messrs. Bellamy and Kempe;" and "the abuses in the post of Buxy."—Letter to the Hon. the Court of Directors, &c., p. 3.

1763. "The buxey or general of the army, at the head of a select body, closed the procession."—Orme, i. 26 (reprint).

1793. "The bukshay allowed it would be prudent in the Sultan not to hazard the event."—Dirom, 50.

1804. "A buckshee and a body of horse belonging to this same man were opposed to me in the action of the 5th; whom I dare say that I shall have the pleasure of meeting shortly, at the Peshwah's darbar."—Wellington, iii. 80.

1811. "There appear to have been different descriptions of Buktshies (in Tippoo's service). The Buktshies of Kushoons were a sort of commissaries and paymasters, and were subordinate to the sigahdár, if not to the Resáladár, or commandant of a battalion. The Meer Buktshy, however, took rank of the Sipahdár. The Buktshies of the Ehsham and Jyshe were, I believe, the superior officers of these corps respectively."—Note to Tippoo's Letters, 163.

1823. "In the Mahratta armies the prince is deemed the Sirdar or Commander; next to him is the Bukshee or Paymaster, who is vested with the principal charge and responsibility, and is considered accountable for all military expenses and disbursements."—Malcolm, Central India, i. 534.

1861. "To the best of my memory he was accused of having done his best to urge the people of Dhar to rise against our Government, and several of the witnesses deposed to this effect; amongst these the Bukshi."—Memo. on Dhar, by Major McMullen.

1872. "Before the depositions were taken down, the gomasta of the planter drew aside the Bakshi, who is a police-officer next to the dargá."—Govinda Samanta, ii. 235.

Buxerry, s. A matchlock-man; apparently used in much the same sense as burkundauze, q.v. Now obsolete. The origin is obscure. Buxo is in Port, a gun-barrel (Germ. Buchse); which suggests some possible word buxeiro. There is however none such in Bluteau, who has on the other hand, "Butgeros, an Indian term, artillerymen, &c.," and quotes from Hist. Orient. iii. 7: "Butgeri sunt hi qui quinque tormentis præficiuntur." This does not throw light. Bajjar, 'thunderbolt,' may have given vogue to a word in analogy to Pers. burkandāz, 'lightning-darter,' but we find no such word.

1748. "We received a letter from . . . Council at Cossimbazar . . . advising of their having sent Ensign McKion with all the Military that were able to travel, 150 buxerries, 4 field pieces, and a large quantity of ammunition to Cutway."—In Long, p. 1.

1755. "Agreed, we despatch Lieutenant John Harding of a command of soldiers 25 Buxerries in order to clear these boats stopped in their way to this place."—In Long, 55.

1761. "The 5th they made their last effort with all the Sepoys and Buxerries they could assemble."—In Long, 254.

"The number of Buxerries or matchlockmen was therefore augmented to 1500."—Orme (reprint), ii. 59.

"In a few minutes they killed 6 buxerries."—Ibid., 65; see also 279.

1788. "Buxerries—Foot soldiers, whose common arms are swords and targets or spears. They are generally employed to escort goods or treasure."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale).

1850. "Another point to which Clive turned his attention . . . was the organization of an efficient native regular force. . . Hitherto the native troops employed at Calcutta . . . designated Buxarries were nothing more than Burkandāz, armed and equipped in the usual native manner."—Broome, Hist. of the Rise and Progress of the Bengal Army, i. 92.

Byde or Bede Horse (?) A note by Kirkpatrick to the passage below from Tippoo's Letters says Byde Horse are "the same as Pindārehs, Looties, and Kuzzāks (see Pindarree, Lootee, and Cossack). In the life of Hyder Ali by Hussain 'Ali Khān Kirmāni, tr. by Miles, we read that Hyder's Kuzzaks were under the command of "Ghazi Khan Bede." But whether this leader was called so from leading the "Bede" Horse, or gave his name to them, does not appear. Miles has the highly intelligent note: 'Bede is another name for (Kuzzak): Kirkpatrick supposed the word Bede meant infantry, which, I believe, it does not' (p. 36). The quotation from the Life of Tippoo seems to indicate that it was the name of a caste. And we find in Sherring's Hindu Tribes and Castes, among those of Mysore, mention of the Bedar as a tribe, probably of huntsmen, dark, tall, and warlike. Formerly many were employed as soldiers, and served in Hyder's wars (iii. 153, see also the same tribe in the S. Mahratta country, ii. 321). Assuming -ar to be a plural sign, we have here probably the "Bedes" who gave name to these plundering horse.

1758. "... The Cavalry of the Rao . . . received such a defeat from Hydur's Bedes or Kuzzaks that they fled and never looked behind them until they arrived at Goori Bundar."—Hist. of Hydur Naik, p. 120.

1785. "Byde Horse, out of employ, have committed great excesses and depredations in the Sircar's dominions."—Letters of Tippoo Sultan, 6.

1802. "The Kakur and Chapao horse . . . (Although these are included in the Bede tribe, they carry off the palm even from them in the arts of robbery) . . ."—H. of Tipu by Hussein 'Ali Khan Kirmāni, tr. by Miles, p. 76.

C.

Cabaya, s. This word, though of Asiatic origin, was perhaps introduced into India by the Portuguese, whose writers of the 16th century apply it to the surcoat or long tunic of muslin, which is one of the most common native garments of the better classes in India. The word seems to be one of those which the Portuguese had received in older times from the Arabic (kaba, 'a vesture'). From Dozy's remarks this would seem in Barbary to take the form ḡabāya. Whether from Arabic or from Portuguese, the word has been introduced into the Malay countries, and is in common use in Java for the light cotton surcoat worn by Europeans, both ladies and gentlemen, in dishabille. The word is not now used in India Proper, unless by the Portuguese. But it has become familiar in Dutch, from its use in Java.

c. 1540. "There was in her an Ambassador who had brought Hidalcan, a very rich Cabaya . . . which he would not accept of, for that thereby he would not acknowledge himself subject to the Turk."—Cogan's Ponto, pp. 10-11.

1552. "... he ordered him then to bestow a cabaya."—Castanheda, iv. 438. See also Stanley's Correa, 132.

1554. "And moreover there are given to these Kings (Malabar Rajas) when they come to receive these allowances, to each of them a cabaya of silk, or of scarlet, of 4 cubits, and a cap or two, and two sheath-knives."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 26.

"Luzem da fina purpura as cabayas, Lustram os pannos da tecida seda."

Camões, ii. 93.

"Cabaya de damasco rico e dino Da Tyria cor, entre elles estimada."

Ibid., 95.

In these two passages Burton translates caftan.

1585. "The King is apparelled with a Cabie made like a shirt tied with strings on one side."—R. Fitch, in Hakl., ii. 386.

1598. "They wear sometimes when they go abroad a thinne cotton linnen gowne called Cabaia. . . ."—Linschoten, 70.

c. 1610. "Cette jaquette ou soutane, qu'ils appellent Libasse ou Cabaye, est de toile de Cotton fort fine et blanche, qui leur va jusqu'aux talons."—Pyrard de la Val., i. 265.

1645. "Vne Cabaye qui est vne sorte de vestement comme vne large soutane cou-verte par le devant, à manches fort larges.”

—Cardin, Rel. de la Prov. du Japon, 56.

This distinction is still true.

1860. “I afterwards understood that the dress they were wearing was a sort of native garment, which there in the country they call sarong or kabaai, but I found it very unbecoming.”—Max Havelaar, 43.

1878. “Over all this is worn (by Malay women) a long loose dressing-gown style of garment called the kabaya. This robe falls to the middle of the leg, and is fastened down the front with circular brooches.”—McNair, Perak, &c., 151.

Cabob, s. Ar.-H. kabūb. This word is used in Anglo-Indian households generically for roast meat. But specifically it is applied to the dish described in the quotations from Fryer and Ovington.

1673. “Cabob is Rostmeat on Skewers, cut in little round pieces no bigger than a Sixpence, and Ginger and Garlick put between each.”—Fryer, 404.

1689. “Cabob, that is Beef or Mutton cut in small pieces, sprinkled with salt and pepper, and dipt with Oil and Garlick, which have been mixt together in a dish, and then roasted on a Spit, with sweet Herbs put between and stuff in them, and basted with Oil and Garlick all the while.”—Ovington, 397.

1814. “I often partook with my Arabs of a dish common in Arabia called Kabob or Kab-ab, which is meat cut into small pieces and placed on thin skewers, alternately between slices of onion and green ginger, seasoned with pepper, salt, and Kian, fried in ghee, to be ate with rice and dhol.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 480.

Cabook, s. This is the Ceylon term for the substance called in India late-rite (q.v.), and in Madras by the native name moorum (q.v.). The word is perhaps the Port. cabouco or cavouco, ‘a quarry.’ It is not in Singh. Dictionaries.

1834. “The houses are built with cabook, and neatly whitewashed with chunam.”—Chitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 75.

1860. “A peculiarity which is one of the first to strike a stranger who lands at Galle or Colombo is the bright red colour of the streets and roads . . . and the ubiquity of the fine red dust which penetrates every crevice and imparts its own tint to every neglected article. Natives resident in these localities are easily recognizable elsewhere by the general hue of their dress. This is occasioned by the prevalence . . . of late-rite, or, as the Singhalese call it, of cabook.”—Tennent’s Ceylon, i. 17.

Cabul, Caubool, &c., n.p. This name (Kābul) of the chief city of N. Afghanistan, now so familiar, is perhaps traceable in Ptolemy, who gives in that same region a people called Καβολῖται, and a city called Κάβουρα, though both readings are questioned. Perhaps, however, one or both may be corroborated by the νᾶρος Καβαλίτη of the Periplus. The accent of Kābul is most distinctly on the first and long syllable, but English mouths are very perverse in error here. Moore accents the last syllable:

Of melting sweetness, and the pears
And sunniest apples that Cabul
In all its thousand gardens bears.”
Light of the Harem.

Mr. Arnold does likewise in Sohrab and Rustam:

“But as a troop of pedlars from Cabool, Cross underneath the Indian Caucasus. . .”

It was told characteristically of the late Lord-Ellenborough that, after his arrival in India, though for months he heard the name correctly spoken by his councillors and his staff, he persisted in calling it Cābbol till he met Dost Mahommed Khan. After the interview the Governor-General announced as a new discovery, from the Amir’s pronounciation, that Cabul was the correct form.

1552. Barros calls it “a Cidade Cabol, Metropoli dos Mogoles.”—IV. vi. 1.

“Ah Cabul! word of woe and bitter shame;
Where proud old England’s flag, dishonoured, sank
Beneath the Crescent; and the butcher knives
Beat down like reeds the bayonets that had flashed
From Plassey on to snow-capt Caucasus,
In triumph through a hundred years of war.”

The Banyan Tree, a Poem.

Cacouli, s. This occurs in the App. to the Journal d’Antoine Galland, at Constantinople in 1673: “Dragmes de Cacouli, drogue qu’on use dans le Cahue,” i.e. in coffee (ii. 206). This is Pers. Arab. kākula for Cardamom, as in the quotation from Garcia. We may remark that Kākula was a place somewhere on the Gulf of Siam, famous for its fine aloes-wood (see Ibn Batuta, iv. 240-244). And a bastard kind of Cardamom appears to be exported from Siam, Amonum xanthoides, Wal.

1563. "O. Avicena gives a chapter on the caçullá, dividing it into the bigger and the less . . . calling one of them caçollá quebr, and the other caçollá cequer, which is as much as to say greater cardamom and smaller cardamom."—García De O. f. 47 v.

Caddy, s., i. e., teacaddy. This is possibly, as Crawford suggests, from Catty, q.v., and may have been originally applied to a small box containing a catty or two of tea.

The suggestion is confirmed by this advertisement:

1792. "By R. Henderson . . . A Quantity of Tea in Quarter Chests and Caddies, imported last season. . ."—Madras Courier, Dec. 2.

Cadet, s. (From Prov. capdet, and Low Lat. capitettum, Skeat). This word is of course by no means exclusively Anglo-Indian, but it was in exceptionally common and familiar use in India, as all young officers appointed to the Indian army went out to that country as cadets, and were only promoted to ensigncies and posted to regiments after their arrival, — in olden days sometimes a considerable time after their arrival. In those days there was a building in Fort William known as the 'Cadet Barrack'; and for some time early in this century the cadets after their arrival were sent to a sort of college at Baraset; a system which led to no good, and was speedily abolished.

1763. "We should very gladly comply with your request for sending you young persons to be brought up as assistants in the Engineering branch, but as we find it extremely difficult to procure such, you will do well to employ any who have a talent that way among the cadets or others."—Court's Letter, in Long, 290.

1769. "Upon our leaving England, the cadets and writers used the great cabin promiscuously; but finding they were troublesome and quarrelsome, we brought a Bill into the house for their ejectment."—Life of Lord Teignmouth, i. 15.

1781. "The Cadets of the end of the years 1771 and beginning of 1772 served in the country four years as Cadets and carried the musket all the time."—Letter in Hicky's Bengal Gazette, Sept. 29th.

Cadjan, s. Jav. and Malay kājang, meaning 'palm-leaves,' especially those of the nipa (q.v.) palm, dressed for thatching or matting. Favre's Dict. renders the word feuilles entrelacées. It has been introduced by foreigners into S. and W. India, where it is used in two senses:

a. Coco-palm leaves matted, the common substitute for thatch in S. India.

1673. "... Flags especially in their Villages (by them called Cajans, being Co-coe-tree branches) upheld with some few sticks, supplying both Sides and Coverings to their Cottages."—Fryer, 17.

In his Explanatory Index, Fryer gives 'Cajan, a Bough of a Toddy-tree.'

c. 1680. "Ex iis (foliis) quoque rudiores mattae, Cadjang vocatae, conficiuntur, quibus aedium muri et navium orae, quum frumentum aliquod in iis deponere velimus, obteguntur."—Rumphius, i. 71.

1727. "We travelled 8 or 10 miles before we came to his (the Cananore Raja's) Palace, which was built with Twigs, and covered with Cadjans or Coccoa-nut Tree Leaves woven together."—A. Ham. i. 296.

1809. "The lower classes (at Bombay) content themselves with small huts, mostly of clay, and roofed with cadjan."—Maria Graham, 4.

1860. "Houses are timbered with its wood, and roofed with its plaited fronds, which, under the name of cadjans, are likewise employed for constructing partitions and fences."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 126.

b. A strip of fan-palm leaf, i. e., either of the talipot (q.v.) or of the palmyra, prepared for writing on; and so a document written on such a strip.

1707. "The officer at the Bridge Gate bringing in this morning to the Governor a Cajan letter that he found hung upon a post near the Gate, which when translated seemed to be from a body of the Right Hand Caste."—In Wheeler, ii. 78.

1716. "The President acquaints the Board that he has intercepted a villainous letter or Cajan."—In Wheeler, ii. 231.

1839. "At Rajahmundry . . . the people used to sit in our reading room for hours, copying our books on their own little cadjan leaves."—Letters from Madras, 275.

Cael, n. p. Properly Kāyal (meaning 'lagoon' or 'backwater'). Once a famous port near the extreme south of India, at the mouth of the Tamraparni R., in the Gulf of Manaar, and on the coast of Tinnevely, now long abandoned. Two or three miles higher up the river lies the site of Korkai or Kolkai, the Κόλχοι ἐμπόριον of the Greeks, each port in succession having been destroyed by the retirement of the sea. Tutikorin, six miles N., may be considered the modern and humbler representative of those ancient marts.

1298. "Cail is a great and noble city... It is at this city that all the ships touch that come from the west."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 21.

1442. "The Coast, which includes Calicut with some neighbouring ports, and which extends as far as Kabel (read Kayel) a place situated opposite the Island of Serendib." Abdurrazak, in India in the XVth Cent., 19.

1444. "Ultra eas urbs est Cahila, qui locus margaritas producit."—Conti in Poggius, De Var. Fortunae.

1514. "Passando oltre al Cavo Comedi (C. Comorin), sono gentili; e intra esso e Gael è dove si pesca le perle."—Gior. du Empoli, 79.

1516. "Further along the coast is a city called Cael, which also belongs to the King of Coulam, peopled by Moors and Gentoos, great traders. It has a good harbour, whither come many ships of Malabar; others of Charamandel and Benguala."—Barbosa, in Lisbon Coll. 357-8.

Caffer, Caffre, Coffree, &c., n.p. The word is properly the Arabic Kāfir. pl. Kofra, 'an infidel, an unbeliever in Islām.' As the Arabs applied this to Pagan negroes, among others, the Portuguese at an early date took it up in this sense, and our countrymen from them. A further appropriation in one direction has since made the name specifically that of the black tribes of South Africa, whom we now call, or till recently did call, Caffres.

It was also applied in the Philippine Islands to the Papuas of N. Guinea, and the Alfuras of the Moluccas, brought into the slave-market.

In another direction the word has become a quasi-proper name of the (more or less) fair, and non-Mahomedan, tribes of Hindu-Kush, sometimes called more specifically the Siāh-posh or 'black-robed' Cafirs.

The term is often applied malevolently by Mahomedans to Christians, and this is probably the origin of a mistake pervading some of the early Portuguese narratives, especially the Roteiro of Vasco da Gama, which describes many of the Hindu and Indo-Chinese States as being Christian.*

c. 1470. "The sea is infested with pirates, all of whom are Kofars, neither Christians nor Mussulmans; they pray to stone idols, and know not Christ."—Atham. Nikitin, in India in the XVth Cent., p. 11.

So prevalent is the use of wine among them that every Kafer has a khig, or leathern bottle of wine about his neck; they drink wine instead of water."—Autobiog. of Baher, p. 144.

1603. " . . . They fell in with a certain pilgrim and devotee, from whom they learned that at a distance of 30 days' journey there was a city called Capperstam, into which no Mahomedan was allowed to enter . . ."—Journey of Bened. Goes, in Cathay, &c., ii. 554.

Caique, s. The small skiff used at Constantinople, Turkish kāik. Is it by an accident, or by a radical connexion through Turkish tribes on the Arctic shores of Siberia, that the Greenlanders' kayak is so closely identical?

Cajan, s. This is a name given by Sprengel (Cajanus indicus, and by Linnaeus (Cytisus cajan), to the leguminous shrub which gives dhall (q.v.). A kindred plant has been called Dolichos catjang, Willdenow. We do not know the origin of this name. The Cajan was introduced to America by the slave-traders from Africa. De Candolle finds it impossible to say whether its native region is India or Africa. See Dhall and Calavance.

Cajeput, s. The name of a fragrant essential oil produced especially in Celebes and the neighbouring island of Bourou. A large quantity is exported from Singapore and Batavia. It is used most frequently as an external application, but also internally, especially (of late) in cases of cholera. The name is taken from the Malay Kayu-puti, i. e., 'Lignumalbum.' Filet (see p. 140) gives six different trees as producing the oil, which is derived from the distillation of the leaves. The chief of these trees is Melaleuca leucadendron, L., a tree diffused from the Malay Peninsula to N. S. Wales. The drug and tree were first described by Rumphius, who died 1693. (See Hanbury and Flückiger, 247.)

Caksen, s. This is Sea Hind. for Oowain (Roebuck).

Calaluz, s. A kind of swift rowing vessel often mentioned by the Portuguese writers as used in the Indian Archipelago. We do not know the etymology, nor the exact character of the craft.

1525. "4 great lancharas, and 6 calaluzes and manchuas which row very fast."—Lembrança, 8.

1539. "The King (of Achin) set forward with the greatest possible despatch, a great armament of 200 rowing vessels, of which the greater part were lancharas, joangas, and calaluzes, besides 15 high-sided junks."—F. M. Pinto, cap. xxxii.

1552. "The King of Siam . . . ordered to be built a fleet of some 200 sail, almost all lancharas and calaluzes, which are rowing-vessels."—Barros, II. vi. 1.

1613. "And having embarked with some companions in a calaluz or rowing vessel . . ."—Godinho de Eredia, f. 51.

Calamander Wood, s. A beautiful kind of rose-wood got from a Ceylon tree (Diospyros quaeita). Tennent regards the name as a Dutch corruption of Coromandel wood (i. 118), and Drury, we see, calls one of the ebony-trees (D. melanoxylon) "Coromandel-ebony." Forbes Watson gives as Singhalese names of the wood Calumitriya, Kalumederiye, &c., and the term Kalu-madriya is given with this meaning in Clough's Singh. Dict.; still, in absence of further information, it may remain doubtful if this be not a borrowed word. It may be worth while to observe that, according to Tavernier, the "painted calicoes" or "chites" of Masulipatam were called "Calmendar," that is to say, done with a pencil" (Kalam-dār?), and possibly this appellation may have been given by traders to a delicately veined wood.

1813. "Calaminder wood" appears among Ceylon products in Milburn, i. 345.

1825. "A great deal of the furniture in Ceylon is made of ebony, as well as of the Calamander tree . . . which is become scarce from the improvident use formerly made of it."—Heber (1844) ii. 161.

1834. "The forests in the neighbourhood afford timber of every kind (Calamander excepted)."—Cluitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 198.

Calambac, s. The finest kind of aloes-wood. Crawford gives the word as Javanese, kalambak, but it perhaps came with the article from Champa (q.v.).

1510. "There are three sorts of aloes-wood. The first and most perfect sort is called Calampat."—Varthema, 235.

1516. ". . . It must be said that the very fine calembuco and the other eagle-wood is worth at Calicut 1000 maravedis the pound."—Barbosa, 204.

1539. "This Ambassador, that was Brother-in-law to the King of the Batas . . . brought him a rich Present of Wood of Aloes, Calambaa, and 5 quintals of Benjamin in flowers."—F. M. Pinto, in Cogan's tr. p. 15 (orig. cap. xiii.).

1551. (Campar, in Sumatra) "has nothing but forests which yield aloeswood, called in India Calambuco."—Castanheda, quoted by Crawford, Des. Dic. 7.

1552. "Past this kingdom of Camboja begins the other Kingdom called Campa (Champa), in the mountains of which grows the genuine aloes-wood, which the Moors of those parts call Calambuc."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1613. "And the Calamba is the most fragrant medulla of the said tree."—Godinho de Eredia, f. 15 v.

1618. "We opened the ij chistes which came from Syam with callamback and silk, and waid it out."—Cocks's Diary, ii. 51.

See Eagle-wood and Aloes.

Calayance, s. A kind of bean; acc. to the quotation from Osbeck, Dolichos sinensis. The word was once common in English use, but seems forgotten, unless still used at sea. Sir Joseph Hooker writes: "When I was in the Navy haricot beans were in constant use as a substitute for potatoes, and, in Brazil and elsewhere, were called Calavances. I do not remember whether they were the seed of Phaseolus lunatus or vulgaris, or of Dolichos sinensis, alias Catjang (see Cajan)." The word comes from the Span. garbanzos, which De Candolle mentions as Castilian for 'pois chiche,' or Cicer arietinum, and as used also in Basque under the form garbantzu.

1620. ". . . from hence they make their provision in abundance, viz. beefe and porke. . . garvances, or small peaze or beanes" . . . —Cocks's Diary, ii. 311.

c. 1630. ". . . In their Canoes brought us . . . green pepper, caravance, Buffols, Hens, Eggs, and other things."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1665, p. 350.

1719. "I was fore'd to give them an extraordinary meal every day, either of Farina or calavances, which at once made a considerable consumption of our water and firing."—Shelvoke's Voyage, 62.

1738. "But garvanços are prepared in a different manner, neither do they grow soft like other pulse, by boiling. . . ."—Shaw's Travels, ed. 1757, p. 140.

1752. "... Callvanses (Dolichos sinensis)."
—Osbeck, i. 304.

1774. "When I asked any of the men of Dory why they had no gardens of plantains and Kalavansas . . . I learnt . . . that the Haraforas supply them."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 109.

Calay, s. Tin; also v., to tin copper vessels.—H. kala'i karnā. The word is Ar. kala'i, 'tin,' which according to certain Arabic writers was so called from a mine in India called kala'. In spite of the different initial and terminal letters, it seems at least possible that the place meant was the same that the old Arab geographers call Kalah, near which they place mines of tin (al-kala'i), and which was certainly somewhere about the coast of Malacca, possibly, as has been suggested, at Kadāh,* or as we write it, Quedda (q.v.).

The tin produce of that region is well known. Kalang is indeed also a name of tin in Malay, which may have been the true origin of the word before us. It may be added that the small state of Salāngor between Malacca and Perak was formerly known as Nagrī Kalang, or the 'Tin Country,' and that the place on the coast where the British Resident lives is called Klang (see Bird, Golden Chersonese, 210, 215). The Portuguese have the forms calaim and calin, with the nasal termination so frequent in their eastern borrowings. Bluteau explains calaim as 'Tin of India, finer than ours.' The old writers seem to have hesitated about the identity with tin, and the word is confounded in one quotation below with Tutenague (q.v.). The French use calin. In the Persian version of the Book of Numbers, ch. xxxi., v. 22, kala'i is used for 'tin.' See on this word Quatremère in the Journal des Savans, Dec. 1846.

c. 920. "Kalah is the focus of the trade in aloeswood, in camphor, in sandalwood, in ivory, in the lead which is called al-Kala'i. . . ."—Relation des Voyages, &c. i. 94.

* It may be observed, however, that kādā in Malay indicates the estuary of a navigable river, and denominates many small ports in the Malay region. The Kalah of the early Arabs is probably the Κῶλι πόλις of Ptolemy's Tables.

c. 1154. "Thence to the Isles of Lankiā-lūs is reckoned 2 days, and from the latter to this Island of Kalah 5. . . . There is in this last island an abundant mine of tin (al-Kala'i). The metal is very pure and brilliant."—Edrisi, by Jaubert, i. 80.

1552. "—Tin, which the people of the country call Calem."—Castanheda, iii. 213. It is mentioned as a staple of Malacca at ii. 186.

1606. "That all the chalices which were neither of gold, nor silver, nor of tin, nor of calaim, should be broken up and destroyed."—Gouvea, Synodo, f. 29 b.

1610. "They carry (to Hormuz) . . . clove, cinnamon, pepper, cardamom, ginger, mace, nutmeg, sugar, calayn, or tin."—Relaciones de P. Teixeira, 382.

c. 1610 " . . . money . . . not only of gold and silver, but also of another metal, which is called calin, which is white like tin, but harder, purer, and finer, and which is much used in the Indies."—Pyrard de la Val (1679), i. 164.

1613. "And he also reconnoitred all the sites of mines, of gold, silver, mercury, tin or calaim, and iron and other metals . . ."—Godinho de Eredia, f. 58.

1646. " . . . il y a (i.e. in Siam) plusieurs mines de calain, qui est vn metal metoyen, entre le plomb et l'estain."—Cardim, Rel. de la Prov. de Japon, 163.

1726. "The goods exported hither (from Pegu) are . . . Kalin (a metal coming very near silver). . . ."—Valentijn, v. 128.

1770. "They send only one vessel (viz. the Dutch to Siam), which transports Javanese horses, and is freighted with sugar, spices, and linen; for which they receive in return calin, at 70 livres 100 weight."—Raynal (tr. 1777) i. 208.

1780. " . . . the port of Quedah; there is a trade for calin or tutenague . . . to export to different parts of the Indies."—In Dunn, N. Directory, 336.

1794–5. In the Travels to China of the younger Deguignes, Calin is mentioned as a kind of tin imported into China from Batavia and Malacca.—iii. 367.

Calcutta, n.p. B. Kalikātā, or Kalikattā, a name of uncertain etymology. The first mention that we are aware of occurs in the Āin-i-Akbari.

c. 1590. "Kalikātā wa Bakoyā wa Barbak-pūr, 3 Mahāl."—Āin. (orig.) i. 408.

1698. "This avaricious disposition the English plied with presents, which in 1698 obtained his permission to purchase from the Zemindar . . . the towns of Sootanuttty, Calcutta, and Goomopore, with their districts extending about 3 miles along the eastern bank of the river."—Orme, repr. ii. 71.

1702. "The next Morning we pass'd by the English Factory belonging to the old Company, which they call Golgotha, and is a handsome Building, to which they were adding stately Warehouses."—Voyage to the E. Indies by Le Sieur Luvillier, E. T. 1715, p. 259.

1726. "The ships which sail thither (to Hugli) first pass by the English Lodge in Colleeatte, 9 miles (Dutch miles) lower down than ours, and after that the French one called Chandarnagor . . ."—Valentijn, v. 162.

1727. "The Company has a pretty good Hospital at Calcutta, where many go in to undergo the Penance of Physic, but few come out to give an Account of its Operation. . . . One Year I was there, and there were reckoned in August about 1200 English, some Military, some Servants to the Company, some private Merchants residing in the Town, and some Seamen belong to Shipping lying at the Town, and before the beginning of January there were 460 Burials registered in the Clerk's Books of Mortality."—A. Ham., ii. 9 and 6.

c. 1742. "I had occasion to stop at the city of Firashdanga (Chandernagore), which is inhabited by a tribe of Frenchmen. The city of Calcutta, which is on the other side of the water, and inhabited by a tribe of English who have settled there, is much more extensive and thickly populated. . . ."—Abdul Karim Khun, in Elliot, viii. 127.

1782. "Les Anglais pourroient retirer aujourd'hui des sommes immenses de l'Inde, s'ils avoient eu l'attention de mieux composer le conseil suprême de Calcuta."*—Sonnerat, Voyage, i. 14.

Caaleefa, s. Ar. Khalīfa, the Caliph or Vice-gerent, a word which we do not introduce here chiefly in its high Mahomedan use, but because of its quaint application in Anglo-Indian households, at least in Upper India, to two classes of domestic servants, the tailor and the cook. The former is always so addressed by his fellow-servants (Khalīfa-jī!).

In South India the cook is called Maistry, i. e., artiste, (see Misteri). In Sicily, we may note, he is always called Monsù! an indication of what ought to be his nationality.

The root of the word Khalīfa, according to Prof. Sayce, means 'to change,' and another derivative khalīf, 'exchange or agio,' is the origin of the Greek κολλύβος (Princ. of Philology, 2nd ed., 213).

c. 1253. "—vindrent marcheant en l'ost qui nous distrent et conterent que li roys des Tartarins avoit prise la citei de Baudas et l'apostole des Sarrazins . . . le quel on appeloit le calife de Baudas. . ."—Joinville, xciv.

1298. "Baudas is a great city, which used to be the seat of the Calif of all the Saracens in the world, just as Rome is the seat of the Pope of all the Christians."—Marco Polo, Bk. I. ch. 6.

1552. "To which the Sheikh replied that he was the vassal of the Soldan of Cairo, and that without his permission who was the sovereign Califa of the Prophet Mahamed, he could hold no communication with people who so persecuted his followers. . ."—Barros, II. i. 2.

1738. "Muzeratty, the late Kaleefa, or Lieutenant of this province, assured me that he saw a bone belonging to one of them (ancient stone coffins) which was near two of their drass (i. e. 36 inches) in length."—Shaw's Travels in Barbary, ed. 1757, p. 30.

1747. "As to the house, and the patrimonial lands, together with the appendages of the murdered minister, they were presented by the Qhalif of the age, that is by the Emperor himself, to his own daughter."—Seir Mutaakherin, iii. 37.

"I hate all Kings and the thrones they sit on,
From the King of France to the Caliph of Britain."

These lines were found among the papers of Pr. Charles Edward, and supposed to be his. But Lord Stanhope, in the 2nd ed. of his Miscellanies, says he finds they are slightly altered from a poem by Lord Rochester. This we cannot find.

Caaleoon, Calyoon, s. Pers. ka-liyūn, a water-pipe for smoking; the Persian form of the hubble-bubble (q.v.).

1828. "The elder of the men met to smoke their caaleoons under the shade."—The Kuzzilbash, i. 59.

Calico, s. Cotton cloth, ordinarily of tolerably fine texture. The word appears in the 17th century sometimes in the form of Calicut, but possibly this may have been a purism, for calicoe or callico occurs in English earlier, or at least more commonly in early voyages. The word may have come to us through the French calicot, which, though retaining the t to the eye, does not do so to the ear. The quotations sufficiently illustrate the use of the word and its origin from Calicut. The fine cotton stuffs of Malabar are already mentioned by Marco Polo (ii. 379). Possibly they may have been all brought from beyond the Ghauts, as the Malabar cotton, ripening during the rains, is not usable, and the cotton stuffs now used in Malabar all come from Madura (see Fryer, below; and Terry under Calicut). The Germans, we may note, call the turkey Calecutische Hahn, though it comes no more from Calicut than it does from Turkey.

1579. "3 great and large Canowes, in each whereof were certaine of the greatest personages that were about him, attired all of them in white Lawne, or cloth of Calecut."—Drake, World Encompassed (Hak. Soc.) 139.

1591. "The commodities of the shippes that come from Bengala bee . . . fine Calicut cloth, Pintados, and Rice."—Barker's Lancaster in Hak. ii. 592.

1592. "The calicoes were book-calicoes, calico launes, broad white calicoes, fine starched calicoes, coarse white calicoes, browne coarse calicoes."—Desc. of the Great Carrack Madre de Dios.

1602. "And at his departure gaue a robe, and a Tucke of Calico wrought with Gold."—Lancaster's Voyage in Purchas, i. 153.

1604. "It doth also appear by the abbreuiate of the Accounts sent home out of the Indies, that there remained in the hands of the Agent, Master Starkey, 482 fardels of Calicoes."—In Middleton's Voyage, Hak. Soc. App. iii. 13.

"I can fit you, gentlemen, with fine calicoes too, for doublets; the only sweet fashion now, most delicate and courtly: a meek gentle callioo, cut upon two double affable taffatas; all most neat, feat, and unmatched."—Dekker, The Honest Whore, Act II. Sc. v.

1605. ". . . about their loynes they (the Javanese) weare a kind of Callico-cloth."—Edm. Scot, ibid. 165.

1608. "They esteem not so much of money as of Calecut clothes, Pintados, and such like stuffs."—John Davis, ibid. 136.

1612. "Calico copboord claiths, the piece . . . xls."—Rates and Valuations, &c. (Scotland) p. 294.

1616. "Angarezia . . . inhabited by Moores trading with the Maine, and other three Easterne llands with their Cattell and fruits, for Callicoos or other linnen to cover them."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas.

1673. "Staple Commodities are Calicuts, white and painted."—Fryer, 34.

"Calicut for Spice . . . and no Cloath, though it give the name of Calicut to all in India, it being the first Port from whence they are known to be brought into Europe."—Ibid. 86.

Calingula, s. A sluice or escape.

* Not 'a larger kind of cinnamon,' or 'cinnamon which is known there by the name of crassu' (canellae quae grossae appellantur), as Mr. Winter Jones oddly renders, but canella grossa, i.e., 'coarse' cinnamon, alias cassia.

Tam. kalingal. Much used in reports of irrigation works in S. India.

Calputtee, s. A caulker; also the process of caulking. Hind. and Beng. kālapatti and kalāpatti, and these no doubt from the Port. calafate. But this again is oriental in origin, from the Arabic kālafat, the 'process of caulking.' It is true that Dozy (see p. 376) and also Jal (see his Index, ii. 589), doubt the last derivation, and are disposed to connect the Portuguese and Spanish words, and the Italian calafattare, &c., with the Latin calefacere. The latter word would apply well enough to the process of pitching a vessel as practised in the Mediterranean, where we have seen the vessel careened over, and a great fire of thorns kindled under it to keep the pitch fluid. But caulking is not pitching; and when both form and meaning correspond so exactly, and when we know so many other marine terms in the Mediterranean to have been taken from the Arabic, there does not seem to be room for reasonable doubt in this case.

The Emperor Michael V. (A.D. 1041) was called καλαφάρης, because he was the son of a caulker (see Ducange, Gloss. Graec., who quotes Zonaras).

Since writing what precedes we see that M. Marcel Devic also rejects the views of Dozy and Jal.

1554. (At Mozambique) . . . "To two calaffates . . . of the said brigantines, at the rate annually of 20,000 reis each, with 9000 reis each for maintenance and 6 measures of millet to each, of which no count is taken."

c. 1620. "S'il estoit besoin de calfader le Vaisseau . . . on y auroit beaucoup de peine dans ce Port, principalement si on est contraint de se servir des Charpentiers et des Calfadeurs du Pays; parce qu'ils dependent tous du Gouverneur de Bombain" . . . —Routier . . . des Indes Orient., par Alexis de Motta, in Thevenot's Collection.

Caluat, s. This in some old travels is used for Ar. khiluat, 'privacy, a private interview' (C. P. Brown, MS.).

1510. The said wood is fixed in the middle of the back of the malefactor, and passes through his body . . . this torture is called 'uncalvet.'—Varthema, 147.

1582. "The Capitaine General for to encourage them the more, commanded before them all to pitch a long staffe in the ground, the which was made sharp at ye one end. The same amongst the Malabars is called Calvete, upon ye which they do execute justice of death, unto the poorest or vilest people of the county."—Castañeda, tr. by N. L., ff. 142 v, 143.

1606. "The Queen marvelled much at the thing, and to content them she ordered the sorcerer to be delivered over for punishment, and to be set on the caloete, which is a very sharp stake, fixed firmly in the ground" . . . etc.—Gouvea, f. 47 r, see also f. 163.

Calyan, n.p. The name of more than one city of fame in W. and S. India; Skt. Kalyāna, 'beautiful, noble, propitious.' One of these is the place still known as Kalyān, on the Ulas river, more usually called by the name of the city, 33 miles N.E. of Bombay. This is a very ancient port, and is probably the one mentioned by Cosmas below. It appears as the residence of a donor in an inscription on the Kanheri caves in Salsette (see Fergusson and Burgess, p. 349). Another Kalyana was the capital of the Chalukyas of the Deccan in the 9th—12th centuries. This is in the Nizam's district of Naldrūg, about 40 miles E.N.E. of the fortress called by that name. A third Kalyāna or Kalyāni was a port of Canara, between Mangalore and Kundapur, in lat. 13° 28' or thereabouts, on the same river as Baccanore, q.v.

The quotations refer to the first Calyan.

c. A.D. 80-90. "The local marts which occur in order after Barygaza are Akabaru, Suppara, Kalliana, a city which was raised to the rank of a regular mart in the time of Saraganes, but, since Sandanes became its master, its trade has been put under restrictions; for if Greek vessels, even by accident, enter its ports, a guard is put on board, and they are taken to Barygaza."—Periplus, §52.

"On both sides are placed stately Aldeas, and Dwellings of the Portugal Fidalgos; till on the Right, within a Mile or more of Gullean, they yield possession to the neighbouring Sera Gi, at which City (the key this way into that Rebel's Country), Wind and Tide favouring us, we landed."—Fryer, p. 123.

1825. "Near Candaulah is a waterfall . . . its stream winds to join the sea, nearly opposite to Tannah, under the name of the Callianee river."—Heber, ii. 137.

Prof. Forchhammer has lately described the great remains of a Pagoda and other buildings with inscriptions, near the city of Pegu, called Kalyāni.

Cambay, n.p. Written by Mahomedan writers Kanbāyat, sometimes Kinbāyat. According to Col. Tod, the original Hindu name was Khambavati, 'City of the Pillar.' Long a very famous port of Guzerat, at the head of the Gulf to which it gives its name. Under the Mahomedan kings of Guzerat it was one of their chief residences, and they are often called kings of Cambay. Cambay is still a feudatory state under a Nawab. The place is in decay, owing partly to the shoals, and the extraordinary rise and fall of the tides in the Gulf, impeding navigation.

Camboja, n.p. An ancient kingdom in the eastern part of Indo-China, once great and powerful: now fallen, and under the "protectorate" of France, whose Saigon colony it adjoins. The name, like so many others of Indo-China since the days of Ptolemy, is of Sanskrit origin, being apparently a transfer of the name of a nation and country on the N.W. frontier of India,

Kamboja, supposed to have been about the locality of Chitral or Kafiristan. Ignoring this, fantastic Chinese and other etymologies have been invented for the name. In the older Chinese annals (c. 1200 B.C.) this region had the name of Fu-nan; from a period after our era, when the kingdom of Camboja had become powerful, it was known to the Chinese as Chin-la. Its power seems to have extended at one time westward, perhaps to the shores of the B. of Bengal. Ruins of extraordinary vastness and architectural elaboration are numerous, and have attracted great attention since M. Mouhot's visit in 1859; though they had been mentioned by 16th century missionaries, and some of the buildings when standing in splendour were described by a Chinese visitor at the end of the 13th century.

The Cambojans proper call themselves Khmer, a name which seems to have given rise to singular confusions (see Comar).

The gum Gamboge so familiar in use, derives its name from this country, the chief source of supply.

Cameeze, s. This word (kaññs) is used in colloquial Hind. and Tamil for 'a shirt.' It comes from the Port. camisa. But that word is directly from the Arab. kañiz, 'a tunic.' Was St. Jerome's Latin word an earlier loan from the Arabic, or the source of the Arabic word? The Mod. Greek Dict. of Sophocles has kapliov.

Cumesa is, according to the Slang Dictionary, used in the cant of English thieves; and in more ancient slang it was made into 'commission.'

Camp, s. In the Madras Presidency an official not at his head-quarters is always addressed as "in Camp."

Camphor, s. There are three camphors:—

a. The Bornean and Sumatran camphor from Dryobalanops aromatica.

b. The camphor of China and Japan, from Cinnamomum Camphora.

(These are the two chief camphors of commerce; the first immensely exceeding the second in market value; see Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. xi. Note 3.)

c. The camphor of Blumea balsamifera, D.C., produced, and used, in China under the name of ngai camphor.

The relative ratios of value in the Canton market may be roundly given as b, 1; c, 10; a, 80.

The first western mention of this drug occurs, as was pointed out by Messrs. Hanbury and Flückiger, in the Greek medical writer Aëtius (see below), but it probably came through the Arabs, as is indicated by the ph, or f of the Arab. kāfir, representing the Sanskrit karpūru. It has been suggested that the word was originally Javanese, in which language kāpūr appears to mean both 'line' and 'camphor.'

Moodeen Sheriff says that kāfir is used (in Ind. Materia Medica) for 'amber.' Tābaskūr (q.v.) is, according to the same writer, called banis-kāfir, "bamboo-camphor;" and ras-kāfir (mercury-camphor) is an impure subchloride of mercury. According to the same authority, the varieties of camphor now met with in the bazars of S. India are—1. kāfir-i-kašūrī, which is in Tamil called pach'ch'ai (i. e., crude) karuppuram; 2. Šarati kāfir; 3. Chinī; 4. Batai (from the Batta country?). The first of these names is a curious instance of the perpetuation of a blunder, originating in the misreading of loose Arabic writing. The name is unquestionably fanšūrī, which carelessness as to points has converted into kašūrī (as above, and in Blochmann's Ain, p. 79). The camphor al-fanšūrī is mentioned as early as by Avicenna, and by Marco Polo, and came from a place called Pansūr in Sumatra, perhaps the same as Barus, which has now long given its name to the costly Sumatran drug.

A curious notion of Ibn Batuta's (iv. 241) that the camphor of Sumatra (and Borneo) was produced in the inside of a cane, filling the joints between knot and knot, may be explained by the statement of Barbosa (p. 204), that the Borneo camphor as exported was packed in tubes of bamboo. This camphor is by Barbosa and some other old writers called 'eatable camphor' (da mangiare), because used in medicine, and with betel.

Our form of the word seems to have come from the Sp. alcanfor and camfora, through the French camphre. Dozy points out that one Italian form retains the truer name cafura, and an old German one (Mid. High Germ.) is gaffer (Oosterl. 47).

...”—Mas'udi, i. 338. The same work at iii. 49, refers back to this passage as “the country of Manṣūrah.” Probably Mas'udi wrote correctly Fanṣūrah.

1506. “...e de li (Tenasserim) vien pevere, canella, . . . camfora da manzar e de quella non se manea”... (i. e. both camphor to eat and camphor not to eat, or Sumatra and China camphor).—Leonardo Ca' Masser.

c. 1590. “The Camphor tree is a large tree growing in the ghauts of Hindostan and in China. A hundred horsemen and upwards may rest in the shade of a single tree . . . Of the various kinds of camphor the best is called Ribāhi or Qaiṣūri.”... In some books camphor in its natural state is called . . . Bhimsini.—Ain, pp. 78, 79.

1623. “In this shipp we have laden a small parcell of camphire of Barouse, being in all 60 catis.”—Batavian Letter, pubd. in Cocks's Diary, ii. 343.

1726. “The Persians name the Camphor of Baros, and also of Borneo to this day Kafur Camfuri, as it also appears in the printed text of Avicenna . . . and Bellunensis notes that in some MSS. of the author is found Kafur Fansuri. . .”—Valentijn, iv. 67.

1786. “The Camphor Tree has been recently discovered in this part of the Sircar's country. We have sent two bottles of the essential oil made from it for your use.”—Letter of Tippoo, Kirkpatrick, p. 231.

The first of these is the fine Sumatra camphor; the second at  $\frac{1}{13}$  of the price is China camphor.

Campoo, s. Hind. kampū, corr. of the English “camp,” or more properly of the Port. “campo.” It is used for ‘a camp,’ but formerly was specifically applied to the partially disciplined brigades under European commanders in the Mahratta service, thus :—

1803. “Begum Sumroo's Campoo has come up the ghauts, and I am afraid . . . joined Scindiah yesterday. Two deserters . . . declared that Pohlman's Campoo was following it.”—Wellington, ii. 264.

1833. “. . . its unhappy plains were swept over, this way and that, by the cavalry of rival Mahratta powers, Mogul and Rohilla horsemen, or campos and pultuns (battalions) under European adventurers. . . .”—Quarterly Review, April, p. 294.

Canara, n.p. Properly Kannada. This name has long been given to that part of the West coast which lies below the Ghauts, from Mt. Dely northward to the Goa territory; and now to the two British districts constituted out of that tract, viz., N. and S. Canara. This appropriation of the name, however, appears to be of European origin. The name, probably meaning ‘black country,’ from the black cotton soil prevailing there, was properly synonymous with Karṇāṭaka (see Carnatic), and apparently a corruption of that word. Our quotations show that throughout the 16th century the term was applied to the country above the Ghauts, sometimes to the whole kingdom of Narsinga or Vijayanagar (see Narsinga and Beejanugger). Gradually, and probably owing to local application at Goa, where the natives seem from the first to have been known to the Portuguese as Canarijs,* the name became appropriated to the low country on the coast between Goa and Malabar, which was subject to the kingdom in question, much in the same way that the name Carnatic came at a later date to be misapplied on the other side of the Peninsula.

The Kanara or Canarese language is spoken over a large tract above the Ghauts, and as far north as Bidar (see Caldwell, Introd. p. 33). It is only one of several languages spoken in the British districts of Canara, and that only in a small portion, viz., near Kundāpur. Tulu is the chief language in the Southern District.

1516. “Beyond this river commences the Kingdom of Narsinga, which contains five very large provinces, with each a language of its own. The first, which stretches along the coast to Malabar, is called Tulinat;† another lies in the interior . . .; another has the name of Telinga, which confines with the Kingdom of Orisa; another is Canari, in which is the great city of Bisnaga; and then the kingdom of Charamandel, the language of which is Tamul.”—Barbosa, ‡

c. 1535. “The last Kingdom of the First India is called the Province Canarim; it is bordered on one side by the Kingdom of Goa and by Anjadiva, and on the other side by Middle India or Malabar. In the interior is the King of Narsinga, who is chief of this country. The speech of those of 1552. "The third province is called Canará, also in the interior. . ."—Castanheda, ii. 50.

And as applied to the language :—

"The language of the Gentoos is Canará."—Ib. 78.

1552. "The whole coast that we speak of back to the Ghaut (Gate) mountain range . . . they call Concan, and the people properly Concanese (Conquenije), though our people call them Canarese (Canarijs) . . .

"And as from the Ghauts to the sea on the west of the Decan all that strip is called Concan, so from the Ghauts to the sea on the west of Canará, always excepting that stretch of 46 leagues of which we have spoken [north of Mount Dely] which belongs to the same Canará, the strip which stretches to Cape Comorin is called Malabar."—Barros, Dec. I. liv. ix. cap. 1.

" . . . The Kingdom of Canará, which extends from the river called Gate, north of Chaul, to Cape Comorin (so far as concerns the interior region east of the Ghats) . . . and which in the east marches with the kingdom of Orisa; and the Gento Kings of this great Province of Canará were those from whom sprang the present Kings of Bisnaga."—Ibid. Dec. 1614. "Its proper name is Charnathaca, which from corruption to corruption has come to be called Canará."—Couto, Dec. VI. liv. v. cap. 5.

In the following quotations the term is applied, either inclusively or exclusively, to the territory which we now call Canará :

1615. "Canará. Thence to the Kingdoms of the Cannarins, which is but a little one, and 5 days journey from Damans. They are tall of stature, idle, for the most part, and therefore the greater thieves."—De Monfort, p. 23.

1623. "Having found a good opportunity, such as I desired, of getting out of Goa, and penetrating further into India, that is more to the south, to Canará. . ."—P. della Valle, ii. 601.

1672. "The strip of land Canará, the inhabitants of which are called Canarins, is fruitful in rice and other food-stuffs."—Baldacus, 98.

There is a good map in this work, which shows 'Canará' in the modern acceptation.

1672. "Description of Canará and Journey to Goa.—This kingdom is one of the finest in India, all plain country near the sea, and even among the mountains all peopled."—P. Vincenzo Maria, 420.

Here the title seems used in the modern sense, but the same writer applies Canará to the whole Kingdom of Bisnagar.

1673. "At Mirja the Protector of Canara came aboard."—Fryer (margin), p. 57.

1726. "The Kingdom Canará (under which Onor, Batticala, and Garcopa are dependent) comprises all the western land lying between Walkan (Konkan?) and Malabar, two great coast countries."—Valentijn, v. 2.

1727. "The country of Canará is generally governed by a Lady, who keeps her Court at a Town called Baydour, two Days Journey from the Sea."—A. Ham, i. 280.

Canaut, Conaut, even Connaught, s. Hind. from Arab. kanāt, the side-wall of a tent, or canvas enclosure.

1616. "The King's Tents are red, reared on poles very high, and placed in the midst of the Camp, covering a large Compass, incircled with Canats (made of red calico stiffened with Canes at every breadth, standing upright about nine foot high) guarded round every night with Souldiers."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1481.

c. 1660. "And (what is hard enough to believe in Indostan, where the Grandees especially are so jealous . . .) I was so near to the Wife of this Prince (Dara), that the Cords of the Kanates . . . which enclosed them (for they had not so much as a poor tent), were fastened to the wheels of my chariot."—Bernier, E. T. 29.

1792. "They passed close to Tippoo's tents: the canaut* was standing, but the green tent had been removed."—T. Munro, in Life, iii. 73.

1793. "The canaut of canvas . . . was painted of a beautiful sea-green colour."—Dirom, 230.

object of so much political interest. But by the Ar. geographers of the 9th to 11th centuries the name is applied to (b) the country about Peshāwar, as the equivalent of the ancient Indian Gandhāra, and the Gandaritis of Strabo. Some think the name was transferred to (a) in consequence of a migration of the people of Gandhāra carrying with them the begging-pot of Buddha, believed by Sir H. Rawlinson to be identical with a large sacred vessel of stone preserved in a mosque of Candahar. Others think that Candahar may represent Alexandropolis in Arachosia. We find a third application of the name (c) in Ibn Batuta, as well as in earlier and later writers, to a former port on the east shore of the Gulf of Cambay, Ghandhar in the Broach District.

a.—1552. "Those who go from Persia, from the kingdom of Horacān (Khorasan), from Bohāra, and all the Western Regions, travel to the city which the natives corruptly call Candar, instead of Scandar, the name by which the Persians call Alexander. . . ."—Barros, IV. vi. 1.

b.—c. 1030. "... thence to the river Chandrāna (Chinab) 12 (parasangs); thence to Jailam on the West of the Bāyat (or Hydaspes) 18; thence to Waihind, capital of Kandahār . . . 20; thence to Parshāwar 14. . ."—Al-Birūni in Elliot, i. 63 (corrected).

c.—c. 1343. "From Kinbāya (Cambay) we went to the town of Kāwī (Kāwī, opp. Cambay), on an estuary where the tide rises and falls. . . thence to Kandahār, a considerable city belonging to the Infidels, and situated on an estuary from the sea."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 57, 58.

1516. "Further on . . . there is another place, in the mouth of a small river, which is called Guendari. . . And it is a very good town, a seaport. . ."—Barbosa, 64.

Candareen, s. In Malay, to which language the word apparently belongs, kandāri. A term formerly applied to the hundredth of the Chinese ounce or weight, commonly called by the Malay name tāhil (see tael). Fryer (1673) gives the Chinese weights thus:—

- 1 Cuttee is nearest 16 Taies
- 1 Teen (Taie ?) is 10 Mass
- 1 Mass in Silver is 10 Quandreens
- 1 Quandreem is 10 Cash
- 733 Cash make 1 Royal
- 1 grain English weight is 2 Cash.

1554. "In Malacca the weight used for gold, musk, &c., the cate, contains 20 taels; each tael 16 mazes, each maz 20 cumduryns; also 1 paual 4 mazes, each maz 4 cupongs; each cupong 5 cumduryns."—A. Nunes, 39.

1615. "We bought 5 greate square postes of the Kinges master carpenter; cost 2 mas 6 condrins per peece."—Cocks, i. 1.

Candy, n.p. A town in the hill country of Ceylon, which became the deposit of the sacred tooth of Buddha at the beginning of the 14th century, and was adopted as the native capital about 1592. Chitty says the name is unknown to the natives, who call the place Mahā nuvera, 'great city.' The name seems to have arisen out of some misapprehension by the Portuguese, which may be illustrated by the quotation from Valentijn.

c. 1530. "And passing into the heart of the Island, there came to the Kingdom of Candia, a certain Friar Pascoal with two companions, who were well received by the King of the country Javira Bandar . . . in so much that he gave them a great piece of ground, and everything needful to build a church, and houses for them to dwell in."—Couto, Dec. VI. liv. iv. cap. 7.

1552. "... and at three or four places, like the passes of the Alps of Italy, one finds entrance within this circuit (of mountains) which forms a Kingdom called Cande."—Barros, Dec. III. Liv. ii. cap. 1.

1645. "Now then as soon as the Emperor was come to his Castle in Candi he gave order that the 600 captive Hollanders should be distributed throughout his country among the peasants, and in the City."—J. J. Saar's 15-Jährige Kriegs-Dienst, 97.

1681. "The First is the City of Candy, so generally called by the Christians, probably from Conde, which in the Chingulays Language signifies Hills, for among them it is situated, but by the Inhabitants called Hingodagul-neure, as much as to say 'The City of the Chingulay people, and Mauneur, signifying the Chief or Royal City.'"—R. Knox, p. 5.

1726. "Candi, otherwise Candia, or named in Cingalees Conde Ouda, i.e. the high mountain country."—Valentijn (Ceylon), 19.

Candy, s. A weight used in S. India, which may be stated roughly at about 500lbs., but varying much in different parts. It corresponded broadly with the Arabian bahar (q.v.), and was generally equivalent to 20 maunds, varying therefore with the maund.

The word is Mahr. khandī, written in Tam. and Mal. kandī. The Portuguese write it candil.

1563. "A candil which amounts to 522 pounds" (arrateis).—Garcia, f. 55.

1598. "One candiel is little more or less than 14 bushels, wherewith they measure Rice, Corne, and all graine."—Linschoten, 69.

1618. "The Candee at this place (Batecala) containeth neere 500 pounds."—W. Hore in Purchas, i. 657.

1710. "They advised that they have supplied Habib Khan with ten candy of country gunpowder."—In Wheeler, ii. 136.

c. 1760. Grose gives the Bombay candy as 20 maunds of 28 lbs. each = 560 lbs.; the Surat ditto as 20 maunds of 37½ lbs. = 746½ lbs.; the Anjengo ditto 560 lbs.; the Carwar ditto 575 lbs.; the Coromandel ditto at 500 lbs. &c.

Candy (Sugar-). This name of crystallized sugar, though it came no doubt to Europe from the Pers. Arab. kand (Pers. also shakar .kand; Sp. azucar .cande; It. candi and zucchero candito; Fr. sucré candi) is of Indian origin. There is a Skt. root khaṇḍ, to break, whence khaṇḍa, 'broken,' also applied in various compounds to granulated and candied sugar. But there is also Tam. kar-kāṇḍa, Malayāl. kaṇḍi and kal-kaṇḍi, which may have been the direct source of the Persian and Arabic adoption of the word, and perhaps its original, from a Dravidian word = 'lump.'

A German writer, long within this century, (as we learn from Mahn quoted in Diez's Lexicon) appears to derive candy from Candia, "because most of the sugar which the Venetians imported was brought from that island" — a fact probably invented for the nonce. But the writer was the same wiseacre who (in the year 1829!) characterized the book of Marco Polo as a "clumsily compiled ecclesiastical fiction disguised as a Book of Travels" (see Introduction to Marco Polo, 2nd ed., pp. 112, 113).

c. 1343. "A centinajo si vende gien-giovo, cannella, lacca, incenso, indaco . . . verzino scorzuto, zucchero . . . zucchero candi . . . porcellane . . . costo . . ."

1461. "... Un ampoletto di balsamo. Teriaca bossoletti 15. Zuccheri Moccari (?) panni 42. Zuccheri canditi, scattole 5 . . ."—List of Presents from Sultan of Egypt to the Doge (see under Benjamin).

c. 1596. "White sugar candy (kandī safed) . . . 5½ damas per ser."—Ain, i. 63.

1627. "Sugar Candie, or Stone Sugar."—Minsheu, 2nd ed. s. v.

1727. "The Trade they have to China is divided between them and Surat . . . the Gross of their own Cargo, which consists in Sugar, Sugar-candy, Allom, and some Drugs . . . are all for the Surat Market."—A. Ham. i. 371.

Cangue, s. A square board, or portable pillory of wood, used in China as a punishment, or rather, as Dr. Wells Williams says, as a kind of censure, carrying no disgrace; strange as that seems to us, with whom the essence of the pillory is disgrace. The frame weighs up to 30lbs., a weight limited by law. It is made to rest on the shoulders without chafing the neck, but so broad as to prevent the wearer from feeding himself. It is generally taken off at night (Giles).

The Cangue was introduced into China by the Tartar dynasty of Wei in the 5th century, and is first mentioned under A.D. 481. In the Kwang-yun (a Chin. Dict. published A.D. 1009) it is called kunggiai (modern mandarin hiang - hāi), i.e. 'Neck-fetter.' From this old form probably the Anamites have derived their word for it, gong, and the Cantonese k'ang-ka, 'to wear the Cangue,' a survival (as frequently happens in Chinese vernaculars) of an ancient term with a new orthography. It is probable that the Portuguese took the word from one of these latter forms, and associated it with their own canga, an 'ox-yoke,' or 'porter's yoke for carrying burdens.' The thing is alluded to by F. M. Pinto and other early writers on China, who do not give it a name.

Something of this kind was in use in countries of Western Asia, called in Persia doshāka (bilignum). And this word is applied to the Chinese cangue in one of our quotations. Doshāka, however, is explained in the lexicon Burhān-i-Kāfi as 'a piece of timber with two branches placed on the neck of a criminal' (Quatremère, in Not. et Extr. xiv. 172, 173).

1420. "... made the ambassadors come forward side by side with certain prisoners . . . Some of these had a doshāka on their necks."—Shah Rukh's Mission to China, in Cathay, p. cclv.

c. 1540. "... Ordered us to be put in a horrid prison with fetters on our feet, manacles on our hands, and collars on our necks . . ."—F. M. Pinto (orig.) ch. lxxxiv.

1585. "Also they doo lay on them a certaine covering of timber, wherein remaineth no more space of hollownesse than their bodies doth make: thus they are vsed that are condemned to death."—Mendoza (tr. by Parke, 1589) Hak. Soc. i. 117-118.

1696. "He was imprisoned, congoed, tormented, but making friends with his Money . . . was cleared, and made Under-Customs."—Bowyer's Journal at Cochin China in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 81.

1727. "With his neck in the congoes which are a pair of Stocks made of bamboos."—A. Ham. ii. 175.

1779. "Aussitôt on les mit tous trois en prison, des chaînes aux pieds, une cangue au cou."—Lettres Edif. xxv. 427.

1797. "The punishment of the cha, usually called by Europeans the cangue, is generally inflicted for petty crimes."—Staunton, Embassy, &c. ii. 492.

1878. "... frapper sur les joues à l'aide d'une petite lame de cuir; c'est, je crois, la seule correction infligée aux femmes, car je n'en ai jamais vu aucune porter la cangue."—Léon Rousset, À Travers la Chine, 124.

Cannanore, n.p. A port on the coast of northern Malabar, famous in the early Portuguese history, and which still is the chief British military station on that coast, with a European regiment. The name is Kanṇūr or Kanṇanūr, 'Krishna's Town.'

c. 1506. "In Cananor il suo Resi è zentil, e qui nasce zz. (i.e. zanzari, 'ginger'); ma li zz. pochi e non cusi boni come quelli de Colcut."—Leonardo Ca' Masser, in Archivio Storico Ital., Append.

1510. "Canonor is a fine and large city, in which the King of Portugal has a very strong castle. . . This Canonor is the port at which horses which come from Persia disembark."—Varthema, 123.

Fará que todo o Nayne em fim se mova Que entre Calcut jaz, e Cananor."

By Burton :

* "The Samorin shall summon fresh allies ;

lo ! at his bidding every Nayr-man hies, that dwells *twixt Calcut and Cananor."

Canongo, s. Pers. kanūn-go, i.e. 'Law-utterer' (the first part being Arab. from Gr. kavón). In upper India, and formerly in Bengal, the registrar of a taḥṣīl, or other revenue subdivision, who receives the reports of the patwāris, or village registrars.

1765. "I have to struggle with every difficulty that can be thrown in my way by ministers, mutseddies, congoss (!) &c. and their dependents."—Letter from F. Sykes, in Caraccioli's Life of Clive, i. 542.

Canteroy, s. A gold coin formerly used in the S.E. part of Madras territory. It was worth 3 rs. Properly Kanṭhīravī hūn (or pagoda) from Kanṭhīravā Rāyā, who ruled in Mysore from 1638 (C. P. Brown, MS.). See Dirom's Narrative, p. 279, where the revenues of the territory taken from Tippoo in 1792 are stated in Canteray pagodas.

Canton, n.p. The great seaport of Southern China, the chief city of the Province of Kwang-tung, whence we take the name, through the Portuguese, whose older writers call it Cantão. The proper name of the city is Kwang-chau-fu.

c. 1535. "... queste cose . . . vanno alla China con li lor giunchi, e a Canton, che è Città grande. . ."—Sommario de' Regni, in Ramusio, i. f. 337.

1585. "The Chinos do vse in their pronunciation to terme their cities with this syllable, Fu, that is as much as to say, citie, as Taybin fu, Canton fu, and their townes with this syllable, Chen."—Mendoza, Parke's old E. T. (1588) Hak. Soc. i. 24.

1727. "Canton or Quantung (as the Chinese express it) is the next maritime Province."—A. Ham. ii. 217.

Cantonment, s. (Pron. Cantoonment, with accent on penult.) This English word has become almost appropriated as Anglo-Indian, being so constantly used in India, and so little used elsewhere. It is applied to military stations in India, built usually on a plan which is originally that of a standing camp or "cantonment."

1783. "I know not the full meaning of the word cantonment, and a camp this singular place cannot well be termed; it more resembles a large town, very many miles in circumference. The officers' bungalows on the banks of the Tappee are large and convenient, &c."—Forbes, Letter in Oriental Memoirs, describing the "Bengal Cantonments near Surat," iv. 239.

1825. "The fact, however, is certain . . . the cantonments at Lucknow, nay Calcutta itself, are abominably situated. I have heard the same of Madras; and now the lately-settled cantonment of Nusseerabad appears to be as objectionable as any of them."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 7.

1848. "Her ladyship, our old acquaintance, is as much at home at Madras as at Brussels—in the cantonment as under the tents."—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. 8.

Capel, s. Malayāl. Kappal, 'a ship.' This word has been imported into Malay and Javanese.

1498. In the vocabulary of the language of Calicut given in the Roteiro de V. de Gama we have—

"Navo; capell," p. 118.

1510. "Some others which are made like ours, that is in the bottom, they call capel."—Varthema, 154.

Capelan, n.p. This is a name which was given by several 16th-century travellers to the mountains in Burma from which the rubies purchased at Pegu were said to come; the idea of their distance, &c., being very vague. It is not in our power to say what name was intended. The real position of the "ruby-mines" is 60 or 70 miles N.E. of Mandalay.

1506. "... e qui ù porto appresso uno loco che si-chiama Acaplen, dove li se trova molti rubini, e spinade, e zoie d'ogni sorte."—Leonardo di Ca' Masser, p. 28.

1510. "The sole merchandise of these people is jewels, that is, rubies, which come from another city called Capellan, which is distant from this (Pegu) 30 days' journey."—Varthema, 218.

1516. "Further inland than the said Kingdom of Ava, at 5 days journey to the south-east, is another city of Gentiles . . . called Capelan, and all round are likewise found many and excellent rubies, which they bring to sell at the city and fair of Ava, and which are better than those of Ava."—Barbosa, 187.

c. 1535. "This region of Arquam borders on the interior with the great mountain called Capelangam, where are many places inhabited by a not very civilized people. These carry musk and rubies to the great city of Ava, which is the capital of the Kingdom of Arquam. . ."—Sommario de Regni, in Ramusio, i. 334 v.

c. 1660. "... A mountain 12 days journey or thereabouts, from Siren towards the North-east; the name whereof is Capelan. In this mine are found great quantities of Rubies."—Tavernier (E. T.) ii. 143.

Phillips's Mineralogy (according to Col. Burney) mentions the locality of the ruby as "the Capelan mountains, sixty miles from Pegue, a city in Ceylon!" (J. As. Soc. Bengal, ii. 75).

This writer is certainly very loose in his geography, and Dana (ed. 1850) is not much better:

"The best ruby sapphires occur in the Capelan mountains, near Syrian, a city of Pegu."—Mineralogy, p. 222.

Capucat, n.p. The name of a place on the sea near Calicut, mentioned by several old authors, but which has now disappeared from the maps, and probably no longer exists. The proper form is uncertain.

1498. In the Roteiro it is called Capua.—P. 50.

1510. "... another place called Capogatto, which is also subject to the King of Calicut. This place has a very beautiful palace, built in the ancient style."—Varthema, 133-134.

1516. "Further on . . . is another town, at which there is a small river, which is called Capucad, where there are many country-born Moors, and much shipping."—Barbosa, 152.

1562. "And they seized a great number of grabs and vessels belonging to the people of Kakkad, and the new port, and Calicut, and Funan [i.e. Ponany], these all being subject to the Zamorin."—Tohfut-ul-Mujahideen, tr. by Rowlandson, p. 157.

The want of editing in this last book is deplorable.

Caracoa, Caracolle, &c., s. Malay kura-kura, but said to be Arab. kura-kura which Dozy says (s.v. Carraca) was, among the Arabs, a merchant vessel, sometimes of very great size. Crawford describes the Malay kura-kura, as 'a large kind of sailing vessel;' but the quotation from Jarric shows it to have been the Malay galley. Marre (Kata-Kata Malayou, 87) says: "The Malay kora-kora is a great row-boat; still in use in the Moluccas. Many measure 100 feet long and 10 wide. Some have as many as 90 rowers."

c. 1330. "We embarked on the sea at Ladhikiya in a big kurkura belonging to Genoese people, the master of which was called Martalamin."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 254.

1349. "I took the sea on a small kur-kura belonging to a Tunisian."—Ibid. iv. 327.

1606. "The foremost of these Gallies or Caracolles recovered our Shippe, wherein was the King of Tarnata."—Middleton's Voyage, E. 2.

"... Nave conscensâ, quam linguâ patriâ caracora nuncupant. Navigii genus est oblongum, et angustum, triremis instar, velis simul et remis impellitur."—Jarric, Thesaurus, i. 192.

1659. "They (natives of Ceram, &c.) hawked these dried heads backwards and forwards in their korrekordes as a special rarity."—Walter Schultzen's Ost-Indische Reise, &c., p. 41.

1711. "Les Philippines nomment ces bati-mens caracoas. C'est une espèce de petite galère à rames et à voiles."—Lettres Edif. iv. 27.

1774. "A corocoro is a vessel generally fitted with outriggers, having a high arched stem and stern, like the points of a half moon. . . The Dutch have fleets of them at Amboyna, which they employ as guard-costas."—Forrest, Voyage to N. Guinea, 23. Forrest has a plate of a corocoro, p. 64.

Caraffe, s. Dozy shows that this word, which in English we use for a water-bottle, is of Arabic origin, and comes from a root gharaf, 'to draw' (water), through the Span. garráfa. But the precise Arabic word is not in the dictionaries (see under Carboy).

Carambola, s. The name given by various old writers on Western India to the beautiful acid fruit of the tree (N. O. Oxalideae), called by Linn. from this word, Averrhoa carambola. This name was that used by the Portuguese. De Orta tells us that it was the Malabar name. The word karanbal is also given by Molesworth as the Mahratti name. In Upper India the fruit is called kamranga, kamrakh, or khamrak (Skt. karmara, karmāra, karmaraka, karmaranga). * See also under Blimbee. Why a cannon at billiards should be called by the French carambolage we do not know.

c. 1530. "Another fruit is the Kermerik. It is fluted with five sides," &c.—Erskine's Baber, 325.

1563. "O. Antonia, pluck me from that tree a Carambola or two (for so they call them in Malavar, and we have adopted the Malavar name, because that was the first region where we got acquainted with them).

"A. Here they are.

"R. They are beautiful; a sort of sour-sweet, not very acid. . .

"O. They are called in Canarin and in Decan camariz, and in Malay balimba . . . they make with sugar a very pleasant conserve of these . . . Antonia! bring hither a preserved carambola."—Garcia, ff. 46 v, 47.

1598. "There is another fruit called Carambolas, which hath 8 (5 really) corners, is bigge as a smal apple, sower in eating, like vnripe plums, and most vsed to make Conserues. (Note by Paludanus) The fruit which the Malabars and Portingales call Carambolas, is in Decan called Camarix, in Canar. Camarix and Carabeli; in Malaio, Bolumbia, and by the Persians Chamaroch."—Linschoten, 96.

1672. "The Carambola . . . as large as a pear, all sculptured (as it were) and divided into ribs, the ridges of which are not round but sharp, resembling the heads of those iron maces that were anciently in use."—P. Vincenzo Maria, 352.

1878. ". . . the oxalic Kamrak."—In my Indian Garden, 50.

Carat, s. Arab. ḳirrāt, which is taken from the Greek κεράριον, a bean of the kepareia or carob tree (Ceratonia siliqua, L.).

This bean, like the Indian rati (see ruttee) was used as a weight, and thence also it gave name to a coin of account, if not actual. To discuss the carat fully would be a task of extreme complexity, and would occupy several pages.

Under the name of siliqua it was the 24th part of the golden solidus of Constantine, which again was =  $\frac{1}{3}$  of an ounce. Hence the carat was =  $\frac{1}{144}$  of an ounce.

In the passage from St. Isidore quoted below the cerates is distinct from the siliqua, and =  $1\frac{1}{2}$  Siliquae. This we cannot explain, but the siliqua Graeca was the κεράριον; and the siliqua as  $\frac{1}{24}$  of a solidus is the parent of the carat in all its uses. Thus we find the carat at Constantinople in the 14th century =  $\frac{1}{24}$  of the hyperpera or Greek bezant, which was a debased representative of the solidus; and at Alexandria  $\frac{1}{24}$  of the Arabic dinār, which was a purer representative of the solidus. And so, as the Roman uncia signified  $\frac{1}{12}$  of any unit (compare ounce, inch) so to a certain extent carat came to signify  $\frac{1}{24}$ . Dictionaries give Arab. ḳirrāt as " $\frac{1}{24}$  of an ounce." Of this we do not know the evidence. The English Cyclopædia s. v. again states that "the carat was originally the 24th part of the marc, or half-pound, among the French, from whom the word came." This sentence perhaps contains more than one error; but still both of these allegations exhibit the carat as  $\frac{1}{24}$ th part. Among our goldsmiths the term is still used to measure the proportionate quality of gold; pure gold being put at 24 carats, gold with  $\frac{1}{7}$  alloy at 22 carats, with  $\frac{1}{4}$  alloy at 18 carats, &c. And the word seems also (like anna, q.v.) sometimes to have been used to express a proportionate scale in other matters, as is illustrated by a curious passage in Marco Polo, quoted below.

The carat is also used as a weight for diamonds. As  $\frac{1}{144}$  of an ounce troy this ought to make it  $3\frac{1}{2}$  grains. But these carats really run  $151\frac{1}{2}$  to the ounce troy, so that the diamond carat is  $3\frac{1}{2}$  grs. nearly. This we presume was adopted direct from some foreign system in which the carat was  $\frac{1}{144}$  of the local ounce.

c. A.D. 636. "Siliqua vigesima quarta pars solidi est, ab arboris semine vocabulum tenens. Cerates oboli pars media est siliquæ habens unam semis. Hanc latinitas semi-obuli vocat: Cerates autem Graece, Latine siliqua cornu interpretatur. Obulus siliquis tribus appenditur, habens cerates duos, calcos quatuor."—Isidori Hispalensis Opera (ed. Paris, 1601), p. 224.

beauty enjoined upon them. The commissioners . . . assemble all the girls of the province, in presence of appraisers appointed for the purpose. These carefully survey the points of each girl. . . They will then set down some as estimated at 16 carats, some at 17, 18, 20, or more or less, according to the sum of the beauties or defects of each. And whatever standard the Great Kaan may have fixed for those that are to be brought to him, whether it be 20 carats or 21, the commissioners select the required number from those who have attained that standard."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed. i. 350-351.

1673. "A stone of one Carrack is worth 10l."—Fryer, 214.

Caravan, s. P. karwān; a convoy of travellers. The Arab. kāfila is more generally used in India. The word is found in French as early as the 13th century (Littre). A quotation below shows that the English transfer of the word to a wheeled conveyance for travellers (now for goods also) dates from the 17th century. The abbreviation van in this sense seems to have acquired rights as an English word, though the altogether analogous bus is still looked on as slang.

c. 1270. "Meanwhile the convoy (la caravana) from Tortosa . . . armed seven vessels in such wise that any one of them could take a galley if it ran alongside."—Chronicle of James of Aragon, tr. by Foster, i. 379.

1330. "De hac civitate recedens cum caravanis et cum quadam societate, ivi versus Indiam Superiorem."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c. ii. App. iii.

Caravel, s. This often occurs in the old Portuguese narratives. The word is alleged to be not oriental, but Celtic, and connected in its origin with the old British coracle; see the quotation from Isidore of Seville, the indication of which we owe to Bluteau, s.v.

The Portuguese caravel is described by the latter as a 'round vessel' (i. e., not long and sharp like a galley), with lateen sails, ordinarily of 200 tons burthen.

The character of swiftness attributed to the caravel (see both Damian and Bacon below) has suggested to us whether the word had not come rather from the Persian Gulf—Turki, karā-wul, 'a scout, an outpost, a vanguard.' Doubtless there are difficulties. Thus the word is found in the following passage, quoted from the life of St. Nilus, who died c. 1000, a date hardly consistent with Turkish origin. But the Latin translation is by Cardinal Sirlet, c. 1550, and the word may have been changed or modified:

"Cogitavit enim in unaquaque Calabrie regione perficere navigia. . . Id autem non ferentes Russani cives . . . simul irruentes ac tumultuantes navigia comusserunt et eas quae Caravellae appellantur secuerunt."—In the Collection of Martene and Durand, vi. col. 930.

Carboy, s. A large glass bottle holding several gallons, and generally covered with wicker-work, well-known in England, where it is chiefly used to convey acids and corrosive liquids in bulk. Though this is not an Anglo-Indian word, it comes (in the form karāba) from Persia, as Wedgwood has pointed out. Kaempfer, whom we quote from his description of the wine trade at Shiraz, gives an exact etching of a carboy. Lattre mentions that the late M. Mohl referred caraffe to the same original; but see that word. Karāba is no doubt connected with Ar. kīrba, 'a large leathern milk-bottle.'

1712. "Vasa vitrea, alia sunt maiora, ampullacea et circumdueto scirpo tunicata, quae vocant Karabā . . . Venit Karaba una apud vitriarios duobus mamudi, raro carius."—Kaempfer, Amoen. Exot. 379.

Carcoon, s. Mahr. kārkūn, 'a clerk,' which is an adoption of the Persian kār-kun (faciendorum factor) or 'manager.'

1826. "My benefactor's chief carcoon or clerk, allowed me to sort out and direct despatches to officers at a distance who belonged to the command of the great Sawant Rao."—Pandurang Hari, 21.

Carical, n.p. Etymology doubtful. Karaikkal (Tamil). Fra Paulino says it means 'Black rock.' A French settlement within the limits of Tanjore district.

Carnatic, n.p. Karnāṭaka and Kārnāṭaka, Skt. adjective forms from Karnāṭa or Kārnāṭa. This word in native use, according to Bp. Caldwell, denoted the Telugu and Canarese people and their language, but in process of time became specially the appellation of the people speaking Canarese and their language.* The Mahomedans on their arrival in S. India found a region which embraces Mysore and part of Telingāna (in fact the kingdom of Vijayanagara), called the Karnāṭaka country, and this was identical in application (and probably in etymology) with the Canara country (q.v.) of the older Portuguese writers. The Karnāṭaka became extended, especially in connection with the rule of the Nabobs of Arcot, who partially occupied the Vijayanagara territory, and were known as Nawābs of the Karnāṭaka, to the country below the Ghauts, on the eastern side of the Peninsula, just as the other form Canara had become extended to the country below the western Ghauts; and eventually among the English the term Carnatic came to be understood in a sense more or less restricted to the eastern low country, though never quite so absolutely as Canara has become restricted to the western low country. The term Carnatic is now obsolete.

c. A.D. 550. In the Brihat-Saṁhitā of Varāhamihira, in the enumeration of peoples and regions of the south, we have in Kern's translation (J. R. As. Soc. N.S. v. 83) Karnatic; the original form, which is not given by Kern, is Karnāta.

c. A.D. 1100. In the later Sanskrit literature this name often occurs, e.g. in the Kathasaritsāgara, or 'Ocean for Rivers of Stories,' a collection of tales (in verse) of the beginning of the 12th Century, by Somadeva, of Kashmir; but it is not possible to attach any very precise meaning to the word as there used.

A.D. 1400. The word also occurs in the inscriptions of the Vijayanagara dynasty, e.g. in one of A.D. 1400.—(Elem. of S. Indian Palaeography, 2nd ed. pl. xxx.)

1673. "I received this information from the natives, that the Canatick country reaches from Gongola to the Zamerhin's Country of the Malabars along the Sea, and inland up to the Pepper Mountains of Sunda. . . Bedmure, four Days Journey hence, is the Capital City."—Fryer, 162, in Letter IV., A Relation of the Canatick Country.—Here he identifies the "Canatick" with Canara below the Ghauts.

So also the coast of Canara seems meant in the following:

c. 1760. "Though the navigation from the Carnatic coast to Bombay is of a very short run, of not above six or seven degrees."—Grose, i. 232.

c. 1760. "The Carnatic or province of Arcot . . . its limits now are greatly inferior to those which bounded the ancient Carnatic; for the Nabobs of Arcot have never extended their authority beyond the river Gondegama to the north; the great chain of mountains to the west; and the branches of the Kingdom of Trichinopoly, Tanjore, and Maissore to the south; the sea bounds it to the east."—Ibid. II. vii.

1762. "Siwage Madhoo Rao . . . with this immense force . . . made an incursion into the Karnatic Balaghaut."—Hussain Ali Khan, History of Hydr Nāik, 148.

1792. "I hope that our acquisitions by this peace will give so much additional strength and compactness to the frontier of our possessions, both in the Carnatic, and on the coast of Malabar, as to render it difficult for any power above the Ghauts to invade us."—Lord Cornwallis's Despatch from Seringapatam, in Seton-Karr, ii. 96.

1826. "Camp near Chillumbum (Carnatic), March 21st." This date of a letter of Bp. Heber's is probably one of the latest instances of the use of the term in a natural way.

Carnatic Fashion. See under Be-nighted.

Carrack, n.p. An island in the upper part of the Persian Gulf, which has been more than once in British occupation. Properly Khārak. It is so written in Jaubert's Edrisi (i. 364, 372). But Dr. Badger gives the modern Arabic as el-Khārī, which would represent old Persian Khārig.

c. 830. "Kharek . . . cette isle qui a un farsakh en long et en large, produit du blé, des palmiers, et des vignes."—Ibn Khurdād-ba, in J. As. ser. vi. tom. v. 283.

Carrack, s. A kind of vessel of burden from the middle ages down to the end of the 17th century. The character of the earlier carrack cannot be precisely defined. But the larger cargo-ships of the Portuguese in the trade of the 16th century were generally so styled, and these were sometimes of enormous tonnage, with 3 or 4 decks. Charnock (Marine Architecture, ii., p. 9) has a plate of a Genoese carrack of 1542. He also quotes the description of a Portuguese carrack taken by Sir John Barrough in 1592. It was of 1,600 tons burthen, whereof 900 merchandize; carried 32 brass pieces and between 600 and 700 passengers (P); was built with 7 decks. The word (L. Lat.) carraca is regarded by Skeat as properly carrica, from caricare, It. caricare, to lade, 'to charge.' This is possible; but it would be well to examine if it be not from the Ar. harākāh, a word which the dictionaries explain as 'fire ship;' though this is certainly not always the meaning. Ibn Batuta uses it, twice at least, for a state barge or something of that kind (see Cathay and the Way Thither, p. 499, and Ibn Bat. ii. 116; iv. 289).

The like use occurs several times in Makrizi, e. g., I. i. 143; I. ii. 66; and II. i. 24. Quatremère at the place first quoted observes that the harākāh was not a fire ship in our sense, but a vessel with a high deck from which fire could be thrown; but that it could also be used as a transport vessel, and was so used on sea and land.

Since writing this we observe that Dozy is inclined to derive carraca, (which is old in Spanish he says) from harākiv, the plural of kurkūr or kurkūra (see Caracoa). And kurkūra itself he thinks may have come from caricare, which already occurs in St. Jerome. So that Mr. Skeat's origin is possibly correct.

Carraway, s. This word for the seed of Carum carui, L., is (probably through Sp. alcaravea) from Arabic karāwiyā. It is curious that the English form is thus closer to the Arabic than either the Spanish, or the French and Italian carvi, which last has passed into Scotch as carvy. But the Arabic itself is a corruption of Lat. careum, or Gr. károv (Dozy).

Cartmeel, s. This is, at least in the Punjab, the ordinary form that 'mail-cart' takes among the natives. Such inversions are not uncommon. Thus Sir David Ochterlony was always called by the Sepoys Loni-okhtar. In our memory an officer named Holroyd was always called by the Sepoys Roydāl.

Cartooce, s. A cartridge. Kārtūs, Sepoy Hind.

Cash, s. A name applied by Europeans to sundry coins of low value in various parts of the Indies. The word in its original form is of extreme antiquity, "Sansk. karsha ... a weight of silver or gold equal to  $\frac{1}{100}$  of a Tulā" (Williams, Skt. Dict.; and see also a Note on the karsha, or rather kārshāpāṇa, as a copper coin of great antiquity, in E. Thomas's Pathān Kings of Delhi, 361, 362). From the Tamil form kāsu, or perhaps from some Konkani form which we have not traced, the Portuguese seem to have made caixa, whence the English cash. In Singalese also kāsi is used for 'coin' in general.

The English term was appropriated in the monetary system which prevailed in S. India up to 1818; thus there was a copper coin for use in Madras struck in England in 1803, which bears on the reverse, "XX Cash."* Under this system 80 cash = 1 fanam, 42 fanams = 1 star pagoda.

But from an early date the Portuguese had applied caixa to the small money of foreign systems, such as those of the Malay Islands, and especially to that of the Chinese. In China the word cash is used, by Europeans and their hangers-on, as the synonym of the Chinese le and tsien, which are those coins made of an alloy of copper and lead with a square hole in the middle, which in former days ran 1000 to the liang or tael (q.v.), and which are strung in certain numbers on cords. Rouleaux of coin thus strung are represented on the surviving bank-notes of the Ming Dynasty (A.D. 1368 onwards), and probably were also on the notes of their Mongol predecessors.

The existence of the distinct English word cash may probably have affected the form of the corruption before us. This word had a European origin from It. cassa, French caisse, 'the money-chest'; this word in book-keeping having given name to the heading of account under which actual disbursements of coin were entered (see Wedgwood, s.v.). In Minsheu (2nd ed. 1627) the present sense of the word is not attained. He only gives "a tradesman's Cash, or Counter to keepe money in."

1510. "They have also another coin called cas, 16 of which go to a tare of silver."—Varthema, 130.

"In this country (Calicut) a great number of apes are produced, one of which is worth 4 cas, and one cas is worth a quattrino."—Ibid. 172.

(Why a monkey should be worth 4 cas is obscure).

1598. "You must understand that in Sunda there is also no other kind of money than certaine copper mynt called Caixa, of the bignes of a Hollādes doite, but not half so thicke, in the middle whereof is a hole to hang it on a string, for that commonlie they put two hundredth or a thousand vpon one string."—Linschoten, 34.

1600. "Those (coins) of Lead are called caxas, whereof 1600 make one mas."—John Davis, in Purchas, i. 117.

1711. "Doodos and Cash are Copper Coins, eight of the former make one Fanham, and ten of the latter one Doodo."—Lockyer, 8.

1718. "Cass (a very small coin, eighty whereof make one Fano)."—Propagation of the Gospel in the East, ii. 52.

1727. "At Atcheen they have a small Coin of leaden Money called Cash, from 12 to 1600 of them goes to one Mace, or Massic."—A. Ham. ii. 109.

c. 1750-60. "At Madras and other parts of the coast of Coromandel, 80 casches make a fanam, or 3d. sterling; and 36 fanams a silver pagoda, or 7s. 8d. sterling."—Grose, i. 282.

1790. "So far am I from giving credit to the late Government (of Madras) for economy, in not making the necessary preparations for war, according to the positive orders of the Supreme Government, after having received the most gross insult that could be offered to any nation! I think it very possible that every Cash of that ill-judged saving may cost the Company a crore of rupees."—Letter of Lord Cornwallis to E. J. Holland, Esq., see the Madras Courier, 22nd Sept. 1791.

1813. At Madras, according to Milburn, the coinage ran:

"10 Cash = 1 doodee; 2 doodees = 1 pice; 8 doodees = 1 single fanam," &c.

The following shows a singular corruption, probably of the Chinese tsien, and illustrates how the striving after meaning shapes such corruptions:—

1876. "All money transactions (at Manwyne on the Burman-Chinese frontier) are effected in the copper coin of China called "change," of which about 400 or 500 go to the rupee. These coins are generally strung on cord," &c.—Report on the Country through which the Force passed to meet the Governor, by W. J. Charlton, M.D.

An intermediate step in this transformation is found in Cocks's Japan Journal, passim, e.g. ii. 89.

"But that which I took most note of was of the liberalitee and devotion of these heathen people, who thronged into the Pagod in multitudes one after another to cast money into a little chapel before the idalles, most parte . . . being gins or brass money, whereof 100 of them may vallee som 10d. str., and are about the bignes of a 3d. English money."

Cashew, s. The tree, fruit, or nut of the Anacardium occidentale, an American tree which must have been introduced early into India by the Portuguese, for it was widely diffused as an apparently wild tree long before the end of the 17th century, and it is described as an Indian tree by Acosta, who wrote in 1578. Crawford also speaks of it as abundant, and in full bearing, in the jungly islets of Hastings Archipelago, off the coast of Camboja (Emb. to Siam, &c., i. 103).

The name appears to be S. American, acajou, of which an Indian form, kājū, has been made.

The so-called fruit is the fleshy top of the peduncle which bears the nut. The oil in the shell of the nut is acrid to an extraordinary degree, whilst the kernels, which are roasted and eaten, are quite bland. The tree yields a gum imported under the name of Cadju gum.

1578. "This tree gives a fruit called commonly Caju; which being a good stomachic, and of good flavour, is much esteemed by all who know it. . . . This fruit does not grow everywhere, but is found in gardens at the city of Santa Cruz in the Kingdom of Cochinchina."—C. Acosta, Tractado, 324 segg.

1598. "Cajus groweth on trees like apple-trees, and are of the bignes of a Pearre."—Linschoten, p. 94.

1658. In Piso, De Indiac utriusque Re Naturali et Medica, Amst. we have a good cut of the tree as one of Brasil, called Acaibaa "et fructus ejus Acaju."

Cashmere, n.p. The famous valley province of the Western Himalaya, H. and P. Kashmīr, from Skt. Kāsmīra, and sometimes Kāsmīra, alleged by Burnouf to be a contraction of Kāsyapamīra. Whether or not it be the Kaspatyirus or Kaspapyrus of Herodotus, we believe it undoubtedly to be the Kaspeiria (kingdom) of Ptolemy.

Several of the old Arabian geographers write the name with the guttural K, but this is not so used in modern times.

c. 630. "The Kingdom of Kia-shi-mi-lo (Kāsmīra) has about 7000 li of circuit. On all sides its frontiers are surrounded by mountains; these are of prodigious height; and although there are paths affording access to it, these are extremely narrow."—Hwen T'sang (Pél. Boudh.) ii. 167.

c. 940. "Kashmīr . . . is a mountainous country, forming a large kingdom, containing not less than 60,000 or 70,000 towns or villages. It is inaccessible except on one side, and can only be entered by one gate."—Mas'ūdi, i. 373.

Casis, Caxis, Caciz, &c., s. This Spanish and Portuguese word, though Dozy gives it only as prêtre chrétien, is frequently employed by old travellers, and writers on Eastern subjects, to denote Mahommedan divines (mullas and the like). It may be suspected to have arisen from a confusion of two Arabic terms—kādī (see Cazee) and kashīsh or qasīs, 'a Christian Presbyter' (from a Syriac root signifying sennit). Indeed we sometimes find the precise word kashīsh (Caxia) used by Christian writers as if it were the special title of a Mahommedan theologian, instead of being, as it really is, the special and technical title of a Christian priest (a fact which gives Mount Athos its common Turkish name of Kashīsh Dagh). In the first of the following quotations the word appears to be applied by the Mussulman historian to pagan priests, and the word for churches to pagan temples. In the others, except that from Major Millingen, it is applied by Christian writers to Mahommedan divines, which is indeed its recognised signification in Spanish and Portuguese. In Jarrie's Thesaurus (Jesuit Missions, 1606) the word Cacizius is constantly used in this sense.

c. 1310. "There are 700 churches (kalisia) resembling fortresses, and every one of them overflowing with presbyters (kashīshān) without faith, and monks without religion."—Description of the Chinese City of Khanzai (Hangchau) in Wasāf's History (see also Marco Polo, ii. 196).

1404. "The town was inhabited by Moorish hermits called Caxixes; and many people came to them on pilgrimage, and they healed many diseases."—Markham's Clavijo, 79.

1514. "And so, from one to another, the message passed through four or five hands, till it came to a Gaziz, whom we should call a bishop or prelate, who stood at the King's feet. . . ."—Letter of Giov. de Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. Append., p. 56.

1538. "Just as the Cryer was offering to deliver me unto whomsoever would buy me, in comes that very Cacis Moulana, whom they held for a Saint, with 10 or 11 other Cacis his Inferiors, all Priests like himself

1552. Caciz in the same sense used in Barros, II. ii. 1.

1561. "The King sent off the Moor, and with him his Casis, an old man of much authority, who was the principal priest of his Mosque."—Correa, by Ld. Stanley, 113.

1567. ". . . The Holy Synod declares it necessary to remove from the territories of His Highness all the infidels whose office it is to maintain their false religion, such as are the cacizes of the Moors, and the preachers of the Gentoos, jogues, sorcerers (feiticeiros), jousis, grous (i.e. joshis or astrologers, and gūrās), and whatsoever others make a business of religion among the infidels, and so also the bramans and paibus."*—Decree 6 of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Arch. Port. Or. fasc. 4.

1582. "And for pledge of the same, he would give him his sonne, and one of his chief chaplaines, the which they call Cacis."—Castañeda, by N. L.

1603. "And now those initiated priests of theirs called Cashishes (Casciscis) were endeavouring to lay violent hands upon his property."—Benedict Goës, in Cathay, &c., ii. 568.

1648. "Here is to be seen an admirably wrought tomb in which a certain Casis lies buried, who was the Pedagogue or Tutor of a King of Guzuratte."—Van Twist, 15.

1672. "They call the common priests Casis, or by another name, Scherijt, who like their bishops are in no way distinguished in dress from simple laymen, except by a bigger turban . . . and a longer mantle. . . ."—P. Vincenzo Maria, 55.

1688. "While they were thus disputing, a Caciz, or doctor of the law, joined company with them."—Dryden, L. of Xavier, Works, ed. 1821, xvi. 68.

1870. "A hierarchical body of priests, known to the people (Nestorians) under the names of Kieshishes and Abunas, is at the head of the tribes and villages, entrusted with both spiritual and temporal powers."—Millingen, Wild Life among the Koords, 270.

Cassanar, Cattanar, s. A priest of the Syrian Church of Malabar; Malayāl. Kattanār, meaning originally 'a chief,' and formed eventually from the Sansk. Kartṛi.

1606. "The Christians of St. Thomas call their priests Caçanares."—Gouvea, f. 28 b.

This author gives Catatariā and Caçaneira as feminine forms, 'a Cassanar's wife.' The former is Malayāl. Kattatti, the latter a Portuguese formation.

1612. "A few years ago there arose a dispute between a Brahman and a certain Cassanar on a matter of jurisdiction."—P. Vincenzo Maria, 152.

Cassay, n.p. A name often given in former days to the people of Munnipore (Mānipur), on the eastern frontier of Bengal. It is the Burmese name of this people, Kasé, or as the Burmese pronounce it, Kathé. It must not be confused with Cathay (q. v.) with which it has nothing to do.

1759. In Dalrymple's Oriental Repertory we find Cassay (i. 116).

1795. "All the troopers in the King's service are natives of Cassay, who are much better horsemen than the Burmans."—Symes, p. 318.

Cassowary, s. The name of this great bird, of which the first species known (Casuarus galeatus) is found only in Ceram Island (Moluccas), is Malay Kasavāri or Kasuāri. Other species have been observed in N. Guinea, N. Britain, and Nth. Australia.

1659. "This aforesaid bird Cossebāres also will swallow iron and lead, as we once learned by experience. For when our Conestabel once had been casting bullets on the Admiral's Bastion, and then went to dinner, there came one of these Cossebāres on the bastion, and swallowed 50 of the bullets. And . . . next day I found that the bird after keeping them a while in his maw had regularly cast up again all the 50."—J. J. Saar, 86.

1705. "The Cassawaris is about the bigness of a large Virginia Turkey. His head is the same as a Turkey's; and he has a long stiff hairy Beard upon his Breast before, like a Turkey. . . ."—Funnel, in Dampier, iv. 266.

Caste, s. "The artificial divisions of society in India, first made known to us by the Portuguese, and described by them under their term caste, signifying 'breed, race, kind,' which has been retained in English under the supposition that it was the native name" (Wedgwood, s. v.).

Mr. Elphinstone prefers to write "Cast."

We do not find that the early Portuguese writer Barbosa (1516) applies the word casta to the divisions of Hindu society. He calls these divisions in Narsinga and Malabar so many leis de gentios, i. e., 'laws' of the heathen, in the sense of sectarian rules of life. But he uses the word casta in a less technical way, which shows us how it should easily have passed into the technical sense. Thus, speaking of the King of Calicut: "This King keeps 1000 women, to whom he gives regular maintenance, and they always go to his court to act as the sweepers of his palaces . . . these are ladies, and of good family" (estas saom fidalgas e de boa casta. In Coll. of Lisbon Academy, ii. 316). So also Castanheda: "There fled a knight who was called Fernão Lopez, homem de boa casta." (iii. 239). In the quotations from Barros, Correa, and Garcia De Ota, we have the word in what we may call the technical sense.

c. 1444. "Whence I conclude that this race (casta) of men is the most agile and dexterous that there is in the world."—Cadamosto, Navegação, i. 14.

1552. "The Admiral . . . received these Naires with honour and joy, showing great contentment with the King for sending his message by such persons, saying that he expected this coming of theirs to prosper, as there did not enter into the business any man of the caste of the Moors."—Barros, i. vi. 5.

1561. "Some of them asserted that they were of the caste (casta) of the Christians."—Correa, Lendas, i. 2, 685.

1563. "One thing is to be noted . . . that no one changes from his father's trade, and all those of the caste (casta) of shoemakers are the same."—Garcia, f. 213b.

1567. "In some parts of this Province (of Goa) the Gentoos divide themselves into distinct races or castes (castas) of greater or less dignity, holding the Christians as of lower degree, and keep these so superstitiously that no one of a higher caste can eat or drink with those of a lower. . . ."—Decree 2nd of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 4.

"Dous modos ha de gente ; porque a nobre Nairos chamados são, e a menos dina Poleas tem por nome, a quem obriga A lei não misturar a casta antiga."
Camões, vii. 37.

By Burton :
"Two modes of men are known ; the nobles know the name of Nayrs, who call the lower Caste

Poleas, whom their haughty laws contain from intermingling with the higher strain."

1612. "As regards the castes (castas) the greatest impediment to the conversion of the Gentoos is the superstition which they maintain in relation to their castes, and which prevents them from touching, communicating, or mingling with others, whether superior or inferior; these of one observance with those of another."—Couto, Dec. V. vi. 4.

1613. "The Banians kill nothing; there are thirtie and odd severall Casts of these that differ something in Religion, and may not eat with each other."—N. Whittington in Purchas, i. 485.

See also Pilgrimage, pp. 997, 1003.

1630. "The common Bramane hath eighty two Casts or Tribes, assuming to themselves the name of that Tribe. . . ."—Lord's Display of the Banians, p. 72.

1673. "The mixture of Casts or Tribes of all India are distinguished by the different modes of binding their Turbats."—Fryer, 115.

c. 1760. "The distinction of the Gentoo into their tribes or Casts, forms another considerable object of their religion."—Grose, i. 201.

1763. "The Casts or tribes into which the Indians are divided, are reckoned by travellers to be eighty-four."—Orme (ed. 1803), i. 4.

1878. "There are thousands and thousands of those so-called Castes; no man knows their number, no man can know it; for the conception is a very flexible one, and moreover new castes continually spring up and pass away."—F. Jager, Ost-Indische Handwerk und Gewerbe, 13.

Castes are, according to Indian social views, either high or low.

1876. "Low-caste Hindoos in their own land, are to all ordinary apprehension, slovenly, dirty, ungraceful, generally unacceptable in person and surroundings. . . . Yet offensive as is the low-caste Indian, were I estate-owner, or colonial governor, I had rather see the lowest Pariahs of the low, than a single trim, smooth-faced, smooth-wayed, clever high-caste Hindoo, on my lands or in my colony."—W. G. Palgrave, in Fortnightly Rev., cx. 226 (ed. 1857).

In the Madras Presidency castes are also 'Right-hand' and 'Left-hand.' This distinction represents the agricultural classes on the one side, and the artisans, &c., on the other, as was pointed out by F. W. Ellis. In the old days of Fort St. George faction-fights between the two were very common, and the terms right-hand and left-hand castes occur early in the old records of that settlement, and frequently in Mr. Talboys Wheeler's extracts from them. These terms are literal translations of the Tamil valan-kai, idan-kai. They are mentioned by Couto.

1612. "From these four castes are derived 196; and those again are divided into two parties, which they call Valanga and Elange, which is as much as to say 'the right hand' and 'the left hand. . .'"—Couto, u. s.

The word is current in French.

1842. "Il est clair que les castes n'ont jamais pu exister solidement sans une véritable conservation religieuse."—Comte, Cours de Phil. Positive, vi. 505.

1877. "Nous avons aboli les castes et les privilèges, nous avons inscrit partout le principe de l'égalité devant la loi, nous avons donné le suffrage à tous, mais voilà qu'on réclame maintenant l'égalité des conditions."—E. de Laveleye, De la Propriété, p. iv.

Caste is also applied to breeds of animals, as 'a high-caste Arab.' In such cases the usage may possibly have come directly from the Portuguese alta casta, casta baixa, in the sense of breed or strain.

Castees, s. Obsolete. The Indo-Portuguese formed from casta the word castiço, which they used to denote children born in India of Portuguese parents; much as creole was used in the W. Indies.

1599. "Liberi vero nati in Indiâ, utroque parente Lusitano, castisos vocantur, in omnibus fere Lusitanis similes, colore tamen modicum differunt, ut qui ad gylvum non nihil deflectant. Ex castisis deinde nati magis magisque gilvi fiunt, a parentibus et mesticis magis defectentes; porro et mesticis nati per omnia indigenis respondent, ita ut in tertiâ generatione Lusitani reliquis Indis sunt similissimi."—De Bry, ii. 76 (Linschoten).

1699. "Castees wives at Fort St. George."—Census of English on the Coast, in Wheeler, i. 356.

1726. ". . . or the offspring of the same by native women, to wit Mistices and Castices, or blacks . . . and Moors."—Valentijn, v. 3.

Catamarán, s. Also Cutmurram, Cutmurál. Tam. Kattu, 'binding,' maran, 'wood.' A raft formed of three or four logs of wood lashed together. The Anglo-Indian accentuation of the last syllable is not correct.

1583. "Seven round timbers lashed together for each of the said boats, and of the said seven timbers five form the bottom; one in the middle longer than the rest makes a cutwater, and another makes a poop which is under water, and on which a man sits. . .

These boats are called Gatameroni.”—Balbi, Viaggio, f. 82.

1673. “Coasting along some Cattamarans (Logs lashed to that advantage that they waft off all their Goods, only having a Sail in the midst and Paddles to guide them) made after us. . . .”—Fryer, 24.

1698. “Some time after the Cattamaran brought a letter. . . .”—In Wheeler, i. 334.

1700. “Un pecheur assis sur un catimaron, c'est-à-dire sur quelques grosses pièces de bois liées ensemble en manière de radeau.”—Lett. Edif. x. 58.

c. 1780. “The wind was high, and the ship had but two anchors, and in the next forenoon parted from that by which she was riding, before that one which was coming from the shore on a Catamaran could reach her.”—Orme, iii. 300.

1810. Williamson (V. M. i. 65) applies the term to the rafts of the Brazilian fishermen.

1836. “None can compare to the Cattamarans and the wonderful people that manage them . . . each cattamaran has one, two, or three men . . . they sit crouched upon their heels, throwing their paddles about very dexterously, but very unlike rowing.”—Letters from Madras, 34.

1860. “The Cattamaran is common to Ceylon and Coromandel.”—Tennent, Ceylon, i. 442.

Catechu, also Cutch and Caut, s. An astringent extract from the wood of several species of Acacia (Acacia catechu, Willd., the khair, and Acacia suma, Kurz, Ac. sundra, D. C., and probably more). The extract is called in Hind. kath, but the two first commercial names which we have given are doubtless taken from the southern forms of the word, e. g., Canarese Kāchu, Tam. Kashu, Malay Kāchu. De Orta, whose judgments are always worthy of respect, considered it to be the lycium of the ancients, and always applies that name to it; but Dr. Royle has shown that lycium was an extract from certain species of berberis, known in the bazars as rasōt. Cutch is first mentioned by Barbosa, among the drugs imported into Malacca. But it remained unknown in Europe till brought from Japan about the middle of the 17th century. In the 4th ed. of Schröder's Pharmacop. Medico-chymica, Lyons, 1654, it is briefly described as Catechu or Terra Japonica, “genus terrae exoticae” (Hambury and Flückiger, 214). This misnomer has long survived.

1516. “. . . drugs from Cambay; amongst which there is a drug which we do not possess, and which they call puchō (see Putch-

1554. “The bahar of Cate, which here (at Ormuz) they call cacho, is the same as that of rice.”—A. Nunes, 22.

1563. “Colloquio .XXXI. Concerning the wood vulgarly called Cate; and containing profitable matter on that subject.”—Garcia, f. 125.

1578. “The Indians use this Cate mixt with Areca, and with Betel, and by itself without other mixture.”—Acosta, Tract. 150.

1585. Sasseti mentions catu as derived from the Khadira tree, i.e. in modern Hindi the Khaur (Skt. khadir).

1617. “And there was rec. out of the Adviz, viz. . . 7 hds. drugs cacha; 5 hampers pochok” (see Putchook).—Cocks's Diary, i. 294.

1759. “Hortal and Cotch, Earth-oil, and Wood-oil.”—List of Burma Products in Oriental Repert. i. 109.

c. 1760. “To these three articles (betel, areca, and chunam) is often added for luxury what they call cachoon, a Japan-earth, which from perfumes and other mixtures, chiefly manufactured at Goa, receives such improvement as to be sold to advantage when re-imported to Japan. . . . Another addition too they use of what they call Catchoo, being a blackish granulated perfumed composition. . . .”—Grose, i. 238.

1813. “. . . The peasants manufacture catechu, or terra Japonica, from the Keiri tree (Mimosa catechu) which grows wild on the hills of Kankana, but in no other part of the Indian Peninsula.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 303.

Cathay, n.p. China; originally Northern China. The origin of the name is given in the quotation below from the Introduction to Marco Polo.

In the 16th century, and even later, from a misunderstanding of the mediaeval travellers, Cathay was supposed to be a country north of China, and is so represented on many maps. Its identity with China was fully recognised by P. Martin Martini in his Atlas Sinensis; also by Valentijn, iv. China, 2.

1247. “Kitai autem . . . homines sunt pagani, qui habent literam specialem . . . homines benigni et humani satis esse videntur. Barbam non habent, et in dispositione faciei satis concordant cum Mongalis, non tamen sunt in facie ita lati . . . meliores artifices non inveniuntur in toto mundo . . . terra eorum est opulenta valde.”—J. de Plano Carpini, Hist. Mongolorum, 633-4.

1253. “Ultra est magna Cataya, qui antiquitus, ut credo, dicebantur Seres . . . Isti Catai sunt parvi homines, loquendo multum aspirantes per naves et . . . habent

c. 1380. "Cathay is a very great Empire, which extendeth over more than c. days' journey, and it hath only one lord. . . ."—Friar Jordanus, p. 54.

1871. "For about three centuries the Northern Provinces of China had been detached from native rule, and subject to foreign dynasties; first to the Khitan. . . whose rule subsisted for 200 years, and originated the name of Khitai, Khata, or Cathay, by which for nearly 1,000 years China has been known to the nations of Inner Asia, and to those whose acquaintance with it was got by that channel."—Marco Polo, Introd. ch. ii.

Cat's-eye, s. A stone of value found in Ceylon. It is described by Dana as a form of chalcedony of a greenish grey, with glowing internal reflexions, whence the Portuguese called it Olho de gato, which our word translates. It appears from the quotation below from Dr. Royle that the Beli oculus of Pliny has been identified with the cat's eye, which may well be the case, though the odd circumstance noticed by Royle may be only a curious coincidence.

c. A.D. 70. "The stone called Belus eye is white, and hath within it a black apple, the mids whereof a man shall see to glitter like gold. . ."—Holland's Plinie, ii. 625.

1516. "There are found likewise other stones, such as Olho de gato, Chrysolites, and amethysts, of which I do not treat because they are of little value."—Barbosa, in Lisbon Acad. ii. 390.

1599. "Lapis insuper alius ibi vulgaris est, quem Lusitani olios de gatto, id est oculum felineum vocant, propterea quod cum eo et colore et facie conveniat. Nihil autem aliud quam achates est."—De Bry, iv. 84 (after Linschoten).

1837. "Beli oculus, mentioned by Pliny, xxxvii. c. 55, is considered by Hardouin to be equivalent to œil de chat—named in India billi ke ank."—Royle's Hindu Medicine, p. 103.

a. A weight used in China, and by the Chinese introduced into the Archipelago. The word kāti or kati is Malayo-Javanese. It is equal to 16 taels, i. e., 1½ lb. avoird. or 625 grammes.

1598. "Everie Catte is as much as 20 Portugall ounces."—Linschoten, 84.

1604. "Their pound they call a Cate, which is one and twentie of our ounces."—Capt. John Davis, in Purchas, i. 123.

1609. "Offering to enact among them the penaltie of death to such as would sel one cattie of spice to the Hollanders."—Keeling, in ditto, i. 199.

1610. "And (I prayse God) I have aboard one hundred thirthe nine Tunnes, six Cathayes, one quarterne two pound of nutmegs, and sixe hundred two and twenty suckettes of Mace, which maketh thirthe sixe Tunnes, fiftene Cathayes one quarterne, one and twentie pound."—David Middleton, in ditto, i. 247.

In this passage however Cathayes seems to be a strange blunder of Purchas or his copyist for Cwt. Suckette is probably Malay sukat, "a measure, a stated quantity."

b. The word catty occurs in another sense in the following passage. A note says that "Catty or more literally Kuttoo is a Tamil word signifying batta" (q. v.). But may it not rather be a clerical error for batty?

1659. "If we should detain them longer we are to give them catty."—Letter in Wheeler, i. 162.

Catur, s. A light rowing vessel used on the coast of Malabar in the early days of the Portuguese. We have not been able to trace the name to any Indian source. Is it not probably the origin of our 'cutter'? Since these words were written we see that Capt. Burton in his Commentary on Camoens, vol. iv. p. 391, says: "Catur is the Arab. Katreh, a small craft, our 'cutter.'"

We cannot say when cutter was introduced in marine use. We cannot find it in Dampier, nor in Robinson Crusoe; the first instance we have found is that quoted below from 'Anson's Voyage.'

Bluteau gives catur as an Indian term indicating a small war-vessel, which in a calm can be aided by oars.

Jal (Archéologie Navale, ii. 259) quotes Witsen as saying that the Caturi or Almadias were Calicut vessels, having a length of 12 to 13 paces (60 to 65 feet), sharp at both ends, and curving back, using both sails and oars. But there was a larger kind, 80 feet long, with only 7 or 8 feet beam.

1510. "There is also another kind of vessel . . . These are all made of one piece . . . sharp at both ends. These ships are called Chaturi, and go either with a sail or oars more swiftly than any galley, fusta, or brigantine."—Varthema, 154.

1544. "... navigium majus quod vocant catorem."—Seti. Franc. Xav. Epistolae, 121.

1549. "Naves item duas (quas Indi catures vocant) summā celeritate armari jussit, vt oram maritimam legentes, hostes comēatu prohiberent."—Goës, de Bello Cambaico, 1331.

1552. "And this winter the Governor sent to have built in Cochin thirty Catures, which are vessels with oars, but smaller than brigantines."—Castanheda, iii. 271.

1588. "Cambaicam oram Jacobus Lacteus duobus caturibus tueri jussus. . . ."—Maffei, lib. xiii. ed. 1752, p. 283.

1601. "Biremes, seu Cathuris quam plurimae conductur in Lassaoon, Javæ civitate. . . ."—De Bry, iii. 109 (where there is a plate, iii. No. xxxvii.).

1688. "No man was so bold to contradict the man of God; and they all went to the Arsenal. There they found a good and sufficient bark of those they call Catur, besides seven old foysts."—Dryden, Life of Xavier, in Works, 1821, xvi. 200.

1742. "... to prevent even the possibility of the galleons escaping us in the night, the two Cutters belonging to the Centurion and the Gloucester were both manned and sent in shore. . . ."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. 1756, p. 251.

Cutter also occurs pp. 111, 129, 150, and other places.

Cauvery, n.p. The great river of S. India. Properly Tam. Kāviri, and Sanskritized Kāvērī. The earliest mention is that of Ptolemy, who writes the name (after the Skt. form) Χάβριος (sc. ποταμός). The Kāmapa of the Periplus (c. A.D. 80–90) probably, however, represents the same name, the Χαβρις ἐμπορίον of Ptolemy. The meaning of the name has been much debated, and several plausible but unsatisfactory explanations have been given. Thus, the Skt. form Kāvērī has been explained from that language by kāvēra, 'saffron.' A river in the Tamil country is, however, hardly likely to have a non-mythological Sanskrit name. The Cauvery in flood, like other S. Indian rivers, assumes a reddish hue. And the form Kāvērī has been explained by Bishop Caldwell as possibly from the Dravidian kāvi, 'red ochre,' or kā (Kā-va) 'a grove,' and ēr-u Tel. 'a river,' ēr-i Tam. 'a sheet of water;' thus either 'red river' or 'grove river' (Comp. Grammar, 456).

Kā-viri, however, the form found in inscriptions, affords a more satisfactory Tamil interpretation, viz., Kā-viri, 'grove-extender,' or developer. Any one who has travelled along the river will have noticed the thick groves all along the banks, which form a remarkable feature of this stream.

c. 150 A.D.

"Χαβήρου ποταμοῦ ἐκβολαί

Χαβήρις ἐμπορίον."—Ptolem. lib. vii. 1.

The last was probably represented by Kaveripatan.

c. 545. "Then there is Siedeśba, i.e. Taprobane. . . and then again on the Continent, and further back, is Marallo, which exports conch-shells; Kaber, which exports alabandinum."—Cosmas, Topog. Christ. in Cathoy, &c. clxxviii.

1310–11. "After traversing the passes, they arrived at night on the banks of the river Kānobari, and bivouacked on the sands."—Amir Khūsrū, in Elliot, ii. 90.

The Cauvery seems to be ignored in the older European account and maps.

Cavally, s. This is mentioned as a fish of Ceylon by Ives, 1755 (p. 57). It is no doubt the same that is described in the quotation from Pyrard. This would appear to represent the genus Equula, of which 12 spp. are described by Day (Fishes of India, pp. 237–242), two being named by different zoologists E. caballa. Many of the spp. are extensively sun-dried, and eaten by the poor.

c. 1610. "Ces Moucois pêcheurs prennent entr'autres grande quantité d'une sorte de petit poisson, qui n'est pas plus grande que la main et large comme vn petit breneau. Les Portugais l'appellent Pesche cauallo. Il est le plus commun de toute ceste coste, et c'est de quoy ils font le plus grand trafic; car ils le fendent par la moitié, ils le salent, et le font secher au soleil."—Pyrard de la Val, i. 278; see also 309.

1626. "The Ile inricht us with many good things: Buffols, . . . oysters, Breams, Cavalloes, and store of other fish."—Sir T. Herbert, 28.

'property,' hence 'land,' and so a measure of land used in the Madras Presidency. It varies, of course, but the standard Cawny is considered to be = 24 manai or 'Grounds' (q.v.) of 2,400 sq. f. each, hence = 57,600 sq. f. or Ac. 1.322. This is the only sense in which the word is used in the Madras dialect of the Anglo-Indian tongue. The 'Indian Vocabulary' of 1788 has the word in the form Connys, but with an unintelligible explanation.

1807. "The land measure of the Jaghire is as follows: 24 Adies square=1 Culy; 100 Culies=1 Canay. Out of what is called charity however the Culy is in fact a Bamboo 26 Adies, or 22 feet 8 inches in length . . . the Ady or Malabar foot is therefore 10 $\frac{4}{10}$  inches nearly; and the customary canay contains 51,375 sq. feet, or 1 $\frac{1}{10}$  acres nearly; while the proper canay would only contain 43,778 feet."—F. Buchanan, Mysore, &c. i. 6.

Cawnpore, n.p. The correct name is Kānpur, 'the town of Kānh or Krishna.' The city of the Doab so called, having in 1872 a population of 122,770, has grown up entirely under British rule, at first as the bazar and dependence of the cantonment established here under a treaty made with the Nabob of Oudh in 1766, and afterwards as a great mart of trade.

Cayman, s. This is not used in India. It is an American name for an alligator; from the Carib acayuman (Littré). But it appears formerly to have been in general use among the Dutch in the East.

1530. "The country is extravagantly hot; and the rivers are full of Caimans, which are certain water-lizards (lagarti)."—Nunno de Guzman, in Ramusio, iii. 339.

1598. "In this river (Zaire or Congo) there are living divers kinds of creatures, and in particular, mighty great crocodiles, which the country people there call Caiman."—Pigafetta, in Harleian Coll. of Voyages, ii. 533.

This is an instance of the way in which we so often see a word belonging to a different quarter of the world undoubtingly ascribed to Africa or Asia, as the case may be. In the next quotation we find it ascribed to India.

1672. "The figures so represented in Adam's footstep were . . . 41. The King of the Caimans or Crocodiles."—Baldæus (Germ. ed.) 148.

1692. "Anno 1692 there were 3 newly arrived soldiers . . . near a certain gibbet that stood by the river outside the boom, so sharply pursued by a Kaieman that they were obliged to climb the gibbet for safety whilst the creature standing up on his hind feet reached with his snout to the very top of the gibbet. . ."—Valentijn, iv. 231.

Cayolaque, s. (p.). Kayu= 'wood,' in Malay. Laka is given in Crawford's Malay Dict. as 'name of a red wood used as incense, Myristiciners. In his Descr. Dict. he calls it the "Tanarius major; a tree with a red-coloured wood, a native of Sumatra, used in dyeing and in pharmacy. It is an article of considerable native trade, and is chiefly exported to China," (p. 204).

1510. "There also grows here a very great quantity of lacca for making red colour, and the tree of this is formed like our trees which produce walnuts."—Varthema, p. 238.

c. 1560. "I being in Cantan there was a rich (bed) made wrought with fluorie, and of a sweet wood which they call Cayolaque, and of Sandalum, that was prized at 1500 Crowns."—Gaspar Da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 177.

1585. "Euerie morning and euening they do offer vnto their idolles frankensence, benjamin, wood of aguila, and cayolaque, the which is maruelous sweete. . ."—Mendoza's China, i. 58.

Cazee, &c., s. Arab. qāḍī, 'a judge,' the letter z with which it is spelt being always pronounced in India like a z. The form Cadi, familiar from its use in the old version of the Arabian Nights, comes to us from the Levant. The word with the article, al-qāḍī, becomes in Spanish alcalde;* not alcaide, which is from qāḍī, 'a chief;' nor alquacil, which is from wazīr. So Dozy and Engelmann, no doubt correctly. But in Pinto, cap. 8, we find "ao guazil da justiça q̃ em elles he como corregedor entre nos;" where guazil seems to stand for qāḍī.

* Dr. R. Rost observes to us that the Arabic letter qāḍī is pronounced by the Malays like ll (see also Crawford's Malay Grammar, p. 7). And it is curious to find a transfer of the same letter into Spanish as ll. In Malay qāḍī becomes qāllī.

Devant luy, on luy amena
Engrilloné poulces et detz
Comme ung larron; car il fut des Escumeurs que voyons courir
Si fut mys devant le cadès,
Pour estre jugé à mourir."

Gd. Testament de Fr. Villon.

1648. "The government of the city (Ahmedabad) and surrounding villages rests with the Governor Coutewael, and the Judge (whom they call Casgy)."—Van Twist, 15.

1673. "Their Law-Disputes, they are soon ended; the Governor hearing; and the Cadi or Judge determining every Morning."—Fryer, 32.

"The Cazy or Judge . . . marries them."—Ibid. 94.

1683. ". . . more than 3000 poor men gathered together, complaining with full mouths of his exaction and injustice towards them: some demanding Rupees 10, others Rupees 20 per man, which Bulchund very generously paid them in the Cazee's presence. . ."—Hedges, Nov. 5.

1689. "A Cogee . . . who is a Person skilled in their Law."—Orington, 206.

Here there is perhaps confusion with KhaJa.

1727. "When the Man sees his Spouse, and likes her, they agree on the Price and Term of Weeks, Months, or Years, and then appear before the Cadjee or Judge."—A. Ham. i. 52.

1763. "The Cadi holds court in which are tried all disputes of property."—Orme, i. 26 (ed. 1803).

1824. "Have you not learned this common saying—'Every one's teeth are blunted by acids except the cadi's, which are by sweets.'"—Haji's Baba, ed. 1835, p. 316.

1880. ". . . whereas by the usage of the Muhammadan community in some parts of British India the presence of Kazis appointed by the Government is required at the celebration of marriages. . ."—Bill introduced into the Council of Gov. Gen., 30th January, 1880.

Ceded Districts, n.p. A name applied familiarly at the beginning of this century to the territory south of the Tungabhadra river, which was ceded to the Company by the Nizam in 1800, after the defeat and death of Tippoo Sultan. This territory embraced the present districts of Bellary, Cuddapah, and Karnul, with the Palnad, which is now a subdivision of the Kistna District. The name perhaps became best known in England from Gleig's Life of Sir Thomas Munro, that great man having administered these provinces for 7 years.

1873. "We regret to announce the death of Lieut.-General Sir Hector Jones, G. C. B., at the advanced age of 86. The gallant officer now deceased belonged to the Madras Establishment of the E. I. Co.'s forces, and bore a distinguished part in many of the great achievements of that army, including the celebrated march into the Ceded Districts under the Collector of Canara, and the campaign against the Zemindar of Madura."—The True Reformer, p. 7 ("wrot serkes-tick").

Celèbes, n.p. According to Crawford this name is unknown to the natives, not only of the great island itself but of the Archipelago generally, and must have arisen from some Portuguese misunderstanding or corruption. There appears to be no general name for the island in the Malay language, unless Tanah Bugis, 'the Land of the Bugis People.' It seems sometimes to have been called the Isle of Macassar. In form Celèbes is apparently a Portuguese plural, and several of their early writers speak of Celebes as a group of islands. Crawford makes a suggestion, but not very confidently, that Pulo sālabbih, 'the islands over and above,' might have been vaguely spoken of by the Malays, and understood by the Portuguese as a name.

1516. "Having passed these islands of Maluco . . . at a distance of 130 leagues, there are other islands to the west, from which sometimes there come white people, naked from the waist upwards. . . These people eat human flesh, and if the King of Maluco has any person to execute, they beg for him to eat him, just as one would ask for a pig, and the islands from which they come are called Celebe."—Barboza, 202-3.

c. 1544. "In this street (of Pegu) there were six and thirty thousand strangers of two and forty different Nations, namely. . . Papuaas, Selebres, Mindanaos . . . and many others whose names I know not."—F. Al. Pinto, in Cogan's tr. p. 200.

1552. "In the previous November (1529) arrived at Ternate D. Jorge de Castro who came from Malacca by way of Borneo in a junk . . . and going astray passed along the Isle of Macassar. . ."—Barros, Dec. IV. i. 18.

"The first thing that the Samarao did in this was to make Tristão de Taide believe that in the Isles of the Celebes, and of the Macacares and in that of Mindinão, there was much gold."—Ibid. vi. 25.

1579. "The 16 Day (December) wee had sight of the Iland Celebes or Silèbis."—Drake, World Encompassed (Hak. Soc.), p. 150.

1610. "At the same time there were at Ternate certain ambassadors from the Isles of the Macacás (which are to the west of those of Maluco—the nearest of them about 60 leagues). . . These islands are many, and joined together, and appear in the sea-charts thrown into one very big island, extending, as the sailors say, North and South, and having near 100 leagues of compass. And this island imitates the shape of a big locust, the head of which (stretching to the south to  $5\frac{1}{2}$  degrees) is formed by the Cellebes (são os Celleses), which have a King over them. . . These islands are ruled by many Kings, differing in language, in laws, and customs. . .”—Couto, Dec. V. vii. 2.

1662. "There is a kind of worm which the Portuguese call un centopê, and the Dutch also 'thousand-legs' (tausend-bein)."—T. Saal, 68.

Ceram, n.p. A large island in the Molucca Sea, the Serang of the Malays.

Cerame, Çarame, &c., s. The Malayâlim Srāmbi, a gatehouse with a room over the gate, and generally fortified. This is a feature of temples, &c., as well as of private houses, in Malabar. The word is also applied to a chamber raised on four posts.

1551. ". . . where stood the çarame of the King, which is his temple. . ."—Castanheda, iii. 2.

1552. "Pedralvares . . . was carried ashore on men's shoulders in an andor (q.v.) till he was set among the Gentoo Princes whom the Çamorin had sent to receive him at the beach, whilst the said Çamorin himself was standing within sight in the cerame awaiting his arrival."—Barros, I. v. 5.

1557. The word occurs also in D'Albuquerque's Commentaries (Hak. Soc. Tr. i. 115), but it is there erroneously rendered "jetty."

1566. "Antes de entrar no Cerame vierão receber alguns senhores dos que ficarão com el Rei."—Dam. de Goes, Chron. 76 (ch. lviii.).

Ceylon, n.p. This name, as applied to the great island which hangs from India like a dependent jewel, becomes usual about the 13th century. But it can be traced much earlier. For it appears undoubtedly to be formed from Sinhala or Sihala, 'lions' abode,' the name adopted in the island itself at an early date. This, with the addition of 'Island,' Sihala-dvīpa, comes down to us in Cosmas as Σιηλεδιβα. There was a Pali form Sihalan, which, at an early date must have been colloquially shortened to Silan, as appears from the old Tamil name Ilam (the Tamil having no proper sibilant), and probably from this was formed the Sarandīp and Sarandīb which was long the name in use by mariners of the Persian Gulf.

It has been suggested by Mr. Vander Tuuk that the name Sailan or Silan was really of Javanese origin, as sela (from Skt. śilā, a rock, a stone) in Javanese (and in Malay) means 'a precious stone,' hence Pulo Selan would be 'Isle of Gems.' The island was really called anciently Ratnadvīpa, 'Isle of Gems,' and is termed by an Arab historian of the 9th century Jazīrat-al-yakūt, 'Isle of Rubies.' So that there is considerable plausibility in Vander Tuuk's suggestion. But the genealogy of the name from Sihala is so legitimate that the utmost that can be conceded is the possibility that the Malay form Selan may have been shaped by the consideration suggested, and may have influenced the general adoption of the form Sailān, through the predominance of Malay navigation in the middle ages.

Chackur. P.—H.—chākar, a servant. The word is never now used in Anglo-Indian households except as a sort of rhyming amplification to Naukar (vide Nokur): "Naukar-chākur," the whole following. But in a past generation there was a distinction made between naukar, the superior servant such as a munshī, a gomāstha, a chobdar, a khānsama, &c., and chākar, a menial servant. Williamson gives a curious list of both classes, showing what a large Calcutta household embraced at the beginning of this century (V. M. i. 185-187).

Chalia, Chalé, n.p. Chālyam or Chālayam; an old port of Malabar, on the south side of the Bepur R., and opposite Bepur. The terminal station of the Madras Railway is in fact where Chālyam was. A plate is given in the Lendas of Correa, which makes this plain. The place is incorrectly alluded to as Kalyān in Imp. Gazetteer, ii. 49; more correctly on next page as Chalium.

Champa, n.p. The name of a kingdom at one time of great power and importance in Indo-China, occupying the extreme S.E. of that region. A limited portion of its soil is still known by that name, but otherwise as the Binh-Thuan province of Cochin China. The race inhabiting this portion, Chams or Tsiams, are traditionally said to have once occupied the whole breadth of that peninsula to the Gulf of Siam, before the arrival of the Khmer or Kambojan people. It is not clear whether the people in question took their name from Champa or Champa from the people; but in any case the form of Champa is Sanskrit, and probably it was adopted from India like Kamboja itself and so many other Indo-Chinese names. The original Champā was a city and kingdom on the Ganges, near the modern Bhāgalpur. And we find the Indo-Chinese Champa in the 7th century called Mahā-champā, as if to distinguish it. It is probable that the Zāsa or Zāsa of Ptolemy represents the name of this ancient kingdom; and it is certainly the Sanf or Chanf of the Arab navigators 600 years later; this form representing Champ as nearly as is possible to the Arabic alphabet.

1298. "... You come to a country called Chamba, a very rich region, having a King of its own. The people are idolaters, and pay a yearly tribute to the Great Kaan. . . there are a very great number of Elephants in this Kingdom, and they have lign-aloës in great abundance."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 5.

c. 1300. "Passing on from this, you come to a continent called Jampa, also subject to the Kaan. . ."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 71.

c. 1328. "There is also a certain part of India called Champa. There, in place of horses, mules, asses, and camels, they make use of elephants for all their work."—Friar Jordanus, 37.

1516. "Having passed this island (Borneo) . . . towards the country of Aniam and China, there is another great island of Gentiles called Champa; which has a King and language of its own, and many elephants. . .

There also grows in it aloes-wood."—Barbosa, 204.

1552. "Concorriam todolos navegantes dos mares Occidentaes da India, e dos Orientaes a ella, que são as regiões di Sião, China, Choampa, Cambôja . . ."—Barros, II. vi. 1.

1608. "... Thence (from Assam) eastward on the side of the northern mountains are the Nangata [i.e. Naga] lands, the Land of Pukhamlyng on the ocean, Balgu [Baigu? i.e. Pegu], the land Rakhang, Hamsavati, and the rest of the realm of Munyang; beyond these Champa, Kamboja, etc. All these are in general named Koki."—Taranatha (Tibetan) Hist. of Buddhism, by Schiefner, p. 262.

The preceding passage is of great interest as showing a fair general knowledge of the Buddhist kingdoms of Indo-China on the part of a Tibetan priest, and also as showing that Indo-China was recognised under a general name, viz., Koki.

1696. "Mr. Bowyear says the Prince of Champa whom he met at the Cochin Chinese Court, was very polite to him, and strenuously exhorted him to introduce the English to the dominions of Champa."—In Dalrymple's Or. Repert. i. 67.

Champana, s. A kind of small vessel. See Sampan.

Chandaul, s. Hind. Chandāl, an outcaste, 'used generally for a man of the lowest and most despised of the mixt tribes' (Williams); 'properly one sprung from a Sudra father and Brahman mother' (Wilson).

712. "You have joined these Chandāls and coveaters, and have become one of them."—Chach-Namah, in Elliot, i. 193.

Chandernagore, n.p. The name of the French settlement on the Hoogly, 24 miles by river above Calcutta, originally occupied in 1673. The name is alleged by Hunter to be properly Chandan(a)-nagara, 'Sandal-wood City,' but the usual form points rather to Chandra-nagara, 'Moon City.'

1727. "He forced the Ostenders to quit their Factory, and seek Protection from the French at Charnagur. . . They have a few private Families dwelling near the Factory, and a pretty little Church to hear Mass in, which is the chief Business of the French in Bengal."—A. Ham. ii. 18.

a large kind of shell (Turbinella rapa) prized by the Hindus, and used by them for offering libations, as a horn to blow at the temples, and for cutting into armlets and other ornaments. It is found especially in the Gulf of Manaar, and the Chank fishery was formerly, like that of the pearl-oysters, a Government monopoly (see Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 556, and the references).

The abnormal chank, with its spiral opening to the right, is of exceptional value, and has been sometimes priced, it is said, at a lakh of rupees!

c. 545. "Then there is Silediba, i.e. Tapropane . . . and then again on the continent, and further back is Marallo, which exports conch-shells (κοχλινος)."—Cosmas, in Cathay, i. clxxviii.

851. "They find on its shores (of Ceylon) the pearl, and the shank, a name by which they designate the great shell which serves for a trumpet, and which is much sought after."—Reinaud, Relations, i. 6.

1563. ". . . And this chanco is a ware for the Bengal trade, and formerly it produced more profit than now. . . And there was formerly a custom in Bengal that no virgin in honour and esteem could be corrupted unless it were by placing bracelets of chanco on her arms: but since the Patans came in this usage has more or less ceased; and so the chanco is rated lower now. . . ."—Garcia, f. 141.

1644. "What they chiefly bring (from Tuticorin) are cloths called cachas*. . . a large quantity of Chanquo; these are large shells which they fish in that sea, and which supply Bengal where the blacks make of them bracelets for the arm; also the biggest and best fowls in all these Eastern parts."—Bocarro, MS. 316.

1672. "Garroude flew in all haste to Brahma, and brought to Kisna the chianko, or kinkhorn, twisted to the right."—Baldaeus, Germ. ed. 521.

1673. "There are others they call chanquo; the shells of which are the Mother of Pearl."—Fryer, 322.

1727. "It admits of some Trade, and produces Cotton, Corn, coars Cloth, and Chonk, a Shell-fish in shape of a Periwinkle, but as large as a Man's Arm above the Elbow. In Bengal they are saw'd into Rings for Ornaments to Women's Arms."—A. Ham. i. 131.

1734. "Expended towards digging a foundation, where chanks were buried with accustomed ceremonies."—In Wheeler, iii. 147.

1770. "Upon the same coast is found a shell-fish called xanxus, of which the Indians at Bengal make bracelets."—Raynal (tr. 1777) i. 216.

* These are probably the same as Milburn, under Tuticorin, calls ketchies. We do not know the proper name.

1813. "A chank opening to the right hand is highly valued . . . always sells for its weight in gold."—Milburn, i. 357.

Charpoy, s. Hind. chārpāi, from Pers. chāhār-pāi (i.e., four-feet), the common Indian bedstead, sometimes of very rude materials, but in other cases handsomely wrought and painted. It is correctly described in the quotation from Ibn Batuta.

c. 1350. "The beds in India are very light. A single man can carry one, and every traveller should have his own bed, which his slave carries about on his head. The bed consists of four conical legs, on which four staves are laid; between these they plait a sort of ribbon of silk or cotton. When you lie on it you need nothing else to render the bed sufficiently elastic."—iii. 330.

c. 1540. "Husain Khan Tashtdār was sent on some business from Bengal. He went on travelling night and day. Whenever sleep came over him he placed himself on a bed (chahār-pai) and the villagers carried him along on their shoulders."—MS. quoted in Elliot, iv. 418.

1662. "Turbans, long coats, trowsers, shoes, and sleeping on charpais, are quite unusual."—H. of Mir Jumla's Invasion of Assam, transl. by Blochmann, J. A. S. B. xli. pt. i. 80.

1876. "A syce at Mozuffernugger, lying asleep on a charpoy . . . was killed by a tame buck goring him in the side. . . it was supposed in play."—Baldwin, Large and Small Game of Bengal, 195.

1883. "After a gallop across country, he would rest on a charpoy, or country bed, and hold an impromptu levee of all the village folk."—C. Raikes in L. of L. Lawrence, i. 57.

Chatta, s. An umbrella. Hind. chhātā, chhatr, &c., Sansk. chhatra.

c. 900. "He is clothed in a waist-cloth, and holds in his hand a thing called a Jatra; this is an umbrella made of peacock's feathers."—Reinaud, Relations, &c. 154.

c. 1340. "They hoist upon these elephants as many chatrās, or umbrellas of silk, mounted with precious stones, and with handles of pure gold."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 228.

c. 1354. "But as all the Indians commonly go naked, they are in the habit of carrying a thing like a little tent-roof, on a cane handle, which they open out at will as a protection against sun and rain. This they call a chatry. I brought one home to Florence with me. . . ."—John Mariignoli, in Cathay, &c. p. 381.

1673. "Thus the chief Naik with his loud Musick . . . an Ensign of Red, Swallow-tailed, several Chitories, little but rich Kitsols (which are the Names of several Countries for Umbrelloes). . ."—Fryer, 160.

Chatty, s. An earthen pot, spheroidal in shape. It is a S. Indian word, but is tolerably familiar in the Anglo-Indian parlance of N. India also, though the Hind. ghurra (gharra) is more commonly used there. The word is Tamil, shāṭi (which appears in Pali as chādī).

1781. "In honour of His Majesty's birthday we had for dinner fowl cutlets and a flour pudding, and drank his health in a chatty of sherbet."—Narr. of an Officer of Baillie's Detachment, quoted in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 285.

Chaw, s. For chā, i.e. Tea (q.v.).

1616. "I sent . . . a silver chaw pot and a fan to Capt. China wife."—Cocks's Diary, i. 215.

Chawbuck, s. and v. A whip; to whip. An obsolete vulgarism from Pers. chābuk, 'alert'; in Hind. 'a horse-whip.' It seems to be the same word as the sjambok in use at the Cape, apparently carried from India (see the quotation from Van Twist).

1048. "... Poor and little thieves are flogged with a great whip (called Siambuck) several days in succession."—Van Twist, 29.

1673. "Upon any suspicion of default he has a Black Guard that by a Chawbuck, a great Whip, extorts Confession."—Fryer, 98.

1673. "The one was of an Armenian, Chawbucked through the City for selling of Wine."—Ibid. 97.

1682. "... Ramgivan, our Vekel there (at Hugly) was sent for by Permesuradass, Bulchund's servant, who immediately clapt him in prison. Ye same day was brought forth and slippered; the next day he was beat on ye soles of his feet, ye third day Chawbuckt, and ye 4th drub'd till he could not speak, and all to force a writing in our names to pay Rupees 50,000 for custome of ye Silver brought out this year."—Hedges, Nov. 2.

1688. "Small offenders are only whipt on the Back, which sort of Punishment they call Chawbuck."—Dampier, ii. 138.

1699. "The Governor of Surrat ordered the cloth Broker to be tyed up and chawbucked."—Letter from General and Council at Bombay to E. I. C. (in Record Office), 23rd March, 1698-9.

1726. "Another Pariah he chawbucked 25 blows, put him in the Stocks, and kept him there an hour."—Wheeler, ii. 410.

1756. "... a letter from Mr. Hastings . . . says that the Nabob to engage the Dutch and French to purchase also, had put poems upon their Factories and threatened their Vaquills with the Chaubac."—In Long, 79.

"The sentinels placed at the door
Are for our security bail;
With Muskets and Chaubucks secure,
They guard us in Bangalore Jail."
Song, by a Gentleman of the Navy
(prisoner with Hyder) in Seton-Karr, i. 18.

1817. "... ready to prescribe his favourite regimen of the Chabuk for every man, woman, or child who dared to think otherwise."—Lalla Rookh.

Chawbuckswar, s. Hind. from Pers. chābuk-suwar, a rough-rider. Obsolete.

Chebuli. The denomination of one of the kinds of myrabolans (q.v.) exported from India. The true etymology is probably Kābuli, as stated by Thevenot, i. e., 'from Cabul.'

c. 1343. "Chebuli mirabolani."—List of Spices, &c., in Pegolotti (Della Decima, iii. 303).

c. 1665. "De la Province de Caboul . . . les Mirabolans croissent dans les Montagnes et c'est la cause pourquoi les Orientaux les appellent Cabuly."—Thevenot, v. 172.

Cheechee, adj. A disparaging term applied to half-castes or Eurasians (q.v.) (corresponding to the lip-lap of the Dutch in Java), and also to their manner of speech. The word is said to be taken from chē (Fie!), a common native (S. Indian) interjection of remonstrance or reproof, supposed to be much used by the class in question. The term is however, perhaps, also a kind of onomatopœia, indicating the mincing pronunciation which often characterises them (see below). It should, however, be added that there are many well educated East Indians who are quite free from this mincing accent.

"Pretty little Looking Glasses,
Good and cheap for Chee-chee Misses"
Hicky's Bengal Gazette, March 17th.

1873. "He is no favourite with the pure native, whose language he speaks as his own in addition to the hybrid minced English (known as chee-chee), which he also employs."—Fraser's Magazine, Oct. 437.

1880. "The Eurasian girl is often pretty and graceful. . . 'What if upon her lips there hung The accents of her tchi-tchi tongue."—Sir Ali Baba, 122.

1881. "There is no doubt that the 'Chee Chee twang,' which becomes so objectionable to every Englishman before he has been long in the East, was originally learned in the convent and the Brothers' school, and will be clung to as firmly as the queer turns of speech learned in the same place."—St. James's Gazette, Aug. 26th.

Cheenar, s. Pers. Chīnār, the Oriental Plane (Platanus orientalis) and platanus of the ancients; native from Greece to Persia. It is often by English travellers in Persia mis-called sycamore, from confusion with the common British tree (Acer pseudo-platanus), which English people also habitually miscall sycamore, and Scotch people miscall plane-tree! Our quotations show how old the confusion is. The tree is not a native of India, though there are fine chīnārs in Kashmir, and a few in old native gardens of the Punjab, introduced in the days of the Moghul emperors. The tree is the Arbre Sec of Marco Polo (see 2nd ed. vol. i. 131, 132).

Chīnārs of especial vastness and beauty are described by Herodotus and Pliny, by Chardin and others. At Buyukdereh near Constantinople, is still shown the Plane under which Godfrey of Boulogne is said to have encamped. At Tejrish, N. of Tehran, Sir H. Rawlinson tells us that he measured a great chīnār which had a girth of 108 feet at 5 feet from the ground.

c. 1628. "The gardens here are many. . . abounding in lofty pyramidal cypresses, broad-spreading Chenawrs."—Sir T. Herbert, 136.

1677. "We had a fair Prospect of the City (Ispahan) filling the one half of an ample Plain, few Buildings . . . shewing themselves by reason of the high Chinors, or Sicamores shading the choicest of them."—Fryer, 259.

"We in our Return cannot but take notice of the famous Walk between the two Cities of Jelfa and Ispahauin; it is planted with two Rows of Sycamores (which is the tall Maple, not the Sycamore of Alkair)."—Ibid. 286.

1682. "At the elegant villa and garden at Mr. Bohun's at Lee. He shewed me the Zinnar tree or platanus, and told me that since they had planted this kind of tree about the City of Ispahan . . . the plague . . . had exceedingly abated of its mortal effects."—Evelyn's Diary, Sept. 16.

1726. ". . . the finest road that you can imagine . . . planted in the middle with 135 Sennaar trees on one side and 132 on the other."—Valentijn, v. 208.

1783. "This tree, which in most parts of Asia is called the Chinaur, grows to the size of an oak, and has a taper straight trunk, with a silver-coloured bark, and its leaf, not unlike an expanded hand, is of a pale green."—G. Forster's Journey, ii. 17.

1817. ". . . they seem Like the Chenar-tree grove, where winter throws O'er all its tufted heads its feathery snows."—Mokanna.

Chīnār is alleged to be in Badakhshān applied to a species of poplar.

Cheeny, s. See under Sugar.

1810. "The superior kind (of raw sugar) which may often be had nearly white . . . and sharp-grained, under the name of cheeny."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 134.

Cheese, s. This word is well known to be used in modern English slang for "anything good, first-rate in quality, genuine, pleasant, or advantageous" (Slang Dictionary). And the most probable source of the term is Pers. and H. chiz = 'thing.' For the expression used to be common among young Anglo-Indians, e. g., "My new Arab is the real chiz;" "These cheeroots are the real chiz," i. e., the real thing. The word may have been an Anglo-Indian importation, and it is difficult otherwise to account for it.

Cheeta, s. Hind. chītā, the Felis jubata, Schreber, or 'Hunting Leopard,' so called from its being commonly trained to use in the chase. From Sansk. chitraka, or chitrakaya, lit. 'having a speckled body.'

1563. ". . . and when they wish to pay him much honour they call him Rao; as for example Chita-Rao, whom I am acquainted with; and this is a proud name, for Chita signifies 'Ounce' (or panther) and this Chita-Rao means 'King as strong as a Panther.'"—Garcia, f. 36.

c. 1596. "Once a leopard (chita) had been caught, and without previous training, on a mere hint by His Majesty, it brought in the prey, like trained leopards."—Ain-i-Akbari, i. 286.

1610. Hawkins calls the Cheetas at Akbar's Court 'ounces for game.'—In Purchas, i. 218.

1862. "The true Cheetah, the Hunting Leopard of India, does not exist in Ceylon."—Tennent, i. 140.

1879. "Two young cheetahs had just come in from Bombay; one of these was tame as a house-cat, and, like the puma, purred beautifully when stroked."—Jamrach's, in Sat. Review, May 17th, p. 612.

It has been ingeniously suggested by Mr. Aldis Wright that the word cheater, as used by Shakspeare, in the following passage, refers to this animal :—

Falstaff : He's no swaggerer, Hostess ; a tame cheater i' faith ; you may stroke him gently as a puppy greyhound ; he'll not swagger.—2nd Part King Henry IV. ii. 4.

Compare this with the passage just quoted from the Saturday Review ! And the interpretation would rather derive confirmation from a parallel passage in Beaumont and Fletcher :

" . . . if you give any credit to the juggling rascal, you are worse than simple widgeons, and will be drawn into the net by this decoy-duck, this tame cheater."—The Fair Maid of the Inn, iv. 2.

But we have not been able to trace any possible source from which Shakspeare could have derived the name of the animal at all, to say nothing of the familiar use of it.

Cheling, Cheli, s. This word is applied by some Portuguese writers to the traders of Indian origin who were settled at Malacca. It is not found in the Malay dictionaries, and it is just possible that it originated in some confusion of Quelin (Kling) and Chuli (Choolia) or rather of Quelin and Chetin (see Chetty).

1567. "From the cohabitation of the Chelins of Malacca with the Christians in the same street (even although in divers houses) spring great offences against God our Lord."—Decrees of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient., Dec. 23.

"This settlement is divided into two parishes, S. Thome and S. Estevão, and that part of S. Thome called Campon Chelim extends from the shore of the Jaos Bazar to the N.W. and terminates at the Stone Bastion ; in this part dwell the Chelis of Choro-mandel."—Ibid. 5 v. See also f. 22.

Chelingo, s. From Arab. shalandī.

This seems an unusual word. It is perhaps connected through the Arabic with the mediæval vessel chelandia, chelandria, chelandrus, chelande, &c., used in carrying troops and horses.

1726. " . . . as already a Chialeng (a sort of small native row-boat, which is used for discharging and loading cargo). . ."—Valentijn, V. Chor. 20.

1761. "No more than one frigate hath escaped ; lose not an instant in sending chelingoes upon chelingoes loaded with rice."—Carraccioli's Life of Clive, i. 58.

Cheroot, s. A cigar. But the term has been appropriated specially to cigars truncated at both ends, as the Indian and Manilla cigars always were in former days. This word is Tamil, shuruttu, 'a roll (of tobacco).' In the South cheroots are chiefly made at Trichinopoly and in the Godavery Delta, the produce being known respectively as Trichies and Lunkas.

The earliest occurrence of the word that we know is in Father Beschi's Tamil story of Parmartta Guru (c. 1725). On p. 1 one of the characters is described as carrying a firebrand to light his pugaiyilai shshuruttu, 'roll (cheroot) of tobacco.'

Grose (1750—60), speaking of Bombay, whilst describing the cheroot does not use that word, but another which is, as far as we know, entirely obsolete in British India, viz., buncus (q.v.).

1759. In the expenses of the Nabob's entertainment at Calcutta in this year we find :

"60 lbs. of Masulipatam cheroots, Rs. 500."—In Long, 194.

1781. " . . . am tormented every day by a parcel of gentlemen coming to the end of my berth to talk politics and smoke cheroots—advise them rather to think of mending the holes in their old shirts, like me."—Hon. J. Lindsay (in Lives of the Lindsays), iii. 297.

"Our evening amusements instead of your stupid Harmonics, was playing Cards and Backgammon, chewing Beetle and smoking Cherutes."—Old Country Captain in India Gazette, Feb'y. 24th.

1782. "Le tabac y réussit très bien ; les chiroutes de Manille sont renommées dans toute l'Inde par leur goût agréable ; aussi les Dames dans ce pays fument-elles toute la journée."—Sonnerat, Voyage, iii. 43.

1792. "At that time (c. 1757) I have seen the officers mount guard many's the time and oft . . . neither did they at that time carry your fuses, but had a long Pole with an iron head to it. . . With this in one Hand and a Chiroot in the other you saw them saluting away at the Main Guard."—Madras Courier, April 3.

1810. "The lowest classes of Europeans, as also of the natives . . . frequently smoke cheroots, exactly corresponding with the Spanish segar, though usually made rather more bulky."—Williamson, V. M. i. 499.

1811. "Dire que le T'cherout est la cigarette, c'est me dispenser d'en faire la description."—Solymys, iii.

1875. "The meal despatched, all who were not on duty lay down . . . almost too tired to smoke their cheroots before falling asleep."—The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

Chetty, s. A member of any of the trading castes in S. India, answering in every way to the Banians of W. and N. India. Malayal. Chetti, Tamil shetti, in Ceylon seddi; and see also Sett. These have all been supposed to be forms from the Sansk. Śreṣṭhi; but C. P. Brown (MS.) denies this, and says, "Shetti, a shop-keeper, is plain Telugu," and quite distinct from Sreṣṭhi. Whence then the Hind. Seṭh?

c. 1349. The word occurs in Ibn Batuta (iv. 259) in the form sāti, which he says was given to very rich merchants in China; and this is one of his questionable statements about that country.

1511. "The great Afonso Dalboquerque . . . determined to appoint Ninachatu, because he was a Hindoo, Governor of the Quilins and Chettins."—Comment. of Af. Dalboq., Hak. Soc. iii. 128.

1516. "Some of these are called Chettis, who are Gentiles, natives of the province of Cholmender."—Barbosa, 144.

1552. "... whom our people commonly call Chatis. These are men with such a genius for merchandise, and so acute in every mode of trade, that among our people when they desire either to blame or praise any man for his subtlety and skill in merchant's traffic they say of him, 'he is a Chatinim;' and they use the word chatinar for 'to trade,'—which are words now very commonly received among us."—Barros, I. ix. 3.

c. 1566. "Ui sono uomini periti che si chiamano Chitini, li quali metteno il prezzo alle perle."—Cesare Federici, Ram. iii. 390.

1596. "The vessels of the Chatis of these parts never sail along the coast of Malavar nor towards the north, except in a cañilla, in order to go and come more securely, and to avoid being cut off by the Malavars and other corsairs, who are continually roving those seas."—Viceroy's Proclamation at Goa, in Archiv. Port. Or., fasc. 3, 661.

1598. "The Souldiers in these dayes give themselves more to be Chettijns and to deale in Marchandise, than to serve the King in his Armado."—Linschoten, 58.

1651. "The Sitty are merchant folk."—Rogierius, 8.

1686. "... And that if the Chetty Bazaar people do not immediately open their shops, and sell their grain etc. as usually, that the goods and commodities in their severall ships be confiscated."—In Wheeler, i. 152.

1726. "The Sittis are merchant folk and also porters. . ."—Valentijn, Choro. 88.

"The strength of a Bramin is Knowledge; the strength of a King is Courage; the strength of a Bellale (or Cultivator) is Revenue; the strength of a Chetti is Money."—Apophthegms of Ceylon, tr. in Valentijn, v. 390.

c. 1754. "Chitties are a particular kind of merchants of Madras, and are generally very rich, but rank with the left-hand cast."—Ives, 25.

1796. "Cetti, mercanti astuti, diligenti, laboriosi, sobrii, frugali, ricchi."—Fra Paolo, 79.

Chiamay, n.p. The name of an imaginary lake, which in the maps of the 16th century, followed by most of those of the 17th, is made the source of most of the great rivers of Further India, including the Brahmaputra, the Irawadi, the Salwen, and the Menam. Lake Chiamay was the counterpart of the African lake of the same period which is made the source of all the great rivers of Africa, but it is less easy to suggest what gave rise to this idea of it. The actual name seems taken from the State of Zimmé (q.v.) or Chiang-mai.

c. 1544. "So proceeding onward, he arrived at the Lake of Singipamor, which ordinarily is called Chiammy. . ."—F. M. Pinto (Cogan's Tr.), p. 271.

1552. Heylin's Cosmographie*, ii. 238.

Chicane, Chicanery. These English words, signifying pettifogging, captious contention, taking every possible advantage in a contest, have been referred to Spanish chico, 'little,' and to Fr. chic, chicquet, a little bit, as by Mr. Wedgwood in his Dict. of Eng. Etymology. See also quotation from Saturday Review below.

But there can be little doubt that the words are really traceable to the game of charugān, or horse-golf. This game is now well known in England under the name of polo (q.v.). But the recent introduction under that name is its second importation into Western Europe. For in the middle ages it came from Persia to Byzantium, where it was popular under a modification of its Persian name (verb τῑκαυίῳ, playing ground τῑκαυιστήριον), and from Byzantium it passed, as a pedestrian game, to Languedoc, where it was called, by a further modification, chicane (see Ducange, Dissertations sur l'Histoire de St. Louis, viii., and his Glossarium Graecitatis, s. v. Τῑκαυίῳ; also Ouseley's Travels, i. 345). The analogy of certain periods of the game of golf suggests how the figurative meaning of chicaner might arise in taking advantage of the petty accidents of the surface. And this is the strict meaning of chicaner, as used by military writers.

Ducange's idea was that the Greeks had borrowed both the game and the name from France, but this is evidently erroneous. He was not aware of the Persian chaugān. But he explains well how the tactics of the game should have led to the application of its name to "those tortuous proceedings of pleaders which we old practitioners call barres." The indication of the Persian origin of both the Greek and the French words is due to W. Ouseley and to Quatremère. The latter has an interesting note, full of his usual wealth of Oriental reading, in his translation of Makrizi's Mameluke Sultans, tom. i. pt. i. pp. 121 seqq.

The preceding etymology was put forward again in Notes upon Mr. Wedgwood's Dictionary published by one of the present writers in Ocean Highways, Sept., 1872, p. 186. The same etymology has since been given by Littré (s.v.), who says: "Dès lors, la série des sens est: jeu de mail, puis action de disputer la partie, et enfin manœuvres processives."

The Persian forms of the name are chaugān and chauṅān; but according to the Bahāri 'Ajām (a great Persian dictionary compiled in India, 1768) the primitive form of the word is chulgān from chāl, 'bent,' which (as to the form) is corroborated by the Arabic ṣawljān.* The meanings are according to Vüllers (1) any stick with a crook; (2) such a stick used as a drum-stick; (3) a crook from which a steel ball is suspended, which was one of the royal insignia, otherwise called Kaukaba; (4) (The golf-stick, and) the game of horse-golf.

* On the other hand, a probable origin of chaugān would be an Indian (Prakrit) word, meaning 'four-corners,' viz., as a name for the polo-ground. The chulgān is possibly a 'striving after meaning.'

The game is now quite extinct in Persia and Western Asia, surviving only in certain regions adjoining India, as is specified under POLO. But for many centuries it was the game of kings and courts over all Mahomedan Asia. The earliest Mahomedan historians represent the game of chaugān as familiar to the Sassanian kings; Ferdusi puts the chaugān-stick into the hands of Siāwūsh, the father of Kai Khusrū or Cyrus; many famous kings were devoted to the game, among whom may be mentioned Nūruddīn the Just, Atābek of Syria and the great enemy of the Crusaders. He was so fond of the game that he used (like Akbar in after days) to play it by lamp-light, and was severely rebuked by a devout Mussulman for being so devoted to a mere amusement. Other zealous chaugān-players were the great Saladin, Jalāluddīn Mankbarni of Khwārizm, and Malik Bībars, Marco Polo's "Bendocquedar Soldan of Babylon," who was said more than once to have played chaugān at Damascus and at Cairo within the same week. Many illustrious persons also are mentioned in Asiatic history as having met their death by accidents in the maidān, as the chaugān-field was especially called; e.g. Kutbuddīn Ībak of Dehli, who was killed by such a fall at Lahore in (or about) 1207.

In Makrizi (I. i. 121) we read of an Amir at the Mameluke Court called Husāmuddīn Lajīn 'Azīzī the Jukāndār (or Lord High Polo-stick).

It is not known when the game was conveyed to Constantinople, but it must have been not later than the beginning of the 8th century.* The fullest description of the game as played there is given by Johannes Cinnamus (c. 1190), who does not however give the barbarian name:

"The winter now being over and the gloom cleared away, he (the Emperor Manuel Comnenus) devoted himself to a certain sober exercise which from the first had been the custom of the Emperors and their sons to practise. This is the manner thereof. A party of young men divide into two equal bands, and in a flat space which has been measured out purposely they cast a leather ball in size somewhat like an apple; and setting this in the middle as if it were a prize to be contended for they rush into the contest at full speed, each grasping in his right hand a stick of moderate length which comes suddenly to a broad rounded end, the middle of which is closed by a network of dried catgut. Then each party strives who shall first send the ball beyond the goal planted conspicuously on the opposite side, for whenever the ball is struck with the netted sticks through the goal at either side, that gives the victory to the other side. This is the kind of game, evidently a slippery and dangerous one. For a player must be continually throwing himself right back, or bending to one side or the other, as he turns his horse short, or suddenly dashes off at speed, with such strokes and twists as are needed to follow up the ball. . . . And thus as the Emperor was rushing round in furious fashion in this game, it so happened that the horse which he rode came violently to the ground. He was prostrate below the horse, and as he struggled vainly to extricate himself from its incumbent weight his thigh and hand were crushed beneath the saddle and much injured. . . .—In Bonn ed. pp. 263-264.

We see from this passage that at Byzantium the game was played with a kind of racket, and not with a polo-stick.

We have not been able to find an instance of the medieval French chicane in this sense, nor does Littré's Dictionary give any. But Ducange states positively that in his time the word in this sense survived in Languedoc, and there could be no better evidence. From Henschel's Ducange also we borrow a quotation which shows chuca, used for some game of ball, in French-Latin, surely a form of chaugan or chicane.

c. 820. "If a man dream that he is on horseback along with the King himself, or some great personage, and that he strikes the ball home, or wins the chukān (ἡ τοῦ τζουκανίζει) he shall find grace and favour thereupon, conformable to the success of his ball and the dexterity of his horse." Again: "If the King dream that he has won in the chukān (ἡ τοῦ τζουκανίζειν) he shall find things prosper with him."—The Dream-Judgments of Achmet Ibn Seirim, from a MS. Greek version quoted by Ducange in Gloss. Graecitatis.

c. 940. Constantine Porphyrogenitus, speaking of the rapids of the Danapris or Dnieper, says: "ὃ δὲ τοῦτο φαραγμὸς τοσούτου ἐστὶ στενὸς ὅσον τὸ πλάτος τοῦ τζουκανιστηρίου" ("The defile in this case is as narrow as the width of the chukan-ground").—De Admin. Imp., cap. ix. (Bonn ed. iii. 75).

" . . . . he selected certain of his medicines and drugs, and made a goff-stick (jaukan?) with a hollow handle, into which he introduced them; after which . . . he went again to the King . . . and directed him to repair to the horse-course, and to play with the ball and goff-stick. . ."—Lane's Arabian Nights, i. 85-86.

c. 1030-1040. "Whenever you march . . . you must take these people with you, and you must . . . not allow them to drink wine or to play at chaughān."—Baihaqi in Elliot, ii. 120.

c. 1590. "His Majesty also plays at chaughān in dark nights . . . the balls which are used at night are set on fire. . . . For the sake of adding splendour to the games . . . His Majesty has knobs of gold and silver fixed to the tops of the chaughān sticks. If one of them breaks, any player that gets hold of the pieces may keep them."—Ain-i-Akbari, i. 298.

1837. "The game of Choughan mentioned by BABER is still played everywhere in Tibet; it is nothing but 'hockey on horseback,' and is excellent fun."—Vigne, in J. A. S. Bengal, vi. 774.

1881. "One would at first sight be inclined to derive the French chic from the English 'cheek;' but it appears that the English is itself the derived word, chic being an old Romance word signifying finesse, or subtlety, and forming the root of our own word chicanery."—Sat. Rev., Sept. 10, p. 326 (Essay on French Slang).

a. Hind. chik; a kind of screen-blind made of finely-split bamboo, laced with twine, and often painted on the outer side. It is hung or framed in doorways or windows, both in houses and in tents. The thing may probably have come in with the Mongols, for we find in Kovalevski's Mongol. Dict. (2174) "Tchik = Natte." The Ain (226) has chigh. Chicks are now made in London, as well as imported from China and Japan.

1673. "Glass is dear, and scarcely purchasable . . . therefore their Windows are usually folding doors, screened with Cheeks or latises."—Fryer, 92.

The pron. cheek is still not uncommon among English people.

"The Coach where the Women were was covered with Cheeks, a sort of hanging Curtain, made with Bents variously Coloured with Lacker, and Chequered with Packthread so artificially that you may see all without, and yourself within unperceived."—Ibid. 83.

1825. "The check of the tent prevents effectually any person from seeing what passes within."—Heber, i. 192, ed. 1844.

b. Short for chicken, a sum of four rupees. This is the Venetian zecchino, cecchino, or sequin, a gold coin long current on the shores of India, and which still frequently turns up in treasure-trove, and in hoards. In the early part of the 15th century Nicolo Conti mentions that in some parts of India Venetian ducats, i. e. sequins, were current (p. 30). And recently, in fact to our own day, chick was a term in frequent Anglo-Indian use, e. g. "I'll bet you a chick."

The word zecchino is from the Zecca, or Mint at Venice, and that name is of Arabic origin, from sikka, 'a coining die.' The double history of this word is curious. We have just seen how in one form, and by what circuitous secular journey, through Egypt, Venice, India, it has gained a place in the Anglo-Indian Vocabulary. By a directer route also it has found a distinct place in the same repository under the form sicca (q.v.), and in this shape it still retains a ghostly kind of existence at the India Office. It is remarkable how first the spread of Saracenic power and civilization, then the spread of Venetian commerce and coinage, and lastly the spread of English commerce and power, should thus have brought together two words identical in origin, after so widely divergent a career.

The sequin is sometimes called in the South "shānārcash," because the Doge with his sceptre is taken for the Shānār, or toddy-drawer climbing the palm-tree! See also Venetian.

We apprehend that the gambling phrases 'chicken-stakes' and 'chicken-hazard' originate in the same word.

Chicken, s. Embroidery. Chicken-wallā, an itinerant dealer in embroidered handkerchiefs, petticoats, and such like. From Pers. chikin or chikīn, 'art needlework.'

Chickore, s. The red-legged partridge, or its close congener Caccabis chukor, Gray. It is common in the Western Himalaya, the N. Punjab, and in Afghanistan. The francolin of Moorcroft's Travels is really the chickore. The name appears to be Sansk. chakora, and this disposes of the derivation formerly suggested by one of the present writers, as from the Mongol tsokhor, 'dappled or pied' (a word, moreover, which the late Prof. Schiefner informed us is only applied to horses). The name is sometimes applied to other birds. Thus, according to Cunningham it is applied in Ladak to the Snow-cock (Tetraogallus Himalayensis, Gray), and he appears to give chá-kor as meaning 'white-bird' in Tibetan. Jerdon gives 'snow chukor' and 'strath-chukor' as sportsmen's names for this fine bird. And in Bengal Proper the name is applied, by local English sportsmen, to the large handsome partridge (Ortygornis gularis, Tem.) of Eastern Bengal, called in Hind. kaiyah or ban-itar ('forest partridge'). See Jerdon, ed. 1877, ii. 575.

Also the birds described in the extract from Mr. Abbott below do not appear to have been caccabis (which he speaks of in the same journal as 'red-legged partridge'). And the use of the word by Persians (apparently) is notable; it does not appear in Persian dictionaries. There is probably some mistake. The birds spoken of may have been the Large Sand-grouse (Pterocles arenarius, Pal.), which in both Persia and Afghanistan is called by names meaning 'Black-breast.'

The belief that the chickore eats fire, mentioned in a quotation below, is probably from some verbal misconception (quasi ātish-khōr?). Jerdon states that the Afghans call the bird the 'Fire-eater.'

c. 1190. "... plantains and fruits, Koils, Chakors, peacocks, Sarases, beautiful to behold."—The Prithivījā Rāsan of Chand Bardai, in Ind. Ant., i. 273.

In the following passage the word cator is supposed by the editor to be a clerical error for çacor or chacor.

1298. "The Emperor has had several little houses erected in which he keeps in mew a huge number of cators, which are what we call the Great Partridge."—Marco Polo, i. 287 (2nd ed.).

1520. "Haidar Alemdār had been sent by me to the Kafers. He met me below the Pass of Bādī, accompanied by some of their chiefs, who brought with them a few skins of wine. While coming down the Pass, he saw prodigious numbers of Chikārs."—Baber, 282.

1814, "... partridges, quails, and a bird which is called Cupk by the Persians and Afghans, and the hill Chikore by the Indians, and which I understand is known in Europe by the name of the Greek Partridge."—Elphinstone's Caubool, i. 192 (ed. 1839).

c. 1815. "One day in the fort he found a hill-partridge enclosed in a wicker basket. This bird is called the chuckoor, and is said to eat fire."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 440.

1850. "A flight of birds attracted my attention; I imagine them to be a species of bustard or grouse—black beneath and with much white about the wings,—they were beyond our reach; the people called them Chukore."—K. Abbott, Notes during a Journey in Persia, in J. R. Geog. Soc. xxx. 41.

Chilaw, n.p. A place on the west coast of Ceylon, an old seat of the pearl-fishery. The name is a corruption of the Tamil salābham, 'the diving'; in Singhalese it is Halavatta. The name was commonly applied by the Portuguese to the whole aggregation of shoals (Baixas de Chilao) in the Gulf of Manaar, between Ceylon and the coast of Madura and Tinnevely. See for example quotation from Correa under Beadala.

1610. "La pesqueria de Chilao . . . por hazerse antiguamente in un puerto del mismo nombre en la isla de Seylan . . . llamado asi por ista causa; por que chilao, en lengua Chengala, . . . quiere dezir pesqueria."—Teixeira, Pt. ii. 29.

Chillum, s. Hind. chilam; "the part of the hukka (see Hooka) which contains the tobacco and charcoal balls, whence it is sometimes loosely used for the pipe itself, or the act of smoking it" (Wilson). It is also applied to the replenishment of the bowl, in the same way as a man asks for "another glass." The tobacco, as used by the masses in the hubble-bubble, is cut small and kneaded into a pulp with goor, i. e., molasses, and a little water. Hence actual contact with glowing charcoal is needed to keep it alight.

1781. "Dressing a hubble-bubble, per week at 3 chillums a day,

fan 0, dubs 3, cash 0."
Prison Experiences in Captivity of Hon. J. Lindsay, in Lives of Lindays, iii.

1811. "They have not the same scruples for the Chillum as for the rest of the Hooka, and it is often lent . . . whereas the very proposition for the Hooka gives rise frequently to the most ridiculous quarrels."—Solvyns, iii.

1828. "Every sound was hushed but the noise of that wind . . . and the occasional bubbling of my hookah, which had just been furnished with another chillum."—The Kuzilbash, i. 2.

1829. "Tugging away at your hookah, find no smoke; a thief having purloined your silver chelam and surpoose."—John Shipp, ii. 159.

1848. "Jos however . . . could not think of moving till his baggage was cleared, or of travelling until he could do so with his chillum."—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. xxiii.

Chillumbrum, n.p. A town in S. Arcot, which is the site of a famous temple of Siva, properly Shidamburam. Etym. obscure.

Chillumchee, s. Hind. chilamchī, also silfchī, and silpchī, of which chilamchī is probably a corruption. A basin of brass (as in Bengal), or tinned copper (as usually in the West and South) for washing hands. The form of the word seems Turkish, but we cannot trace it.

1715. "We prepared for our first present, viz., 1000 gold mohurs . . . the unicorn's horn . . . the astoa (?) and chelumgic of Manila work. . .—In Wheeler, ii. 246.

1833. "Our supper was a peelaw . . . when it was removed a chillumchee and goblet of warm water was handed round, and each washed his hands and mouth."—P. Gordon, Fragment of the Journal of a Tour, &c.

1851. "When a chillumchee of water sans soap was provided, 'Have you no soap?' Sir C. Napier asked"—Mawson, Indian Command of Sir C. Napier.

There is an Anglo-Indian tradition, which we would not vouch for, that one of the orators on the great Hastings trial depicted the oppressor on some occasion, as "grasping his chillum in one hand and his chillumchee in the other."

The latter word is used chiefly by Anglo-Indians of the Bengal Presidency and their servants. In Bombay the article has a different name. And it is told of a gallant veteran of the old Bengal Artillery, who was full of "Presidential" prejudices, that on hearing the Bombay army commended by a brother officer, he broke out in just wrath: "The Bombay Army! Don't talk to me of the Bombay Army! They call a chillumchee a gindy!—THE BEASTS!"

Chilly, s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of the pod of red pepper (Capsicum frutescens and C. annuum, Nat. Ord. Solanaceae). There can be little doubt that the name, as stated by Bontius in the quotation, was taken from Chili in S. America, whence the plant was carried to the Indian Archipelago, and thence to India.

Again (lib. vi. cap. 40, p. 131) Bontius calls it 'piper Chilensis,' and also 'Ricinus Brasiliensis.' But his commentator, Piso, observes that Ricinus is quite improper; "vera Piperis sive Capsici Brasiliensis species apparet." Bontius says it was a common custom of natives, and even of certain Dutchmen, to keep a piece of chilly continually chewed, but he found it intolerable.

1848. "Try a chili with it, Miss Sharpe," said Joseph, really interested. 'A chili?' said Rebecca, gasping. 'Oh yes!' . . . 'How fresh and green they look,' she said, and put one into her mouth.

It was hotter than the curry; flesh and blood could bear it no longer."—Vanity Fair, ch. iii.

Chimney-glass, s. Gardener's name, on the Bombay side of India, for the flower and plant Allamanda cathartica (Sir G. Birdwood).

China, n.p. The European knowledge of this name in the forms Thinae and Sinae goes back nearly to the Christian era. The famous mention of the Sinim by the prophet Isaiah would carry us much further back, but we fear the possibility of that referring to the Chinese must be abandoned, as must be likewise, perhaps, the similar application of the name of Chinas in ancient Sanskrit works. The most probable origin of the name—which is essentially a name applied by foreigners to the country,—as yet suggested, is that put forward by Baron F. von Richthofen, that it comes from Jih-nan, an old name of Tongking, seeing that in Jih-nan lay the only port which was open for foreign trade with China at the beginning of our era, and that that province was then included administratively within the limits of China Proper (see Richthofen, China, i. 504-510; the same author's papers in the Trans. of the Berlin Geog. Soc. for 1876; and a paper by one of the present writers in Proc. R. Geog. Soc. November, 1882).

(After this was in type our friend M. Terrien de la Couperie communicated an elaborate note, of which we can but state the general gist. Whilst he quite accepts the suggestion that Kiao-chi or Tongking, anciently called Kiao-ti, was the Kattigara of Ptolemy's authority, he denies that Jih-nan can have been the original of Sinae. This he does on two chief grounds: (1) That Jih-nan was not Kiao-chi, but a province a good deal further south, corresponding to the modern province of An (Nghé Ane, in the map of M. Dutreuil de Rhins, the capital of which is about 2° 17' in lat. S. of Hanoi). This is distinctly stated in the Official Geography of Annam. An was one of the twelve provinces of Cochin China proper till 1820-41, when, with two others, it was transferred to Tongking. Also, in the Chinese Historical Atlas, Jih-nan lies in Chen-Ching, i.e. Cochin-China. (2) That the ancient pronunciation of Jih-nan, as indicated by the Chinese authorities of the Han period, was Nit-nam. It is still pronounced in Sinico-Annamite (the most archaic of the Chinese dialects) Nhut-nam, and in Cantonese Yat-nam. M. Terrien further points out that the export of Chinese goods, and the traffic with the south and west, was for several centuries B.C. monopolised by the State of Tsen (now pronounced in Sinico-Annamite Chen, and in Mandarin Tien), which corresponded to the centre and west of modern Yun-nan. The She-ki of Sze-ma Tsien (B.C. 91), and the Annals of the Han Dynasty afford interesting information on this subject. When the Emperor Wu-ti, in consequence of Chang-Kien's information brought back from Bactria, sent envoys to find the route followed by the traders of Shuh (i.e. Sze-chuen) to India, these envoys were detained by Tang-Kiang, King of Tsen, who objected to their exploring trade-routes through his territory, saying haughtily: 'Has the Han a greater dominion than ours?'

M. Terrien conceives that as the only communication of this Tsen State with the Sea would be by the Song-Koi R., the emporium of sea-trade with that state would be at its mouth, viz., at Kiao-ti or Kattigara. Thus, he considers, the name of Tsen, this powerful and arrogant State, the monopoliser of trade-routes, is in all probability that which spread far and wide the name of Chin, Sin, Sinae, Thinae, and preserved its predominance in the mouths of foreigners, even when, as in the 2nd century of our era, the great Empire of the Han had extended over the Delta of the Song-Koi.

This theory needs more consideration than we can give it whilst this work is passing through the press. But it will doubtless have discussion elsewhere. And it does not disturb Richt-hofen's identification of Kattigara).

c. A.D. 80-89. "Behind this country (Chryse) the sea comes to a termination somewhere in Thin, and in the interior of that country, quite to the north, there is a very great city called Thinae, from which raw silk and silk thread and silk stuffs [are brought overland through Bactria to Barygaza, as they are on the other hand by the Ganges River to Limyrice]. It is not easy, however, to get to this Thin, and few and far between are those who come from it. . ."

c. 150. "The inhabited part of our earth is bounded on the east by the Unknown Land which lies along the region occupied by the easternmost races of Asia Minor, the Sinae and the natives of Serice . . ."—Claudius Ptolemy, Bk. vii. ch. 5.

c. 545. "The country of silk, I may mention, is the remotest of all the Indies, lying towards the left when you enter the Indian Sea, but a vast distance further off than the Persian Gulf or that island which the Indians call Seleidia, and the Greeks Taprobane. Tzinizta (elsewhere Tzinista) is the name of the Country, and the Ocean compasses it round to the left, just as the same Ocean compasses Barbari (i.e. the Somali Country) round to the right. And the Indian philosophers called Brachmans tell you that if you were to stretch a straight cord from Tzinizta through Persia to the Roman territory, you would just divide the world in halves."—Cosmas, Topog. Christ., Bk. II.

c. 641. "In 641 The King of Magadha (Behar, etc.) sent an ambassador with a letter to the Chinese Court. The emperor . . . in return directed one of his officers to go to the King . . . and to invite his submission. The King Shilyoto (Siladitya) was all astonishment. 'Since time immemorial,' he asked his officer, 'did ever an ambassador come from Mohochintan? . . . China, s. In the sense of porcelain this word (Chīnī, &c.) is used in Asiatic languages as well as in English. In English it does not occur in Minshew (2nd ed. 1627), though it does in some earlier publications.

The phrase China-dishes as occurring in Drake and in Shakspeare, shows how the word took the sense of porcelain in our own and other languages. The phrase China-dishes as first used was analogous to Turkey-carpets. But in the latter we have never lost the geographical sense of the adjective. In the word turquoises, again, the phrase was no doubt originally pierres turquoises, or the like, and here, as in china dishes, the specific has superseded the generic sense. The use of arab in India for an Arab horse is analogous to china.

Sala in Uld. News, May 12th, 1883.

1876. Schuyler mentions that the best native earthenware in Turkestan is called Chīnī, and bears a clumsy imitation of a Chinese mark.—(See Turkestan, i. 187.)

For the following interesting note on the Arabic use we are indebted to Professor Robertson Smith:—

Sīniya is spoken of thus in the Lataīfo'l-ma'ārif of al-Th'alībī, ed. De Jong, Leyden, 1867, a book written in A.D. 990. "The Arabs were wont to call all elegant vessels and the like šiniya (i.e., Chinese), whatever they really were, because of the speciality of the Chinese in objects of vertu; and this usage remains in the common word sawānā (pl. of šiniya) to the present day."

So in the Tajārīb al-ʿOmam of Ibn Maskawaih (Fr. Hist. Ar. ii. 457), it is said that at the wedding of Mamūn with Būrān "her grandmother strewed over her 1,000 pearls from a šiniya of gold." In Egypt the familiar round brass trays, used to dine off, are now called šiniya (vulgo šanīya), and so is a European saucer.

The expression šiniyat al šin, "A Chinese šiniya," is quoted by De Goeje from a poem of Abul-shibl Agānī, xiii. 27.

China-Buckeer, n.p. One of the chief Delta-mouths of the Irawadi is so called in marine charts. We have not been able to ascertain the origin of the name, further than that Prof. Forchhammer, in his Notes on the Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma (p. 16), states that the country between Rangoon and Bassein, i.e. on the west of the Rangoon River, bore the name of Pokhara, of which Buckeer is a corruption. This does not explain the China.

China-Root, s. A once famous drug, known as Radix Chinæ and Tuber Chinæ, being the tuber of various species of Smilax (N. O. Smilacaceæ, the same to which sarsaparilla belongs). It was said to have been used with good effect on Charles V. when suffering from gout, and acquired a great repute. It was also much used in the same way as sarsaparilla. It is now quite obsolete in England, but is still held in esteem in the native pharmacopœias of China and India.

1563. "R. I wish to take to Portugal some of the Root or Wood of China, since it is not a contraband drug. . . .

"O. This wood or root grows in China, an immense country, presumed to be on the confines of Muscovy . . . and because in all those regions, both in China and in Japan, there exists the morbo napolitano, the merciful God hath willed to give them this root for remedy, and with it the good physicians there know well the treatment."—Garcia, f. 177.

c. 1590. "Sircar Silhet is very mountainous . . . China-Root (chob-chinī) is produced here in great plenty, which was but lately discovered by some Turks."—Ayeen Akb., by Gladwin, ii. 10.

1598. "The route of China is commonlie vsed among the Egyptians. . . . specially for a consumption, for the which they seeth the route China in broth of a henne or cocke, whereby they become whole and faire of face."—Dr. Paludanus, in Linschoten, 124.

c. 1610. "Quant à la verole. . . . Ils lā guerissent sans suer avec du bois d'Es-chine. . . ."—Pyrard de la Val, ii. 9 (ed. 1679).

Chinapatam, n.p. A name sometimes given by the natives to Madras. The name is now written Shennaipattanam, and the following is the origin of that name according to the statement given in W. Hamilton's Hindustan.

On "this part of the Coast of Coromandel . . . the English . . . possessed no fixed establishment until A.D. 1639, in which year, on the 1st of March, a grant was received from the descendant of the Hindoo dynasty of Bijanagur, then reigning at Chandergherry, for the erection of a fort. This document from Sree Rung Raveel expressly enjoins, that the town and fort to be erected at Madras shall be called after his own name, Sree Runga Rajapatam; but the local governor or Naik, Damerla Venkatadri, who first invited Mr. Francis Day, the chief of Armagon, to remove to Madras, had previously intimated to him that he would have the new English establishment founded in the name of his father Chennappa, and the name of Chenappapatam continues to be universally applied to the town of Madras by the natives of that division of the south of India named Dravida."—(Vol. II., p. 413).*

Chinchew, Chincheo, n.p. A port of Fuhkien in China. Some ambiguity exists as to the application of the name. In English charts the name is now attached to the ancient and famous port of Chwan-chau-fu (Tshiouan-chéou-fou of French writers), the Zayton of Marco Polo and other medieval travellers. But the Chincheo of the Spaniards and Portuguese to this day, and the Chinchew of older English books, is, as Mr. G. Phillips pointed out some years ago, not Chwan-chau-fu, but Chang-chau-fu, distant from the former some 80 m. in a direct line, and about 140 by navigation. The province of Fuhkien is often called Chincheo by the early Jesuit writers. Changchau and its dependencies seem to have constituted the ports of Fuhkien with which Macao and Manila communicated, and hence apparently they applied the same name to the port and the province, though Chang-chau was never the official capital of Fuhkien (see Encyc. Britann., 9th ed. s.v. and references there).

* A note of Dr. Burnell's on this subject has unfortunately been mislaid. He doubted this origin of the name, and considered that the actual name could hardly have been formed from that of Chennappa. It is possible that some name similar to Chinapatam was borne by the place previously. It will be seen under Madras that Barros curiously connects the Chinese with St. Thomé.

Chincheos is used for "people of Fuhkien" in a quotation under Com-pound, q.v.

1517. "... in another place called Chincheo, where the people were much richer than in Canton (Cantão). From that city used every year, before our people came to Malaca, to come to Malaca 4 junks loaded with gold, silver, and silk, returning laden with wares from India."—Correa, ii. 529.

Chin-chin. In the "pigeon English" of Chinese ports this signifies 'salutation, compliments,' or 'to salute,' and is much used by Englishmen as slang in such senses. It is a corruption of the Chinese phrase ts'ing-ts'ing, Pekingese ch'ing-ch'ing, a term of salutation answering to 'thank-you,' 'adieu.' In the same vulgar dialect chin-chin joss means religious worship of any kind (see Joss). It is curious that the phrase occurs in a quaint story told to William of Rubruck by a Chinese priest whom he met at the Court of the Great Khan (see below). And it is equally remarkable to find the same story related with singular closeness of correspondence out of "the Chinese books of Geography" by Francesco Carletti, 350 years later (in 1600). He calls the creatures Zinzin (Ragionamenti di F. C., pp. 138-9).

1253. "One day there sate by me a certain priest of Cathay, dressed in a red cloth of exquisite colour, and when I asked him whence they got such a dye, he told me how in the eastern parts of Cathay there were lofty cliffs on which dwelt certain creatures in all things partaking of human form, except that their knees did not bend. . . . The huntsmen go thither, taking very strong beer with them, and make holes in the rocks which they fill with this beer. . . . Then they hide themselves and these creatures come out of their holes and taste the liquor, and call out 'Chin Chin.'"—Itinerarium, in Rec. de Voyages, &c., iv. 328.

Probably some form of this phrase is intended in the word used by Pinto in the following passage, which Cogan leaves untranslated :

c. 1540. "So after we had saluted one another after the manner of the Country, they went and anchored by the shore" (in orig. "despois de se fazerem as suas e as nossas salvas a Charachina como entre este gente se custuma.") In Cogan, p. 56; in orig. ch. xlvii.

1795. "The two junior members of the Chinese deputation came at the appointed hour. . . . On entering the door of the marquise they both made an abrupt stop, and resisted all solicitation to advance to chairs that had been prepared for them; until I should first be seated; in this dilemma Dr. Buchanan, who had visited China, advised me what was to be done; I immediately seized on the foremost, whilst the Doctor himself grappled with the second; thus we soon fixed them in their seats, both parties, during the struggle, repeating Chin Chin, Chin Chin, the Chinese term of salutation."—Symes, Embassy to Ava, 295.

1829. "One of the Chinese servants came to me and said, 'Mr. Talbot chin-chin you come down.'"—The Fankwaee at Canton, p. 20.

1880. "But far from thinking it any shame to deface our beautiful language, the English seem to glory in its distortion, and will often ask one another to come to 'chow-chow' instead of dinner; and send their 'chin-chin,' even in letters, rather than their compliments; most of them ignorant of the fact that 'chow-chow' is no more Chinese than it is Hebrew; that 'chin-chin,' though an expression used by the Chinese, does not in its true meaning come near to the 'good-bye, old fellow,' for which it is often used, or the compliments for which it is frequently substituted."—W. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 156.

Chinsura, n.p. A town on the Hoogly River, 26 miles above Calcutta, on the west bank, which was the seat of a Dutch settlement and factory down to 1824, when it was ceded to us by the Treaty of London, under which the Dutch gave up Malacca and their settlements in continental India, whilst we withdrew from Sumatra.

1705. "La Loge appellée Chamdernagor est une très-belle Maison située sur le bord d'un des bras du fleuve de Gange. . . . A une lieue de la Loge il y a une grande Ville appellée Chinehrat. . ."—Luvillier, 64-65.

1726. "The place where our Lodge (or Factory) is is properly called Sinternu [i.e. Chinsura] and not Hoogli (which is the name of the village)."—Valentijn, v. 162.

1727. "Chinchura, where the Dutch Emporium stands. . . . the Factors have a great many good Houses standing pleasantly on the River-Side; and all of them have pretty Gardens."—A. Ham, ii. 20.

Chints, Chinch, s. A bug. This word is now quite obsolete both in India and in England. It is a corruption of the Portuguese chinche, which again is from cimeæ. Mrs. Trollope, in her once famous book on the Domestic Manners of the Americans, made much of a supposed instance of affected squeamishness in American ladies, who used the word chintzes instead of bugs. But she was ignorant of the fact that chints was an old and proper name for the objectionable exotic insect, 'bug' being originally but a figurative (and perhaps a polite) term, 'an object of disgust and horror' (Wedgwood). Thus the case was exactly the opposite of what she chose to imagine; chints was the real name, bug the more or less affected euphonism.

1616. "In the night we were likewise very much disquieted with another sort, called Musquetoes, like our Gnats, but some-what less; and in that season we were very much troubled with Chinches, another sort of little troublesome and offensive creatures, like little Ticks: and these annoyed us two ways; as first by their biting and stinging, and then by their stink."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 372.

1645. "... for the most part the bedsteads in Italy are of forged iron gilded, since it is impossible to keepe the wooden ones from the chimices."—Evelyn's Diary, Sept. 29.

1673. "... Our Bodies broke out into small fiery Pimples . . . augmented by Musketoe-Bites, and Chinices raising Blisters on us."—Fryer, 35.

"Chints are venomous, and if squeezed leave a most Poysonous Stench."—Ibid. 189.

Chintz, s. A printed or spotted cotton cloth; Port. chita; Mahr. chit, and Hind. chînt. The word in this last form occurs (c. 1590) in the Ain-i-Akbari (p. 93). It comes apparently from the Sansk. chitra, 'variegated, speckled.' The best chintzes were bought on the Madras coast, at Masulipatam and Sadras.

The French form of the word is chite, which has suggested the possibility of our sheet being of the same origin. But chite is apparently of Indian origin, through the Portuguese, whilst sheet is much older than the Portuguese communication with India. Thus (1450) in Sir T. Cumberworth's will he directs his "wreched body to be beryd in a chitte with owte any kyste" (Academy, Sept. 27, 1879, p. 230). The resemblance to the Indian forms in this is very curious.

1614. "... chints and chadors . . ."—Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.

1653. "Chites en Indou signifie des toilles imprimées."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 536.

c. 1666. "Le principal trafic des Hollandois à Amedabad, est de chites, qui sont de toilles peintes."—Thevenot, v. 35.

In the English version (1687) this is written schites (iv., ch. v.).

1676. "Chites or Painted Calicuts, which they call Calmendar, that is done with a pencil, are made in the Kingdom of Golconda, and particularly about Masulipatam."—Tavernier, Eng. Tr., p. 126.

1725. "The returns that are injurious to our manufactures, or growth of our own country, are printed calicoes, chintz, wrought silks, stuffs, of herba, and barks."—Defoe, New Voyage round the World. Works, Oxford, 1840, p. 161.

1726. "The Warehouse Keeper reported to the Board, that the chintzes, being brought from painting, had been examined at the sorting godown, and that it was the general opinion that both the cloth and the paintings were worse than the musters."—In Wheeler, ii. 407.

c. 1733.

"No, let a charming chintz and Brussels lace Wrap my cold limbs, and shade my lifeless face."

Pope, Moral Essays, i. 248.

"And, when she sees her friend in deep despair, Observes how much a Chintz exceeds

Do. ii. 170.

1817. "Blue cloths, and chintzes in particular, have always formed an extensive article of import from Western India."—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 86.

In the earlier books about India some kind of chintz is often termed pintado (q. v.). See the phraseology in the quotation from Wheeler above.

This export from India to Europe has long ceased. When one of the present writers was Sub-Collector of the Madras District (1866—67), chintzes were still figured by an old man at Sadras, who had been taught by the Dutch, the cambric being furnished to him by a Madras chetty (q. v.). He is now dead, and the business has ceased; in fact the colours for the process are no longer to be had.* The former

* I leave this passage as Dr. Burnell wrote it. But though limited to a specific locality, of which I doubt not it was true, it conveys an idea of the entire extinction of the ancient chintz production which I find is not justified by the facts, as shown in a most interesting letter from Mr. Purdon Clarke, C.S.I., of the India Museum. One kind is still made at Masulipatam, under the superintendence of Persian merchants, to supply the Ispahan

chintz manufactures of Pulicat are mentioned by Correa, Lendas, ii. 2, p. 567. Havart (1693) mentions the manufacture at Sadras (i. 92), and gives a good description of the process of painting these cloths, which he calls chitsen (iii. 13). There is also a very complete account in the Lettres Édifiantes, xiv. 116 seqq.

In Java and Sumatra chintzes of a very peculiar kind of marbled pattern are still manufactured by women, under the name of bātik.

Chipe, s. In Portug. use, from Tamil shippi, 'an oyster.' The pearl-oysters taken in the pearl-fisheries of Tuticorin and Manār.

1685. "The chipe, for so they call those oysters which their boats are wont to fish."—Ribeiro, f. 63.

1710. "Some of these oysters or chepis, as the natives call them, produce pearls, but such are rare, the greater part producing only seed pearls (aljófres)."—Sousa, Oriente Conquist. ii. 243.

Chiretta, s.. Hind. chirātā, Mahr. kirātā. A Himalayan herbaceous plant of the order Gentianaceae (Swertia Chirata, Ham.; Ophelia Chirata, Griesbach; Gentiana Chirayita, Roxb.; Agathotes chirayita, Don.), the dried twigs of which, infused, afford a pure bitter tonic and febrifuge. Its Sansk. name kirāta-tikta, 'the bitter plant of the Kirātas,' refers its discovery to that people, an extensively diffused forest market and the "Moghul" traders at Bombay. At Pulicat very peculiar chintzes are made, which are entirely Kalam Kārī work, or hand-painted (apparently the word now used instead of the Cal-mendar of Tavernier,—see above, and under Calamander). This is a work of infinite labour, as the ground has to be stopped off with wax almost as many times as there are colours used. At Combaconum Sarungs (q. v.) are printed for the Straits. Very bold printing is done at Wāljāpēt in N. Arcot, for sale to the Moslem at Hyderabad and Bangalore.

An anecdote is told me by Mr. Clarke which indicates a caution as to more things than chintz printing. One particular kind of chintz met with in S. India, he was assured by the vendor, was printed at W—; but he did not recognize the locality. Shortly afterwards, visiting for the second time the city of X. (we will call it), where he had already been assured by the collector's native aids that there was no such manufacture, and showing the stuff, with the statement of its being made at W—, 'Why,' said the collector, 'that is where I live!' Immediately behind his bungalow was a small bazar, and in this the work was found going on, though on a small scale.

Just so we shall often find persons "who have been in India, and on the spot"—as asserting that at such and such a place there are no missions or no converts; whilst those who have cared to know, know better.—(H. Y.)

tribe, east and north-east of Bengal, the Kūṣṣābāu of the Periplus, and the people of the Kūṣṣādia of Ptolemy. There is no indication of its having been known to G. De Orta.

1820. "They also give a bitter decoction of the neem (Melia azadirachta) and chereeta."—Acc. of the Township of Lumy, in Trans. Lit. Soc. of Bombay, ii. 232.

1874. "Chiretta has long been held in esteem by the Hindus. . . . In England it began to attract some attention about 1829; and in 1839 was introduced into the Edinburgh Pharmacopoeia. The plant was first described by Roxburgh in 1814."—Hanbury and Flückiger, 392.

Chit and Chitty, s. A letter or note; also a certificate given to a servant, or the like; a pass. Hind. chittī; Mahr. chitti. The Indian Portuguese also use chito for escrito (Bluteau, Supplement). The Tamil people use shitt for a ticket, or for a playing card.

1673. "I sent one of our Guides, with his Master's Chitty, or Pass, to the Governor, who received it kindly."—Fryer, 126.

1785. ". . . Those Ladies or Gentlemen who wish to be taught that polite Art (drawing) by Mr. Hone, may know his terms by sending a Chit . . ."—In Seton-Karr, i. 114.

1786. "You are to sell rice, &c., to every merchant from Muscat who brings you a chitty from Meer Kāzim."—Tippoo's Letters, 284.

1794. "The petty but constant and universal manufacture of chits which prevails here."—Hugh Boyd, 147.

1829. "He wanted a chithee or note, for this is the most note-writing country under heaven; the very Drum-major writes me a note to tell me about the mails."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed., 80.

1839. "A thorough Madras lady . . . receives a number of morning visitors, takes up a little worsted work; goes to tiffin with Mrs. C., unless Mrs. D. comes to tiffin with her, and writes some dozen of chits. . . . These incessant chits are an immense trouble and interruption, but the ladies seem to like them."—Letters from Madras, 284.

Chitehky, s. A curried vegetable mixture, often served and eaten with meat curry. Properly, Hind. ch'hen-chkhā.

1875. ". . . Chhenchki, usually called tarkāri in the Vardhamāna District, a sort of hodge-podge consisting of potatoes, brinjals, and tender stalks . . ."—Govinda Samanta, i. 59.

Chittagong, n.p. A town, port, and district of Eastern Bengal, properly written Chatgārw. See Porto Grande.

Chittagong appears to be the City of Bengala of Varthema and some of the early Portuguese.

c. 1346. "The first city of Bengal that we entered was Sudkâwân, a great place situated on the shore of the great Sea."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 212.

1552. "In the mouths of the two arms of the Ganges enter two notable rivers, one on the east, and one on the west side, both bounding this kingdom (of Bengal); the one of these our people call the River of Chatigam, because it enters the Eastern estuary of the Ganges at a city of that name, which is the most famous and wealthy of that Kingdom, by reason of its Port, at which meets the traffic of all that Eastern region."—De Barros, Dec. IV. liv. ix. cap. i.

1591. "So also they inform me that Antonio de Sousa Goudinho has served me well in Bemqualla, and that he has made tributary to this state the Isle of Sundiva, and has taken the fortress of Chataguão by force of arms."—King's Letter, in Archivio Port. Orient., fasc. iii. 257.

c. 1610. Pyraud de la Val has Chartican, i. 234.

1727. "Chittagoung, or, as the Portuguese call it, Xatigam, about 50 Leagues below Dacca."—A. Ham. ii. 24.

17— "Chittigan" in Orme (reprint), ii. 14.

1736. "The province of Chatigan (vulgarly Chittagong) is a noble field for a naturalist. It is so called, I believe, from the chatag,† which is the most beautiful little bird I ever saw."—Sir W. Jones, ii. 101.

Elsewhere (p. 81) he calls it a "Montpelier." The derivation given by this illustrious scholar† is more than questionable. The name seems to be really a form of the Sanskrit Chaturgrâma (= Tetrapolis), and it is curious that near this position Ptolemy has a Pentapolis, very probably the same place.

Chittledroog, n.p. A fort S.W. of Bellary; properly Chitra Durgam,

* There is no reason to suppose that Linschoten had himself been to Chittagong. My friend, Dr. Burnell, in his (posthumous) edition of Linschoten for the Hakluyt Society, has confounded Chatigan in this passage with Satagan—see Porto Piqueno (H. Y.)

† The châtak which figures in Hindu poetry, is, according to the dictionaries, Cuculus melanoleucos, which must be the pied cuckoo, Coccyzus melanoleucos, Gm., in Jerdan; but this surely cannot be Sir William's "most beautiful little bird he ever saw"?

Red Hill (or Hill-Fort) called by the Mahommedans Chitaldury (C. P. B.).

Chittore, n.p. Chitôr, or Chitôragarh, a very ancient and famous rock fortress in the Rajput state of Mewâr. It is almost certainly the Tiâroupa of Ptolemy (vii. 1).

1533. "Badour (i.e., Bahâdur Shâh) . . . in Champanel . . . sent to carry off a quantity of powder and shot and stores for the attack on Chitor, which occasioned some delay because the distance was so great."—Correa, iii. 506.

1615. "The two and twentieth (Dec.), Master Edwards met me, accompanied with Thomas Coryat, who had passed into India on foote, fue course to Cytor, an ancient Citie ruined on a hill, but so that it appears a Tombe (Towne?) of wonderfull magnificence. . . ."—Sir Thomas Roe, in Purchas, i. 540.

Chobdar, s. Hind. from Pers. chob-dâr, 'a stick-bearer.' A frequent attendant of Indian nobles, and in former days of Anglo-Indian officials of rank. They are still a part of the state of the Viceroy, Governors, and Judges of the High Courts. The chob-dârs carry a staff overlaid with silver.

1442. "At the end of the hall stand tchobdars . . . drawn up in line."—Abdur-Razzak, in India in the XV. Cent. 25.

1673. "If he (the President) move out of his Chamber, the Silver Staves wait on him."—Fryer, 68.

1701. ". . . Yesterday, of his own accord, he told our Linguists that he had sent four Chobdars and 25 men, as a safeguard."—In Wheeler, i. 371.

1738. "Chubdar . . . Among the Nabobs he proclaims their praises aloud, as he runs before their palankeens."—Indian Vocabulary.

1793. "They said a Chubdar, with a silverstick, one of the Sultan's messengers of justice, had taken them from the place, where they were confined, to the public Bazar, where their hands were cut off."—Dirom, Narrative, 235.

1798. "The chief's Chobedar . . . also endeavoured to impress me with an ill opinion of these messengers."—G. Forster's Travels, i. 222.

1810. "While we were seated at breakfast, we were surprised by the entrance of a Choabdar, that is, a servant who attends on persons of consequence, runs before them with a silver stick, and keeps silence at the doors of their apartments, from which last office he derives his name."—Maria Graham, 57.

This usually accurate lady has been here misled, as if the word were chup-dâr, 'silence-keeper,' a hardly possible hybrid.

Choga, s. Turki Choghā. A long sleeved garment, like a dressing-gown (a purpose for which Europeans often make use of it). It is properly an Afghan form of dress, and is generally made of some soft woollen material, and embroidered on the sleeves and shoulders. In Bokhara the word is used for a furred robe.

1883. "We do not hear of 'shirt-sleeves' in connection with Henry (Lawrence), so often as in John's case; we believe his favourite dishabille was an Afghan choga, which like charity covered a multitude of sins."—Qu. Review, No. 310, on Life of Lord Lawrence, p. 303.

Chokidar, s. A watchman. Derivative in Persian form, from the preceding Hindi word. The word is usually applied to a private watchman; in some parts of India he is generally of a thieving tribe, and his employment may be regarded as a sort of black mail to ensure one's property.

1689. "And the Day following the Chocadars, or Souldiers, were remov'd from before our Gates."—Orington, 416.

1810. "The chokey-dar attends during the day, often performing many little offices, . . . at night parading about with his spear, shield, and sword, and assuming a most terrific aspect, until all the family are asleep; when HE GOES TO SLEEP TOO."—Williamson, V. M. i. 295.

c. 1817. "The birds were scarcely beginning to move in the branches of the trees, and there was not a servant excepting the chokedaurs, stirring about any house in the neighbourhood, it was so early."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, &c. (ed. 1873, 248).

1837. "Every village is under a potail, and there is a pursau or priest, and choukeednop (sic!) or watchman."—Phillips, Million of Facts, 320.

1864. The church book at Peshawar records the death there of "The Revd. I— L—, who on the night of the —th —, 1864, when walking in his veranda was shot by his own chokidar"—to which record the hand of an injudicious friend has added: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant!" (The exact words will now be found in the late Mr. E. B. Eastwick's Panjab Handbook, p. 279.)

Chokra, s. Hind. Chhokrā. 'A boy, a youngster;' and hence, more specifically, a boy employed about a household, or a regiment. Its chief use in S. India is with the latter. See Chuckaroo.

Choky, s. Hind. chaukī, which in all its senses is probably connected with Skt. chatur, 'four;' whence chatushka, 'of four,' 'four-sided,' &c. a. (Perhaps first a shed resting on four posts); a station of police; a lock-up; also a station of palankin bearers, horses, &c. when a post is laid; a customs or toll-station. The act of watching or guarding.

c. 1590. "Mounting guard is called in Hindi Chauki."—Ain, 257.

1608. "The Kings Custome called Chukey, is eight bagges upon the hundred bagges."—Saris in Purchas, i. 391.

1673. "We went out of the Walls by Brosch Gate . . . where, as at every gate, stands a Chooky, or Watch to receive Toll for the Emperor . . ."—Fryer, 100.

"And when they rest, if they have no tents, they must shelter themselves under Trees . . . unless they happen on a Chowkie, i. e., a Shed where the Customer keeps a Watch to take Custom."—Id. 410.

1682. "About 12 o'clock Noon we got to ye Chowkee, where after we had shown our Dustick and given our present, we were dismissed immediately."—Hedges, Dec. 17.

1774. "Il più difficile per viaggiare nell'Indostan sono certi posti di guardie chiamate Cioki . . . questi Cioki sono insolentissimi."—Della Tomba, 33.

1810. " . . . Chokies, or patrol stations."—Williamson, V. M., i. 297.

This word has passed into the English slang vocabulary in the sense of 'prison.'

b. A chair. This use is almost peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. Dr. John Muir cites it in this sense, as a Hindi word which has no resemblance to any Sanskrit vocable. Mr. Grouse, however, connects it with chatur, 'four' (Ind. Antiq., i. 105). See also beginning of this article.

Chau is the common form of 'four' in composition, e.g. chaubandi (i.e., 'four fastening') the complete shoeing of a horse; chaupahra ('four watches') all night long; chaupār, 'a quadruped'; chaukaṭ and chaukhaṭ ('four timber'), a frame (of a door, &c.). So chauki seems to have been used for a square-framed stool, and thence a chair.

1772. "Don't throw yourself back in your burra chokey, and tell me it won't do. . ."—W. Hastings to G. Vansittart in Gleig, i. 238.

Cholera, and Cholera Morbus, s. The Disease. The term 'cholera,' though employed by the old medical writers, no doubt came, as regards its familiar use, from India. Littré alleges that it is a mistake to suppose that the word cholera (χολέρα) is a derivative from χολή, 'bile,' and that it really means 'a gutter,' the disease being so called from the symptoms. This should, however, rather be ἀπό τῶν χολάδων, the latter word being anciently used for the intestines (the etym given by the medical writer, Alex. Trallianus). But there is a discussion on the subject in the modern ed. of Stephani Thesaurus, which indicates a conclusion that the derivation from χολή is probably right; it is that of Celsus (see below). For quotations and some particulars in reference to the history of this terrible disease, see under Mort-de-chien.

c. A.D. 20. "Primoque faciendamentio est cholere; quia commune id stomachi atque intestinorum vitium videri potest . . . intestina torquentur, bilis supra infraque erumpit, primum aque similis: deinde ut in ea recens caro tota esse videatur, interdum alba, nonnunquam nigra vel varia. Ergo eo nomine morbum hunc χολέραν Græci nominarunt. . . ." &c.

A. C. Celsi Med. Libri VIII. iv. xi.

c. A.D. 100. "ΠΕΡΙ ΧΟΛΕΡΗΣ. . . θάνατος ἐπὶδυνος καὶ οὐκίσιτος σπασμὸς καὶ πνυγὶ καὶ μέσῳ κενῷ."—Arætaeus, De Causis et signis acutorum morborum, ii. 5.

1563. "R. Is this disease the one which kills so quickly, and from which so few recover? Tell me how it is called among us, and among them, and its symptoms, and the treatment of it in use?"

"O. Among us it is called Collerica passio . . ."—Garcia, f. 74v.

1673. "The Diseases reign according to the Seasons. . . . In the extreme Heats, Cholera Morbus."—Fryer, 113-114.

1832. "Le Choléra Morbus, dont vous me parlez, n'est pas inconnu à Cachemire."—Jacquemont, Corresp., ii. 109.

Cholera Horn. See Collery.

Choola, s. Hind. chulhā, chulhī, chula, fr. Skt. chulli. The extemporized cooking-place of clay which a native of India makes on the ground, to prepare his own food; or to cook that of his master.

1814. "A marble corridor filled up with choolias, or cooking-places, composed of mud, cowdung, and unburnt bricks."—Forbes, O. M., iii. 120.

Choolia, s. Chūliā is a name given in Ceylon and in Malabar to a particular class of Mahomedans, and sometimes to Mahomedans generally. There is much obscurity about the origin and proper application of the term. According to Sonnerat (i. 109), the Chulias are of Arab descent, and of Shia profession.

c. 1345. ". . . . The city of Kaulam, which is one of the finest of Malibār. Its bazars are splendid, and its merchants are known by the name of Shūlia (i.e. Chūlia)." —Ibn Bat. iv. 99.

1754. "Chowlies are esteemed learned men, and in general are merchants."—Ives, 25.

1782. "We had found . . . less of that foolish timidity, and much more disposition to intercourse in the Cholians of the country, who are Mahomedans and quite distinct in their manners. . . ."—Hugh Boyd, Journal of an Embassy to Candy, in Misc. Works (1800), i. 155.

1783. "During Mr. Saunders's government I have known Chulia (Moors) vessels carry coco-nuts from the Nicobar Islands to Madras."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, p. v.

"Chulias and Malabars (the appellations are I believe synonymous)." —Ibid. 42.

1836. "Mr. Boyd . . . describes the Moors under the name of Cholias, and Sir Alexander Johnston designates them by the appellation Lubbies. These epithets are, however, not admissible, for the former is only confined to a particular sect among them, who are rather of an inferior grade; and the latter to the priests who officiate." —Cassie Chitty, in J. R. A. Soc., iii. 338.

1879. "There are over 15,000 Klings, Chuliahs, and other natives of India." —Bird, Golden Chersonese, 254.

Chop, s. Properly a seal-impression, stamp, or brand; Hind. chhāp; the verb (chhāpnā) being that which is now used in Hindustani to express the art of printing (books).

The word chhāp seems not to have been traced back with any certainty beyond the modern vernaculars. It has been thought possible (at least till the history should be more accurately traced) that it might be of Portuguese origin. For there is a Port. word chapa, 'a thin plate of metal,' which is no doubt the original of the old English chape for the metal plate on the sheath of a sword or dagger.* The word in this sense is not in the Portuguese Dictionaries; but we find "homem chapo," explained as 'a man of notable worth or excellence,' and Bluteau considers this a metaphor 'taken from the chapas or plates of metal on which the kings of India caused their letters patent to be engraved.' Thus he would seem to have regarded, though perhaps erroneously, the chhāpā and the Portuguese chapa as identical. On the other hand, Mr. Beames entertains no doubt that the word is genuine Hindi, and connects it with a variety of other words signifying striking, or pressing. And Thompson in his Hindi Dictionary says that chhāppā is a technical term used by the Vaishnavas to denote the sectarian marks (lotus, trident, &c.), which they delineate on their bodies. Fallon gives the same meaning, and quotes a Hindi verse, using it in this sense. We may add that Drummond (1808) gives chhāpaniā, chhapārā, as words for 'Stampers or Printers of Cloth' in Guzerati, and that the passage quoted below from a Treaty made with an ambassador from Guzerat by the Portuguese in 1537, uses the word chapada for struck or coined, exactly as the modern Hindi verb chhāpnā might be used.* Chop, in writers prior to this century, is often used for the seal itself. "Owen Cambridge says the Mohr was the great seal, but the small or privy seal was called a 'chop' or 'stamp'." (C. P. Brown).

* Thus, is Shakespeare, "This in Monsieur Parolles, the gallant militarist . . . that had the whole theorie of war in the knot of his scarf, the practice in the chape of his dagger."—All's Well that Ends Well, iv. 3. And, in the Scottish Rates and Valuations, under 1612:

"Lockkatts and Chapes for daggers."

The word chop is hardly used now among Anglo-Indians in the sense of seal or stamp. But it got a permanent footing in the 'Pigeon English' of the Chinese ports, and thence has come back to England and India, in the phrase "first-chop," i.e., of the first brand or quality.

The word chop (chāp) is adopted in Malay, and has acquired the specific sense of a passport or license. The word has also obtained a variety of applications, including that just mentioned, in the lingua franca of foreigners in the China seas. Van Braam applies it to a tablet bearing the Emperor's name, to which he and his fellow envoys made kotow on their first landing in China (Voyage, &c., Paris, An vi. (1798) i. 20—21). Again, in the same jargon, a chop of tea means a certain number of chests of tea, all bearing the same brand.* Chop-houses are customs stations on the Canton River, so called from the chops, or seals, used there.* Chop-dollar is a dollar chopped, or stamped with a private mark, as a guarantee of its genuineness.* (Dollars similarly stamped had currency in England in the first quarter of this century, and one of the present writers can recollect their occasional occurrence in Scotland in his childhood.) The grand chop is the port clearance granted by the Chinese customs when all dues have been paid.* All these have obviously the same origin; but there are other uses of the word in China not so easily explained, e.g. chop, for 'a hulk'; chop-boat for a lighter or cargo-boat.

In Captain Forrest's work, quoted below, a golden badge or decoration, conferred on him by the King of Achin, is called a chapp (p. 55). The portrait of Forrest, engraved by Sharp, shows this badge, and gives the inscription, translated: "Capt. Thomas Forrest, Orancayo (q.v.) of the Golden Sword. This chapp was conferred as a mark of honour in the city of Atcheen, belonging to the Faithful, by the hands of the Shabander (q.v.) of Atcheen, on Capt. Thomas Forrest."

1537. "And the said Nizamamede Zamom was present and then before me signed, and swore on his Koran (moçafó) to keep and maintain and fulfil this agreement entirely . . . and he sealed it with his seal" (e o chapo de sua chapa).—Treaty above quoted, in S. Botelho, Tombo, 228.

1552. " . . . ordered . . . that they should allow no person to enter or to leave the island without taking away his chapa. . . . And this chapa was, as it were, a seal."—Castanheda, iii. 32.

1614. "The King (of Achen) sent us his Chop."—Milward, in Purchas, i. 526.

1615. "Sailed to Acheen; the King sent his Chope for them to go ashore, without which it was unlawful for any one to do so."—Sainsbury, i. 445.

1618. "Signed with my chop, the 14th day of May (sic), in the Yeare of our Prophet Mahomet 1027."—Letter from Gov. of Mocha, in Purchas, i. 625.

1673. "The Custom-house has a good Front, where the chief Customer appears certain Hours to chop, that is to mark Goods outward-bound."—Fryer, 98.

1689. “Upon their Chops as they call them in India, or Seals engraven, are only Characters, generally those of their Name.”—Ovington, 251.

1711. “This (Oath, at Acheen) is administered by the Shabander . . . lifting, very respectfully, a short Dagger in a Gold Case, like a Scepter, three times to their Heads; and it is called receiving the Chop for Trade.”—Lockyer, 35.

1715. “It would be very proper also to put our chop on the said Books.”—In Wheeler, ii. 224.

1727. “On my Arrival (at Acheen) I took the Chap at the great River's Mouth, according to Custom. This Chap is a Piece of Silver about 8 ounces Weight, made in Form of a Cross, but the cross Part is very short, that we . . . put to our Fore-head, and declare to the Officer that brings the Chap, that we come on an honest Design to trade.”—*A. 1782. “. . . le Pilote . . . apporte avec lui leur chappe, ensuite il adore et consulte son Poussa, puis il fait lever l'ancre.”—Sonnerat, ii. 233.

1783. “The bales (at Acheen) are immediately opened; 12 in the hundred are taken for the King's duty, and the remainder being marked with a certain mark (chapp) may be carried where the owner pleases.”—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 41.

1785. “The only pretended original produced was a manifest forgery, for it had not the chop or smaller seal, on which is engraved the name of the Mogul.”—Carraccioli's Clive, i. 214.

1817. “. . . so great reluctance did he (the Nabob) show to the ratification of the Treaty, that Mr. Pigot is said to have seized his chop, or seal, and applied it to the paper.”—Mill's Hist., iii. 340.

1876. “‘First chop! tremendously pretty too,’ said the elegant Grecian, who had been paying her assiduous attention.”—Daniel de Ronda, Bk. I. ch. x.

1882. “On the edge of the river facing the ‘Pow-shan’ and the Creek Honges, were Chop houses, or branches of the Hoppo's department, whose duty it was to prevent smuggling, but whose interest it was to aid and facilitate the shipping of silks . . . at a considerable reduction on the Imperial tariff.”—The Fankwaie at Canton, p. 25.

The writer last quoted, and others before him, have imagined a Chinese origin for chop, e.g., as “from chah, ‘an official note from a superior’ or chah, ‘a contract, a diploma, &c.,’ both having at Canton the sound chüp, and between them covering most of the ‘pigeon’ uses of chop” (Note by Bishop Moule). But few of the words used by Europeans in Chinese trade are really Chinese, and we think it has been made clear that chop comes from India.

Chop-chop. Pigeon-English (or -Chinese) for ‘Make haste! look sharp!’ This is supposed to be from the Cantonese, pron. káp-káp, of what is in the Mandarin dialect kíp-kíp. In the Northern dialects kwai-kwai, ‘quick-quick,’ is more usual (Bishop Moule).

Chopper, s. Hind. chhappar, ‘a thatched roof.’

1780. “About 20 Days ago a Villian was detected here setting fire to Houses by throwing the Tickeea * of his Hooka on the Choppers, and was immediately committed to the Phouadar's Frison. . . . On his tryal . . . it appering that he had more than once before committed the same Nefarious and abominable Crime, he was sentenced to have his left Hand, and right Foot cut off. . . . It is needless to expatiate on the Efficacy such exemplary Punishments would be of to the Publick in general, if adopted on all similar occasions. . . .”—Letter from Moorsheadabad, in Hicky's Bengal Gazette, May 6th.

1782. “With Mr. Francis came the Judges of the Supreme Court, the Laws of England, partial oppression, and licentious liberty. The common felons were cast loose, . . . the merchants of the place told that they need not pay duties . . . and the natives were made to know that they might erect their chapper huts in what part of the town they pleased.”—Price, Some Observations, 61.

1810. “Chuppers, or grass thatches.”—Williamson, V. M., i. 510.

c. 1817. “These cottages had neat choppers, and some of them wanted not small gardens, fitly fenced about.”—Mrs. Sherwood, Stories, ed. 1873, 258.

Chopper-cot, s. Much as this looks like a European concoction, it is a genuine Hind. term, chhappar khāt, ‘a bedstead with curtains.’

1778. “Leito com armação. Châpâr cátt.”—Grammatica Indostana, 128.

c. 1809. “Bedsteads are much more common than in Puraniya. The best are called Palang, or Chhappar Khat. . . . they have curtains, mattresses, pillows, and a sheet . . . .”—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 92.

c. 1817. “My husband chanced to light upon a very pretty chopper-cot, with curtains and everything complete."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, ed. 1873, 161. See Cot.

Chopsticks, s. The sticks used in pairs by the Chinese in feeding themselves. The Chinese name of the article is 'kwai-tsz,' 'speedy-ones,' "Possibly the inventor of the present word, hearing that the Chinese name had this meaning, and accustomed to the phrase chop-chop for 'speedily,' used chop as a translation" (Bishop Moule).

c. 1540. "... his young daughters, with their brother, did nothing but laugh to see us feed ourselves with our hands, for that is contrary to the custome which is observed throughout the whole empire of China, where the Inhabitants at their meat carry it to their mouths with two little sticks made like a pair of Cizers" (this is the translator's folly; it is really com duos paos feitos como fusos—"like spindles").—Pinto orig. cap. lxxxiii., in Cogan, p. 103.

c. 1610. "... ont comme deux petites spatules de bois fort bien faites, qu'ils tiennent entre leurs doigts, et prennent avec cela ce qu'ils veulent manger, si dextrement que rien plus."—Mocquet, 346.

1711. "They take it very dexterously with a couple of small Chopsticks, which serve them instead of Forks."—Lockyer, 174.

1876. "Before each there will be found a pair of chopsticks, a wine-cup, a small saucer for soy . . . and a pile of small pieces of paper for cleaning these articles as required."—Giles, Chinese Sketches, 153-4.

Chota-hazry, s. Hind. Chhotā-hāzrī, 'little breakfast;' refreshment taken in the early morning, before or after the morning exercise. The term (v. hazry) was originally peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. In Madras the meal is called 'early tea.' Among the Dutch in Java, this meal consists (or did consist in 1860) of a large cup of tea, and a large piece of cheese, presented by the servant who calls one in the morning.

1853. "After a bath, and hasty ante-breakfast (which is called in India 'a little breakfast') at the Euston Hotel, he proceeded to the private residence of a man of law."—Oakfield, ii. 179.

1866. "There is one small meal . . . it is that commonly known in India by the Hindustani name of chota-hāzrī, and in our English colonies as 'Early Tea' . . ."—Waring, Tropical Resident, 172.

1875. "We took early tea with him this morning."—The Dilemma, ch. iii.

Choul, Chaul, n.p. A seaport of the Concan, famous for many centuries under various forms of this name, Chenwal properly, and pronounced in Konkani Tseñwal.* It may be regarded as almost certain that this was the Σίμυλλα of Ptolemy's Tables, called by the natives, as he says, Τίμουλα. It may be fairly conjectured that the true reading of this was Τίμουλα, or Τέμουλα. We find the sound ch of Indian names apparently represented in Ptolemy by τ (as it is in Dutch by tj). Thus Τιάτρουρα = Chitor, Τιάστρανς = Chashṭana; here Τίμουλα = Chenwal; whilst Τιάγουρα and Τιάύσπα probably stand for names like Chagura and Chauspa. Still more confidently Chenwal may be identified with the Saimur (Chaimur) or Jaimur of the old Arab Geographers, a port at the extreme end of Lār or Guzerat.

At Choul itself there is a tradition that its antiquity as a harbour goes back beyond that of Suali (see Swally), Bassein, or Bombay. There were memorable sieges of Choul in 1570-71, and again in 1594, in which the Portuguese successfully resisted Mahomedan attempts to capture the place.

Dr. Burgess identifies the ancient Σίμυλλα rather with a place called Chembur, on the island of Trombay, which lies immediately east of the island of Bombay; but till more evidence is adduced we see no reason to adopt this†.

Choul seems now to be known as Revadanda. Even the name is not to be found in the Imperial Gazetteer. Revadanda has a place in that work, but without a word to indicate its connexion with this ancient and famous port.

Mr. Gerson d'Acunha has published in the J. Bo. Br. As. Soc., vol. xii., Notes on H. and Ant. of Chaul.

1546. Under this year D'Acunha quotes from Freire d'Andrada a story that when the Viceroy required 20,000 pardaos (q. v.) to send for the defence of Diu, offering in pledge a wisp of his mustachio, the women of Choul sent all their earrings and other jewellery, to be applied to this particular service.

Choultry, s. Peculiar to S. India, and of doubtful etymology; Malayāl. chāwaṭṭi, Tel. chāwaḍi. In W. India the form used is chowry or chowree (Dakh. chāorī). A hall, a shed, or a simple loggia, used by travellers as a resting-place, and also intended for the transaction of public business. In the old Madras Archives there is frequent mention of the "Justices of the Choultry." A building of this kind seems to have formed the early Court-house.

Choultry Plain, n.p. This was the name given to the open country formerly existing to the S. W. of Madras. "Choultry Plain" was also the old designation of the Hd. Quarters of the Madras Army; equivalent to "Horse Guards" in Westminster (C. P. B. MS.).

1780. "Every gentleman now possessing a house in the fort, was happy in accommodating the family of his friend, who before had resided in Choultry Plain. Note. The country near Madras is a perfect flat, on which is built, at a small distance from the fort, a small choultry."—Hodgcs, Travels, 7.

Chouse, s. and v. This word is originally Turk. chāūsh, in former days a sergeant-at-arms, herald, or the like. Its meaning as 'a cheat' or 'to swindle' is, apparently beyond doubt, derived from the anecdote thus related in a note of W. Gifford's upon the passage in Ben Jonson's Alchemist, which is quoted below. "In 1609 Sir Robert Shirley sent a messenger or chiaus (as our old writers call him) to this country, as his agent, from the Grand Signor and the Sophy, to transact some preparatory business. Sir Robert followed him, at his leisure, as ambassador from both these princes; but before he reached England, his agent had chiaused the Turkish and Persian merchants here of 4000*l.*, and taken his flight, unconscious perhaps that he had enriched the language with a word of which the etymology would mislead Upton and puzzle Dr. Johnson."—Ed. of Ben Jonson, iv. 27.

1560. "Cum vero me taederet inclusionis in eodem diversorio, ago cum meo *Chiaus*o (genus id est, ut tibi scripsi alias, multiplicis apud Turcas officii, quod etiam ad oratorium custodiam extenditur) ut mihi liceat aere meo domum conducere. . . ."—Busbeq. Epist. iii. p. 149.

1610. "Dapper. . . . What do you think of me, that I am a chiaus?

1826. "We started at break of day from the northern suburb of Ispahan, led by the chaushes of the pilgrimage. . . ."—Haji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 6.

Chow-chow, s. A common application of this Pigeon-English term in China is to mixed preserves; but, as the quotation shows, it has many uses; the idea of mixture seems to prevail. It is the name given to a book by Viscountess Falkland, whose husband was Governor of Bombay. There it seems to mean 'a medley of trifles.' Chow is in 'pigeon' applied to food of any kind.

1858. "The word chow-chow is suggestive, especially to the Indian reader, of a mixture of things, 'good, bad, and indifferent,' of sweet little oranges and bits of bamboo stick, slices of sugar-cane and rinds of unripe fruit, all concocted together, and made upon the whole into a very tolerable confection . . . ."

"Lady Falkland, by her happy selection of a name, to a certain extent deprecates and disarms criticism. We cannot complain that her work is without plan, unconnected, and sometimes trashy, for these are exactly the conditions implied in the word chow-chow."—Bombay Quarterly Review, January, p. 100.

1882. "The variety of uses to which the compound word 'chow-chow' is put is almost endless . . . . A 'No. 1 chow-chow' thing signifies utterly worthless, but when applied to a breakfast or dinner it means 'unexceptionably good.' A 'chow-chow' cargo is an assorted cargo; a 'general shop' is a 'chow-chow' shop . . . . one (factory) was called the 'chow-chow,' from its being inhabited by divers Parsees, Moormen, or other natives of India."—The Fankwa, p. 63.

Chowdry, s. Hind. Chaudhari, lit. 'a holder of four;' the explanation of which is obscure. The usual application of the term is to the headman of a craft in a town; formerly, in places, to the headman of a village; to certain holders of lands; and in Uttack it was, under native rule, applied to a district Revenue officer.

c. 1300. ". . . The people were brought to such a state of obedience that one revenue officer would string twenty . . . . chaud- harris together by the neck, and enforce payment by blows."—Ziā-ud-dīn Barnī in Elliot, iii. 183.

c. 1343. "The territories dependant on the capital (Dehli) are divided into hundreds, each of which has a Janthari, who is the Sheikh or chief man of the Hindus."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 388.

1788. "Chowdry.—A Landholder or Farmer. Properly he is above the Zemindar in rank; but, according to the present custom of Bengal, he is deemed the next to the Zemindar. Most commonly used as the principal purveyor of the markets in towns or camps."—Indian Vocabulary.

Chowk, s. Hind. Chauk. An open place or wide street in the middle of a city where the market is held. It seems to be adopted in Persian, and there is an Arabic form Sūk, which, it is just possible, may have been borrowed and Arabized from the present word. The radical idea of chauk seems to be "four ways," the crossing of streets at the centre of business. Compare the Quattro Cantoni of Palermo. In that same city there is a market place called Piazza Ballarò, which in the 16th century a chronicler calls Seggeballarath, or as Amari interprets, Sūk-Balharā.

Chowringhee, n. p. The name of a road and quarter of Calcutta, in which most of the best European houses stand; Chaurangī.

1789. "The houses . . . at Chowringee also will be much more healthy."—Seton-Karr, ii. 203.

1790. "To dig a large tank opposite to the Cheringhee Buildings."—Id. 13.

1791. "Whereas a robbery was committed on Tuesday night, the first instant, on the Chowringhy Road."—Id. 54.

Chowry, s.

(a.) See Choultry.

(b.) Hind. chanwar, chawirī, and chawīrī; from Skt. chamara, and chā-mara. The bushy tail of the Tibetan Yak (q.v.), often set in a costly decorated handle to use as a fly-flapper, in which form it was one of the insignia of ancient Asiatic royalty. The tail was often also attached to the horse-trappings of native warriors; whilst it formed from remote times the standard of nations and nomad tribes of Central Asia.

The Yak-tails and their uses are mentioned by Aelian, and by Cosmas (see under Yak). Allusions to the chāmara, a sign of royalty, are frequent in Skt. books and inscriptions, e.g. in the Poet Kalidāsa (see transl. by Dr. Mill in J. As. Soc. Beng. i. 342; the Amarakosha, ii. 7, 31, &c.).

The common Anglo-Indian expression in last century appears to have been "cow-tails" (q.v.). And hence Bogle in his Journal, as published by Mr. Markham, calls Yaks by the absurd name of "cow-tailed cows," though "horse-tailed cows" would have been more germane!

c. A.D. 250. "Βοῶν δὲ γένη δύο, δρομικούς τε καὶ ἄλλους ἀγρίους δεινῶς ἐκ τούτων γὰρ τῶν βοῶν καὶ τὰς μυιοστέβας ποιοῦνται, καὶ τὸ μὲν σῶμα παρμῆλινες εἰσιν οἷοι· τὰς δὲ οὐράς ἔχουσι λευκὰς ἰσχυρῶς."—Aelian. de Nat. An. xv. 14.

c. 940. "They export from this country the hair named al-zamar (or al-chamar) of which those fly-flaps are made, with handles of silver or ivory, which attendants held over the heads of kings when giving audience."—Mas'ūdī, i. 385.

The expressions of Mas'ūdī are aptly illustrated by the Assyrian and Persepolitan sculptures.

1774. "The Deb-Rajah on horseback . . . a chowra-burdar on each side of him."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 24.

Chowt or Chout, s. Mahr. chauth, 'one fourth part.' The black-mail levied by the Mahrattas from the provincial governors as compensation for leaving their districts in immunity from plunder. The term is also applied to some other exactions of like ratio (see Wilson).

1644. "This King holds in our lands of Daman a certain payment which they call Chouto, which was paid him long before they belonged to the Portuguese, and so after they came under our power the payment continued to be made, and about these exactions and payments there have risen great disputes and contentions on one side and another."—Bocarro (MS.).

1674. "Messengers were sent to Bassein demanding the chout of all the Portuguese territory in these parts. The chout means the fourth part of the revenue, and this is the earliest mention we find of the claim."—Orme's Fragments, p. 45.

1763-78. "They (the English) were . . . not a little surprised to find in the letters now received from Balajerow and his agent to themselves, and in stronger terms to the Nabob, a peremptory demand of the Chout or tribute due to the King of the Morattoes from the Nabobship of Arcot."—Orme, ii. 228-9.

1803. "The Peshwah . . . cannot have a right to two choutes, any more than to two revenues from any village in the same year."—Wellington Desp. (ed. 1837), ii. 175.

1858. ". . . They (the Mahrattas) were accustomed to demand of the provinces they threatened with devastation a certain portion of the public revenue, generally the fourth part; and this, under the name of the chout, became the recognized Mahratta tribute, the price of the absence of their plundering hordes."—Whitney, Oriental and Ling. Studies, ii. 20-21.

Choya, Chaya, or Chey, s. A root (Hedyotis umbellata, Lam., Oldenlandia umb., L.) of the Nat. Ord. Cinchonaceae, affording a red dye, sometimes called 'Indian Madder'; from Tam. shāya. It is exported from S. India, and was so also at one time from Ceylon. There is a figure of the plant in Lettres Edif. xiv. 164.

c. 1566. "Also from S. Tome they layd great store of red yarne, of bombast died with a roote which they call saia, as aforesayd, which colour will never out."—Caesar Frederike, in Hak.

1672. "Here groweth very good Zaye."—Baldaeus, Ceylon.

1726. "Saya (a dye-root that is used on the Coast for painting chintzes)."—Valentijn, Chor. 45.

1727. "The Islands of Diu (near Masulipatam) produce the famous Dye called shaii. It is a Shrub growing in Grounds that are overflown with the Spring tides."—A. Ham, i. 370.

1860. "The other productions that constituted the exports of the Island were sapan-wood to Persia; and choya-roots, a substitute for Madder, collected at Manaar . . . for transmission to Surat."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 54-55. See also Chetty's Ceylon Gazetteer (1834), p. 40.

Chuckaroo, s. English soldier's lingo for Chokra, q.v.

Chucker. From Hind. chakar and chaker, Skt. chakra, a wheel or circle.

(a) s. A quoit for playing the English game. But more properly the sharp quoit or discus which constituted an ancient Hindu missile weapon, and is, or was till recently, carried by the Sikh fanatics called Ākhāṭ, generally encircling their peaked turbans. The thing is described by Tavernier (E. T. ii. 41) as carried by a company of Mahomedan Fakirs whom he met at Sherpūr in Guzerat.

1516. "In the Kingdom of Dely . . . they have some steel wheels which they call chacarani, two fingers broad, sharp outside like knives, and without edge inside; and the surface of these is the size of a small plate. And they carry seven or eight of these each, put on the left arm; and they take one and put it on the finger of the right hand, and make it spin round many times, and so they hurl it at their enemies."—Barbosa, 100-101.

1630. "In her right hand shee bare a chuckerey, which is an instrument of a round forme, and sharp edged in the superficies thereof . . . and slung off, in the quicknesse of his motion, it is able to deliuer or conuey death to a farre remote enemy."—Lord, Discov. of the Banian Religion, 12.

(b) v. and s. To lunge a horse. Hind. chakarnā or chakar karnā. Also, 'the lunge.'

1829. "It was truly tantalizing to see those fellows chuckering their horses, not more than a quarter of a mile from our post."—John Shipp, i. 153.

Chuckerbutty, n.p. This vulgarized Bengali Brahmin family name is, as Wilson points out, a corruption of chakravartī, the title assumed by the most exalted ancient Hindu sovereigns, an universal Emperor, whose chariot wheels rolled over all (so it is explained by some).

c. 400. Then the Bikhshuni Uthala began to think thus with herself, 'To-day the King, ministers, and people are all going to meet Buddha. . . . but I—a woman—how can I contrive to get the first sight of him?' Buddha immediately, by his divine power, changed her into a holy Chakravartī Raja."—Travels of Fah-hian, tr. by Beale, p. 63.

c. 460. "On a certain day (Asoka), having . . . ascertained that the supernaturally gifted. . . Nāga King, whose age extended to a Kappo, had seen the four Buddhas . . . he thus addressed him: 'Beloved, exhibit to me the person of the omniscient being of infinite wisdom, the Chakkawatti of the doctrine."—The Mahawanso, p. 27.

1856. "The importance attached to the possession of a white elephant is traceable to the Buddhist system. A white elephant of certain wonderful endowments is one of the seven precious things, the possession of which marks the Maha Chakravartti Raja . . . the holy and universal sovereign, a character who appears once in a cycle."—Mission to the Court of Ava (Major Phayre's), 1858, p. 154.

Chuckler, s. Tamil and Malayāl. shakkili, the name of a very low caste, members of which are tanners or cobblers, like the Chamārs (see Chumar) of Upper India. But whilst the latter are reputed to be a very dark caste, the Chucklers are fair (see Elliot's Glos. by Beames, i. 71, and Caldwell's Gram. 574). Colloquially in S. India Chuckler is used for a native shoemaker.

c. 1580. "All the Gentoos (Gentios) of those parts, especially those of Bisnaga, have many castes, which take precedence one of another. The lowest are the Chaquivilis, who make shoes, and eat all unclean flesh. . . ."—Primor e Honra, &c., f. 95.

1759. "Shackelays are shoemakers, and held in the same despicable light on the Coromandel Coast as the Niades and Pulies on the Malabar."—Ives, 26.

1869. "The Komatīs or mercantile caste of Madras, by long established custom, are required to send an offering of betel to the chucklers, or shoemakers, before contracting their marriages."—Sir W. Elliot, in J. Ethn. Soc., N. S., vol. i. 102.

Chuckrum, s. An ancient coin once generally current in the S. of India, Malayāl. chakram, Telug. chakramu; from Sansk. chakra (see under Chucker). It is not easy to say what was its value, as the statements are inconsistent; nor do they confirm Wilson's, that it was equal to one-tenth of a pagoda. The denomination survives in Travancore.

1554. "And the fanoms of the place are called chocorões, which are coins of inferior gold; they are worth 12½ or 12¾ to the pardao of gold, reckoning the pardao at 360 reis."—A. Nunez, Livro dos Pesos, 36.

1711. "The Enemy will not come to any agreement unless we consent to pay 30,000 chuckrums, which we take to be 16,600 and odd pagodas."—In Wheeler, ii. 165.

1813. Milburn, under Tanjore, gives the chuckrum as a coin equal to 20 Madras, or 10 gold fanams. 20 Madras fanams would be ½ of a pagoda.

Chudder, s. Hind. chadar, a sheet, or square piece of cloth of any kind; the ample sheet commonly worn as a mantle by women in Bengal. It is also applied to the cloths spread over Mahomedan tombs.

1516 and 1598. Barbosa and Linschoten have chautars, chautares, as a kind of cotton piece-goods, but it is certain that this is not the same word. Choutars occur among Bengal piece-goods in Milburn, ii. 221.

1525. "Chader of Cambaya."—Lembranca, 56.

1614. "Pintados, chints and chadors."—Peyton in Purchas, i. 530.

1832. "Chuddur . . . a large piece of cloth or sheet, of one and a half or two breadths, thrown over the head, so as to cover the whole body. Men usually sleep rolled up in it."—Herklots, Quanoon-e-Islam, xii.—xiii.

1878. "Two or three women, who had been chattering away till we appeared, but who, on seeing us, drew their 'chadders' . . . round their faces, and retired to the further end of the boat."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 79.

—, Rampore. A kind of shawl, of the Tibetan shawl-wool, of uniform colour without pattern, made originally at Rampur on the Sutlej; and of late years largely imported into England.

Chumpuk, s. A highly ornamental and sacred tree (Michelia champaca, L., also M. Rheedii), a kind of magnolia, whose odorous yellow blossoms are much prized by Hindus, offered at shrines, and rubbed on the body at marriages, &c. Hind. champak, Skt. champaka. Drury strangely says that the name is "derived from Ciampa, an island between Cambogia and Cochin China, where the tree grows." Champa is not an island, and certainly derived its Sanskrit name from India, and did not give a name to an Indian tree. The tree is found wild in the Himalaya from Nepāl, eastward; also in Pegu and Tenasserim, and along the Ghauts to Travancore.

1623. "Among others they showed me a flower, in size and form not unlike our lily, but of a yellowish white colour, with a sweet and powerful scent, and which they call champā."—P. della Valle, ii. 517.

1786. "The walks are scented with blossoms of the champak and nagisar, and the plantations of pepper and coffee are equally new and pleasing."—Sir W. Jones, in Mem. &c., ii. 81.

1810. "Some of these (birds) build in the sweet-scented champaka and the mango."—Maria Graham, 22.

"The wandering airs they faint
On the dark, the silent stream;
And the chumpak's odours fail
Like sweet thoughts in a dream."

1821.

"Some chumpak flowers proclaim
Medwin, Sketches in Hindoostan, 73.

Chunám, s. Prepared lime; also specially used for fine polished plaster. Forms of this word occur both in Dravidian languages and in Hind. In the latter chānā is from Skt. chūrṇa, 'powder'; in the former it is somewhat uncertain whether the word is, or is not, an old derivative from Sanskrit. In the first of the following quotations the word used seems taken from the Malayāl. form chuṇṇāmba.

1510. "And they also eat with the said leaves (betel) a certain lime made from oyster shells, which they call cionama."—Varthema, 144.

1563. "... so that all the names you meet with that are not Portuguese are Malabar; such as betre (betel), chuna, which is lime. . . ."—Garcia, f. 37g.

c. 1610. "... l'un porte son éventail, l'autre la boîte d'argent pleine de betel, l'autre une boîte ou il y a du chunan, qui est de la chaux."—Pyrrard de la Val, ii. 84.

1614. "Having burnt the great idol into chunah, he mixed the powdered lime with pān leaves, and gave it to the Rājputs that they might eat the objects of their worship."—Firishta, quoted by Quatremère, Not. et Ext., xiv. 510.

1673. "The Natives chew it (Betel) with Chinam (Lime of calcined Oyster Shells)."—Fryer, 40.

1687. "That stores of Brick, Iron, Stones, and Chenam be in readiness to make up any breach."—Madras Consultations, in Wheeler, i. 168.

1689. "Chinam is Lime made of Cockle-shells, or Lime-stone; and Pawn is the Leaf of a Tree."—Ovington, 123.

1750-60. "The flooring is generally composed of a kind of loam or stucco, called chunam, being a lime made of burnt shells."—Grose, i. 52.

1763. "In the Chuckleh of Silet for the space of five years . . . my phoasdar and the Company's gomastah shall jointly prepare chunam, of which each shall defray all expenses, and half the chunam so made shall be given to the Company, and the other half shall be for my use."—Treaty of Mir Jafir with the Company, in Carraccioli's L. of Olive, i. 64.

1809. "The row of chunam pillars which supported each side . . . were of a shining white."—Ld. Valentia, i. 61.

—, To, v. To set in mortar; or, more frequently, to plaster over with chunam.

1687. "... To get what great jars he can, to put wheat in, and chenam them up, and set them round the fort curtain."—In Wheeler, i. 168.

1809. "... having one . . . room . . . beautifully chunammed."—Ld. Valentia, i. 386.

Both noun and verb are used also in the Anglo-Chinese settlements.

Chupatty, s. Hind. chapāṭi, an unleavened cake of bread (generally of coarse wheaten meal), patted flat with the hand, and baked upon a griddle; the usual form of native bread, and the staple food of Upper India.

1615. Parson Terry well describes the thing, but names it not: "The ordinary sort of people eat bread made of a coarse grain, but both toothsome and wholesome and hearty. They make it up in broad cakes, thick like our oaten cakes; and then bake it upon small round iron hearths which they carry with them."—In Purchas, ii. 1468.

1810. "Chow-patties, or bannocks."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 348.

1857. "From village to village brought by one messenger and sent onward by another passed a mysterious token in the shape of one of those flat cakes made from flour and water, and forming the common bread of the people, which, in their language, are called chupatties."—Kaye's Sepoy War, i. 570.

There is a tradition of a noble and gallant Governor-General who, when compelled to rough it for a day or two, acknowledged that "chuprassies and musaulchies were not such bad diet," meaning chupatties and musāla (q.v.).

Chupkun, s. Hind. chapkan. The long frock (or cassock) which is the usual dress in Upper India of nearly all male natives who are not actual labourers or indigent persons. The word is probably of Turki or Mongol origin, and is perhaps identical with the chakman of the Ain (p. 90), a word still used in Turkestan. Hence Beames's connexion of chapkan with the idea of chap as meaning compressing or clinging, "a tightly-fitting coat or cassock," is a little fanciful (Comp. Gram. i. 212, 213). Still this idea may have shaped the corruption of a foreign word.

1883. "He was, I was going to say, in his shirt-sleeves, only I am not sure that he wore a shirt in those days—I think he had a chupkun, or native under-garment."—C. Raikes, in L. of L. Lawrence, i. 59.

Chupra, n.p. Chaprā, a town and head-quarter station of the District Sāran in Bahār, on the north bank of the Ganges.

1726. "Sjoppera (Chupra)."—Valentijn, Chorom., dc., 147.

Chuprassy, s. Hind. chaprāsī, the bearer of a chaprās, i.e. a badge-plate inscribed with the name of the office to which the bearer is attached. The chaprāsī is an office-messenger, or henchman, bearing such a badge on a cloth belt. The term belongs to the Bengal Presidency. In Madras Peon (q.v.) is the usual term; and in Bombay Puttywala (Hind. paṭṭiwālā) or "man of the belt." The etymology of chaprās is obscure; but see Beames, Comp. Gram. i. 212. This writer gives buckle as the original meaning.

1865. "I remember the days when every servant in my house was a chuprassee, with the exception of the Khansaumaun and a Portuguese Ayah."—The Dak Bungalow, p. 389.

c. 1866.

"The big Sahib's tent has gone from under the Peepul tree,

With his horde of hungry chuprassees, and oily sons of the quill—

I paid them the bribe they wanted, and Sheitan will settle the bill."

A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

1877. "One of my chuprassies or messengers . . . was badly wounded."—Meadows Taylor, Life, i. 227.

1880. "Through this refractory medium the people of India see their rulers. The Chuprassie paints his master in colours drawn from his own black heart. Every lie he tells, every insinuation he throws out, every demand he makes, is indorsed with his master's name. He is the arch-slenderer of our name in India."—Alb Baba, 102-3.

Churr, s. Hind. char. "A sand-bank or island in the current of a river, deposited by the water, claims to which were regulated by the Bengal Reg. xi. 1825" (Wilson).

A char is new alluvial land deposited by the great rivers as the floods are sinking, and covered with grass, but not necessarily insulated.

It is remarkable that Mr. Marsh mentions a very similar word as used for the same thing in Holland, "New sandbank land, covered with grasses, is called in Zeeland schor" (Man and Nature, p. 339). The etymologies are, however, probably quite apart.

1878. "In the dry season all the various streams . . . are merely silver threads winding among innumerable sandy islands, the soil of which is especially adapted for the growth of Indigo. They are called Churs."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 3-4.

Churruck, s. A wheel, or any rotating machine; particularly applied to simple machines for cleaning cotton. Pers. churlikh, 'the celestial sphere,' 'a wheel of any kind, &c.' Beng. charak is apparently a corruption of the Persian word, facilitated by the nearness of the Sansk. chakra, &c.

— Poojah. Beng. Charak-pājā (see Poojah). The Swinging Festival of the Hindus, held on the sun's entrance into Aries. The performer is suspended from a long yard, traversing round on a mast, by hooks passed through the muscle over the blade-bones, and then whirled round so as to fly out centrifugally. The chief seat of this barbarous display is, or latterly was, in Bengal, but it was formerly prevalent in many parts of India. There is an old description in Purchas's Pilgrimage, p. 1000; also (in Malabar) in A. Hamilton, i. 270; and (at Calcutta) in Heber's Journal, quoted below.

1824. "The Hindoo Festival of 'Churruck Poojah' commenced to-day, of which, as my wife has given an account in her journal, I shall only add a few particulars."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 57.

Churrus, a. s. Hind. charas. The resinous exudation of the hemp-plant (Cannabis Indica), which is the basis of intoxicating preparations (see Bang and Gunja).

b. Hind. charas. A simple apparatus worked by oxen for drawing water from a well, and discharging it into irrigation channels by means of pulley ropes, and a large bag of hide (Hind. charsā, a hide; Skt. charma).

Chutkarry, s. (S. India). A half-caste; Tam. shatti-kar, 'one who wears a waist-coat' (C. P. B.).

Chutny, s. Hind. chaṭnū. A kind of strong relish, made of a number of condiments and fruits, &c., used in India, more especially by Mahomedans, and the merits of which are now well known in England. For native Chutny recipes, see Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, 2d ed. xlvii.—xlviii.

1813. "The Chatna is sometimes made with cocoa-nut, lime-juice, garlic, and chilies, and with the pickles is placed in deep leaves round the large cover, to the number of 30 or 40."—Forbes, Orient. Mem., ii. 50-51.

1820. "Chitnee, Chatnee, some of the hot spices made into a paste, by being bruised with water, the 'kitchen' of an Indian peasant."—Acc. of Township of Loony, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bombay, ii. 194.

Chutt, s. Hind. chhat. The proper meaning of the vernacular word is 'a roof or platform.' But in modern Anglo-Indian its usual application is to the coarse cotton sheeting, stretched on a frame and whitewashed, which forms the usual ceiling of rooms in thatched or tiled houses; properly chūdar-chhat, 'sheet-ceiling.'

Chuttanuttu, n.p. This was one of the three villages purchased for the East India Company in 1686, when the agents found their position at Hugli intolerable, to form the settlement which became the city of Calcutta. The other two villages were Calcutta and Govindpūr. Dr. Hunter spells it Sutānatī, but the old Anglo-Indian orthography indicates Chatānatī as probable.

In the letter-books of the Factory Council in the India Office the earlier letters from this establishment are lost, but down to 27th March, 1700, they are dated from "Chuttanutte;" on and after June 8th, from "Calcutta;" and from August 20th in the same year from "Fort William" in Calcutta. According to Major Ralph Smyth Chatānatī occupied "the site of the present native town," i.e. the northern quarter of the city. Calcutta stood on what is now the European commercial part; and Govindpūr on the present site of Fort William.*

Chuttrum, s. (S. India). Tam. shattiram, which is a corruption of Skt. sattra, 'abode.' A house where pilgrims and travelling members of the higher castes are entertained and fed gratuitously for a day or two.

1807. "There are two distinct kinds of buildings confounded by Europeans under the common name of Choultry. The first is that called by the natives Chaturam, and built for the accommodation of travellers. These . . . have in general pent roofs . . . built in the form of a square enclosing a court. . . . The other kind are properly built for the reception of images, when these are carried in procession. These have flat roofs, and consist of one apartment only, and by the natives are called Mandapam. . . . Besides the Chaturam and the Mandapam, there is another kind of building which by Europeans is called Choultry; in the Tamul language it is called Tany Pundal, or Water Shed . . . small buildings where weary travellers may enjoy a temporary repose in the shade, and obtain a draught of water or milk."—F. Buchanan, Mysore, i. 11 and 15. See Choultry.

Cinderella's Slipper. A Hindu story on the like theme appears among the Hala Kanara MSS. of the Mackenzie collection:

"Suvarnaḍevi having dropped her slipper in a reservoir, it was found by a fisherman of Kusumakesari, who sold it to a shopkeeper, by whom it was presented to the King Ugrabāhu. The Prince, on seeing the beauty of the slipper, fell in love with the wearer, and offered large rewards to any person who should find and bring her to him. An old woman undertook the task, and succeeded in tracing the shoe to its owner . . ."—Mackenzie Collection, by H. H. Wilson, ii. 52.

Cintra Oranges. See Orange and Sungtara.

Circars, n.p. The territory to the north of the Coromandel Coast, formerly held by the Nizam, and now forming the districts of Kistna, Godāvāri, Vizagapatam, Ganjām and a part of Nellore, was long known by the title of "The Circars," or "Northern Circars" (i.e. Governments), now officially obsolete. The Circars of Chicacole (now Vizagapatam Dist.), Rajamandri and Ellore (these two embraced now in Godāvāri Dist.) with Condapilly (now embraced in Kistna Dist.), were the subject of a grant from the Great Mogul, obtained by Clive in 1765, confirmed by treaty with the Nizam in 1766. Gantūr (now also included in Kistna Dist.) devolved eventually by the same treaty (but did not come permanently under British rule till 1803). C. P. Brown says the expression "The Circars" was first used by the French, in the time of Bussy.

1758. "Il est à remarquer qu'après mon départ d'Ayder Abad, Salabet Zingue a nommé un Phosdar, ou Gouverneur, pour les quatre Cerkars."—Mémoire, by Bussy, in Lettres de MM. de Bussy, de Lally et autres, Paris, 1766, p. 24.

1789. "The most important public transaction . . . is the surrender of the Guntoor Circar to the Company, by which it becomes possessed of the whole Coast, from Jaggernaut to Cape Comorin. The Nizam made himself master of that province, soon after Hyder's invasion of the Carnatic, as an equivalent for the arrears of peschush, due to him by the Company for the other Circars."—Letter of T. Munro, in Life by Gleig, i. 70.

1823. "Although the Sirkars are our earliest possessions, there are none, perhaps, of which we have so little accurate knowledge in everything that regards the condition of the people."—Sir T. Munro, in Selections, &c., by Sir A. Arbuthnot, i. 204.

We know from the preceding quotation what Munro's spelling of the name was.

1836. "The district called the Circars, in India, is part of the coast which extends from the Carnatic to Bengal. . . . The domestic economy of the people is singular; they inhabit villages (!), and all labour is performed by public servants paid from the public stock."—Phillips, Million of Facts, 320.

1878. "General Sir J. C., C.B., K.C.S.I. . . . He entered the Madras Army in 1820, and in 1834, according to official despatches, displayed 'active zeal, intrepidity, and judgment' in dealing with the savage tribes in Orissa known as the Circars" (!!).—Obituary Notice in Homeward Mail, April 27th. See also Sirkar.

Civilian, s. A term which came into use about 1760—70, as a designation of the covenanted European servants of the E. I. Company, not in military employ. It is not used by Grose, c. 1760, who was himself of such service at Bombay. In Anglo-Indian parlance it is still appropriated to members of the covenanted Civil Service. The Civil Service is mentioned in Carraccioli's Life of Clive (c. 1785), iii. 164.

From an early date in the Company's history up to 1833, the members of the Civil Service were classified, during the first five years as Writers (q.v.), then to the 8th year as Factors; in the 9th and 11th as Junior Merchants; and thenceforward as Senior Merchants. These names were relics of the original commercial character of the E. I. Company's transactions, and had long ceased to have any practical meaning at the time of their abolition in 1833, when the Charter Act (3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 85), removed the last traces of the Company's commercial existence.

1872. "You bloated civilians are never satisfied, retorted the other."—A True Reformer, i. 4.

Classy, Clashy, s. Hind. khalāṣī, usual etym. from Arab. khalāṣ. A tent-pitcher; also (because usually taken from that class of servants) a man employed as chain-man or staff-man, &c., by a surveyor; a native sailor; or matross (q.v.). Khalāṣ is constantly used in Hindustani in the sense of 'liberation'; thus, of a prisoner, a magistrate says 'Khalāṣ karo,' 'let him go.' But it is not clear how khalāṣī got its ordinary Indian sense. It is also written khalāshī, and Vullers has an old Pers. word khalāsha for 'a ship's rudder.' A learned friend suggests that this may be the real origin of khalāṣī in its Indian use.

1785. "A hundred clashies have been sent to you from the presence."—Tippoo's Letters, 171.

1824. "If the tents got dry, the clasheses (tent-pitchers) allowed that we might proceed in the morning prosperously."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 194.

Clearing Nut, s. The seed of Strychnos potatorum, L.; a tree of S. India. It is so called from its property of clearing muddy water, if well rubbed on the inside of the vessel which is to be filled.

Clove, s. The flower-bud of Caryophyllum aromaticum, L., a tree of the Moluccas. The modern English name of this spice is a kind of ellipsis from the French clous de girofles, 'Nails of Girofles,' i.e. of garofala, caryophylla, &c., the name by which this spice was known to the ancients; the full old English name was similar, 'clove gillo-floure,' a name which, cut in two like a polypus, has formed two different creatures, the clove (or nail) being assigned to the spice, and the 'gilly-flower' to a familiar clove-smelling flower. The comparison to nails runs through many languages. In Chinese the thing is called ting-hiang, or 'nail-spice'; in Persian mekhak, 'little nails,' or 'nailkins,' like the German Nelken, Nägelchen, and Gewürtz-nagel (spice nail).

Coast, The, n.p. This term in books of the last century means the 'Madras or Coromandel Coast,' and often 'the Madras Presidency.' It is curious to find Παράλια, "the Shore," applied in a similar specific way, in Ptolemy, to the coast near Cape Comorin. It will be seen that the term "Coast Army" for "Madras Army," occurs quite recently. The Persian rendering of Coast Army by Bandarī below is curious.

1793. "Unseduced by novelty, and uninfluenced by example, the belles of the Coast have courage enough to be unfashionable . . . and we still see their charming tresses flow in luxuriant ringlets."—Hugh Boyd, 78.

1800. "I have only 1892 Coast and 1200 Bombay sepoys."—Wellington, i. 227.

1802. "From Hydrabad also, Colonels Roberts and Dalrymple, with 4000 of the Bunduri or coast sipahees. . ."—H. of Reign of Tipu Sultan, E. T. by Miles, p. 253.

1879. "Is it any wonder then, that the Coast Army has lost its ancient renown, and that it is never employed, as an army should be, in fighting the battles of its country, or its employers?"—Pollok, Sport in Br. Burmah, &c., i. 26.

Cobang. See Kobang.

Cobily Mash, s. This is the dried bonito (q.v.), which has for ages been a staple of the Maldiv Islands. It is still especially esteemed in Achin and other Malay Countries. The name is explained below by Pyrard as 'black fish,' and he is generally to be depended on. But the first accurate elucidation has been given by Mr. H. C. P. Bell, of the Ceylon C. S., in the Indian Antiquary for Oct. 1882, p. 294; see also Mr. Bell's Report on Maldiv Islands, Colombo, 1882, p. 93, where there is an account of the preparation. It is the Maldiv Kulu-bili-mās, 'black-bonito-fish.' The second word corresponds to the Singhalese balayā.

c. 1345. "Its flesh is red, and without fat, but it smells like mutton. When caught each fish is cut in four, slightly boiled, and then placed in baskets of palm-leaf, and hung in the smoke. When perfectly dry it is eaten. From this country it is exported to India, China, and Yemen. It is called Kolb-al-mās."—Ibn Batuta (on Maldives), iv. 112, also 311.

1578. ". . . They eat it with a sort of dried fish, which comes from the Islands of Maledivia, and resembles jerked beef, and it is called Comalamasa."—Acosta, 103.

c. 1610. "Ce poisson qui se prend ainsī, s'appelle generalement en leur langue cobily masse, c'est à dire du poisson noir . . . Ils le font cuire en de l'eau de mer, et puis le font secher au feu sur des clayes, en sorte qu'estant sec il se garde fort long-temps."—Pyrard de la Val, i. 138; see also 141.

1727. "The Bonetta is caught with Hook and Line, or with nets . . . they cut the Fish from the Back-bone on each Side, and lay them in a Shade to dry, sprinkling them sometimes with Sea Water. When they are dry enough . . . they wrap them up in Leaves of Cocoa-nut Trees, and put them a Foot or two under the Surface of the Sand, and with the Heat of the Sun. they become baked as hard as Stock-fish, and Ships come from Atcheen . . . and purchase them with Gold-dust. I have seen Comelamash (for that is their name after they are dried) sell at Atcheen for 8*L. Sterl.* per 1000."—A. Ham. i. 347.

1783. "Many Maldivia boats come yearly to Atcheen, and bring chiefly dried bonnetta in small pieces about two or three ounces; this is a sort of staple article of commerce, many shops in the Bazar deal in it only, having large quantities piled up, put in matt bags. It is when properly cured, hard like horn in the middle; when kept long the worm gets to it."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 45.

1813. "The fish called Commel mutch, so much esteemed in Malabar, is caught at Minicoy."—Milburn, i. 321, also 336.

1841. "The Sultan of the Maldiva Islands sends an agent or minister every year to the government of Ceylon with presents consisting of . . . a considerable quantity of dried fish, consisting of bonitos, albicores, and a fish called by the inhabitants of the Maldivas the black fish, or comboli mas."—J. R. As. Soc. vi. 75.

The same article contains a Maldivian vocabulary, in which we have "Bonito or goomulmutch . . . kannelimas" (p. 49). Thus we have in this one paper three corrupt forms of the same expression, viz., comboli mas, kanneli mas, and goomulmutch, all attempts at the true Maldivian term kalu-bili-mās, 'black bonito fish.'

Cobra de Capello, or simply Cobra, s. The venomous snake Naja tripudians. Cobra is Port. for 'snake'; cobra de capello, 'snake of (the) hood.'

1523. "A few days before, cobras de capello had been secretly introduced into the fort, which bit some black people who died thereof, both men and women; and when this news became known it was perceived that they must have been introduced by the hand of some one, for since the fort was made never had the like been heard of."—Correa, ii. 776.

1539. "Vimos tãbe aquy grande soma de cobras de capello, da grossura da coxa de hũ homẽ, e tão peçonhentas em tanto extremo, que dizião os negros que se chegarão cõ a baba da boca a qualquer cousa viva, logo em proviso cahia morta em terra . . ."—Pinto, cap. xiv.

" . . . Adders that were copped on the crowns of their heads, as big as a man's thigh, and so venomous, as the Negroes of the country informed us, that if any living thing came within the reach of their breath, it dyed presently . . . .”—Cogan's Transl., p. 17.

1563. “In the beautiful island of Ceylon . . . there are yet many serpents of the kind which are vulgarly called Cobras de capello; and in Latin we may call them regulus serpens.”—Garcia, f. 156.

1672. “In Jafnapatam, in my time, there lay among others in garrison a certain High German who was commonly known as the Snake-Catcher; and this man was summoned by our Commander . . . to lay hold of a Cobre Capel that was in his Chamber. And this the man did, merely holding his hat before his eyes, and seizing it with his hand, without any damage. . . . I had my suspicions that this was done by some devilry . . . but he maintained that it was all by natural means . . .”—Baldaeus (Germ. ed.), 25.

Some thirty-five or thirty-six years ago a staff-sergeant at Delhi had a bull-dog that used to catch cobras much like this High-Dutchman.

1711. Bluteau, in his great Port. Dict., explains Cobra de Capello as a “reptile (bicho) of Brazil.” But it is only a slip; what is further said shows that he meant to say India.

1833. “In my walks abroad I generally carry a strong, supple walking cane. . . . Armed with it, you may rout and slaughter the hottest-tempered cobra in Hindustan. Let it rear itself up and spread its spectacled head-gear and bluster as it will, but one rap on the side of its head will bring it to reason. . . .”—Tribes on my Frontier, 198-9.

Cobra Lily, s. The flower Arum campanulatum, which stands on its curving stem exactly like a cobra with reared head.

Cobra Manilla, or Minelle, s. Another popular name in S. India for a species of venomous snake, perhaps a little uncertain in its application. Dr. Russell says the Bungarus caeruleus was sent to him from Masulipatam, with the name Cobra Monil, whilst Gunther says this name is given in S. India to the Daboia Russellii, or Tic-polonga (q.v.) (see Fayrer's Thanatophidia, pp. 11 and 15). One explanation of the name is given in the quotation from Lockyer. But the name is really Mahr. maner, from Skt. manī, ‘a jewel.’ There are judicious remarks in a book lately quoted, regarding the popular names and popular stories of snakes, which apply, we suspect, to all the quotations under the following heading:

“There are names in plenty . . . but they are applied promiscuously to any sort of snake, real or imaginary, and are therefore of no use. The fact is, that in real life, as distinguished from romance, snakes are so seldom seen, that no one who does not make a study of them can know one from another.”—Tribes on my Frontier, 197.

1711. “The Cobra Manilla has its name from a way of Expression among the Nears on the Malabar Coast, who speaking of a quick Motion . . . say, in a Phrase peculiar to themselves, Before they can pull a Manilla from their Hands. A Person bit with this Snake, dies immediately; or before one can take a Manilla off. A Manilla is a solid piece of Gold, of two or three ounces Weight, worn in a Ring round the Wrist.”—Lockyer, 276.

1780. “The most dangerous of those reptiles are the coverymanil and the green snake. The first is a beautiful little creature, very lively, and about 6 or 7 inches long. It creeps into all private corners of houses, and is often found coiled up betwixt the sheets, or perhaps under the pillow of one's bed. Its sting is said to inflict immediate death, though I must confess, for my own part, I never heard of any dangerous accident occasioned by it.”—Munro's Narrative, 34.

1810. “. . . Here, too, lurks the small bright speckled Cobra manilla, whose fangs convey instant death.”—Maria Graham, 23.

1813. “The Cobra minelle is the smallest and most dangerous; the bite occasions a speedy and painful death.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 42.

Cochin, n.p. A famous city of Malabar, Kochchī, which the nasalising, so usual with the Portuguese, converted into Cochim or Cochin. We say “the Portuguese” because we seem to owe so many nasal terminations of words in Indian use to them; but it is evident that the real origin of this nasal was in some cases anterior to their arrival, as in the present case (see the first quotations), and in that of Acheen (q.v.). Padre Paolino says the town was called after the small river “Cocci” (as he writes it). It will be seen that Conti in the 15th century makes the like statement.

Cochin-China, n.p. This country was called by the Malays Kuchi, and apparently also, to distinguish it from Kuchi of India (or Cochin), Kuchi-China, a term which the Portuguese adopted as Cauchi-China; the Dutch and English from them. Kuchi occurs in this sense in the Malay traditions called Sijara Malayu (see J. Ind. Archip., v. 729). In its origin this name Kuchi is no doubt a foreigner's form of the Annamite Kuu-chôn (Chin. Kiu-Ching, South Chin. Kau-Chen), which was the ancient name of the province Thanh'-hoa, in which the city of Hué has been the capital since 1398.†

Cockatoo, s. This word is taken from the Malay kākātāwa. According to Crawford the word means properly 'a vice,' or 'gripe,' but is applied to the bird. It seems probable, however, that the name, which is asserted to be the natural cry of the bird, may have come with the latter from some remoter region of the Archipelago, and the name of the tool may have been taken from the bird. This would be more in accordance with usual analogy.

Cockroach, s. This objectionable insect (Blatta orientalis) is called by the Portuguese cacalacca, for the reason given by Bontius below; a name adopted by the Dutch as kakkerlak, and by the French as cancrelat. The Dutch also apply their term as a slang name to half-castes. But our word seems to come from the Spanish cucaracha. The original application of this Spanish name appears to have been to a common insect found under water-vessels standing on the ground, &c. (apparently Oniscus, or woodlouse); but as cucaracha de Indias it was applied to the insect now in question (see Dicc. de la Lengua Castellana, 1729).

Cockup, s. An excellent table-fish, found in the mouths of tidal rivers in most parts of India. In Calcutta it is generally known by the Beng. name begi or bhikī, and it forms the daily breakfast dish of half the European gentlemen in that city. The name may be a corruption, we know not of what; or may be given from the erect sharp spines of the dorsal fin. It is Lates calcarifer (Gunther) of the group Percina, family Percidae, and grows to an immense size, sometimes to eight feet in length.

Coco, Cocoa, Cocoa-nut, and (vulg.) Coker-nut, s. The tree and nut Cocos nucifera, L.; a palm found in all tropical countries, and the only one common to the Old and New Worlds.

The etymology of this name is very obscure. Some conjectural origins are given in passages quoted below. Ritter supposes, from a passage in Pigafetta's Voyage of Magellan, which we cite, that the name may have been indigenous in the Ladrone Islands, to which that passage refers, and that it was first introduced into Europe by Magellan's crew. This is however a mistake, as we find the term used earlier, not only in Barbosa, but in the Roteiro of Vasco da Gama.

On the other hand the late Mr. C. W. Goodwin found in ancient Egyptian the word Kuku used as "the name of the fruit of a palm 60 cubits high, which fruit contained water" (Chabas, Mélanges Égyptologiques, ii. 239). It is hard however to conceive how this name should have survived, to reappear in Europe in the later Middle Ages, without being known in any intermediate literature.*

The more common etymology is that which is given by Barros, Garcia de Orta, Linschoten, &c., as from a Spanish word applied to a monkey's or other grotesque face. But after all may the term not have originated in the old Span. coca, 'a shell' (presumably Lat. concha), which we have also in French coque? properly an egg-shell, but used also for the shell of any nut. (See a remark under Copra.)

The Skt. narikila has originated the Pers. nargil, which Cosmas grecizes into ἀργελλίον.

Medieval writers generally (such as Marco Polo, Fr. Jordanus, &c.) call the fruit the Indian Nut, the name by which it was known to the Arabs (al jauz-al-Hindī). There is no evidence of its having been known to classical writers, nor are we aware of any Greek or Latin mention of it before Cosmas.

It may be noted that Theophrastus describes under the names of είλας and κόϊκα a palm of Ethiopia, which was perhaps the Doom palm of Upper Egypt (Theoph. H. P. i. 6, 10). Schneider, the editor of Theoph., states that Sprengel identified this with the coco-palm.

A.D. 545. "Another tree is that which bears the Argell, i.e., the great Indian Nut."—Cosmas (in Cathay, &c., clxxvi).

1292. "The Indian Nuts are as big as melons, and in colour green, like gourds. Their leaves and branches are like those of the date-tree."—John of Monte Corvino, in do., p. 213.

c. 1328. "First of these is a certain tree called Nargil; which tree every month in the year sends out a beautiful frond like [that of] a [date-] palm tree, which frond or branch produces very large fruit, as big as a man's head. . . . And both flowers and fruit are produced at the same time, beginning with the first month, and going up gradually to the twelfth * . . . The fruit is that which we call nuts of India."—Eriar Jordanus, 15-16.

c. 1350. "Wonderful fruits there are, which we never see in these parts, such as the Nargil. Now the Nargil is the Indian Nut."—John Marignolli, in do., p. 352.

1498-99. "And we who were nearest boarded the vessel, and found nothing in her but provisions and arms; and the provisions consisted of coquos and of four jars of certain cakes of palm-sugar, and there was nothing else but sand for ballast."—Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, 94.

1510. Varthema gives an excellent account of the tree; he uses only the Malayalam name tenga.—Pp. 163-164.

1516. "These trees have clean smooth stems, without any branch, only a tuft of leaves at the top, amongst which grows a large fruit which they call tenga. . . . We call these fruits quoquos."—Barbosa, 154 (collating Portuguese of Lisbon Academy, p. 346).

1519. "Cocas (coche) are the fruits of palm-trees, and as we have bread, wine, oil, and vinegar, so in that country they extract all these things from this one tree."—Pigafetta, Viaggio intorno il Mondo in Ramusio, i. f. 356.

1553. "Our people have given it the name of coco, a word applied by women to anything with which they try to frighten children; and this name has stuck, because nobody knew any other, though the proper name was, as the Malabars call it, tenga, or as the Canarins call it, narle."—Barros, Dec. 1563. ". . . We have given it the name of coco, because it looks like the face of a monkey, or of some other animal."—Garcia, 66 b.

* The wonder of the coco-palm is so often noticed in this form by medieval writers, that doubtless in their minds they referred it to that "tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month." (Apocal. xii. 3).

"That which we call coco, and the Malabars Tenga."—Ibid. 67 b.

1578. "The Portuguese call it coco (because of those three holes that it has)."—Acosta, 98.

1598. "Another that bears the Indian nuts called Coecos, because they have within them a certain shell that is like an ape; and on this account they use in Spain to show their children a Coecota when they would make them afraid."—English transl. of Pigafetta's Congo, in Harleian Coll. ii. 553.

The parallel passage in De Bry runs: "Illas quoque quae nucis Indicas coceas, id est Simias (intus enim simiae caput referunt) dictas palmas appellant."—i. 29.

Purchas has various forms in different narratives: Cocus (i. 37); Cokers, a form that still holds its ground among London stall-keepers and costermongers (i. 461, 502); coquer-nuts (Terry, in ii. 1466); coco (ii. 1008); coquo (Pilgrimage, 567), &c.

c. 1690. Rumphius, who has cocus in Latin, and cocos in Dutch, mentions the derivation already given as that of Linschoten and many others, but proceeds:—

"Meo vero iudicio *venior ac certior vocis origo inveniendi est, plures enim nationes, quibus hio fructus est notus, nucem appellant. Sic dicitur Arabice Gauzoz-Indi vel Geuzoz-Indi, h. e. Nux Indica. . . . Turcis Cock-Indi eadem significatione, unde sine dubio Aethiopes, Africani, eorumque vicini Hispani ac Portugalli coquo deflexerunt. Omnia vero ista nomina, originem suam debent Hebraicae voci Egoz quae nucem significat."—Herb. Amboin, i. p. 7.*

" . . . in India Occidentali Koker-noot vocatus . . ."—Ibid., p. 47.

One would like to know where Rumphius got the term Cock-Indi, of which we can find no trace.

1881. "Among the popular French slang words for 'head' we may notice the term 'coco,' given—like our own 'nut'—on account of the similarity in shape between a coco-nut and a human skull:—

Qui rend spirituel, aimable,
Sans vous alourdir le coco,

Je m'en fourre à gogo.'—H. VALÈRE."

Sat. Review, Sept. 10, p. 326.

The Dict. Hist. d'Argot of Loréan Larchey, from which this seems taken, explains pignon as 'vin supérieur.'

Coco-de-Mer, or Double Coco-nut,
s. The curious twin fruit so called,
the produce of the Lodoicea Sechellarum, a palm growing only in the Seychelles Islands, is cast up on the shores of the Indian Ocean, most frequently on the Maldivé Islands, but occasionally also on Ceylon and S. India, and on the coasts of Zanzibar, of Sumatra, and some others of the Malay Islands. Great virtues as medicine and antidote were supposed to reside in these fruits, and extravagant prices were paid for them. The story goes that a "country captain," expecting to make his fortune, took a cargo of these nuts from the Seychelles Islands to Calcutta, but the only result was to destroy their value for the future.

The old belief was that the fruit was produced on a palm growing below the sea, whose fronds, according to Malayseamen, were sometimes seen in quiet bights on the Sumatran coast, especially in the Lampong Bay. According to one form of the story among the Malays, which is told both by Pigafetta and by Rumphius, there was but one such tree, the fronds of which rose above an abyss of the Southern Ocean, and were the abode of the monstrous bird Garuda (or Rukh of the Arabs).* The tree itself was called Pausengi, which Rumphius seems to interpret as a corruption of Buwa-zangi, "Fruit of Zang" or E. Africa. They were cast up occasionally on the islands off the S.W. coast of Sumatra; and the wild people of the islands brought them for sale to the Sumatran marts, such as Padang and Priamang. One of the largest (say about 12 inches across) would sell for 150 rix dollars. But the Malay princes coveted them greatly, and would sometimes (it was alleged) give a laden junk for a single nut. In India the best known source of supply was from the Maldivé Islands.

The medical virtues of the nut were not only famous among all the people of the East, including the Chinese, but are extolled by Piso and by Rumphius, with many details. The latter, learned and laborious student of nature as he was, believed in the submarine origin of the nut, though he discredited its growing on a great palm, as no traces of such a plant had ever been discovered on the coasts. The fame of the nut's virtues had extended to Europe, and the Emperor Rudolf II. in his latter days offered in vain 4000 florins to purchase from the family of Wolfert Hermanszen, a Dutch Admiral, one which had been presented to that commander by the King of Bantam, on the Hollander's relieving his capital, attacked by the Portuguese, in 1602.

It will be seen that the Maldivé name of this fruit was Táva-kārhi. The latter word is 'coco-nut,' but the meaning of táva does not appear from any Maldivé vocabulary. Rumphius states that a book in 4to (totum opusculum) was published on this nut, at Amsterdam in 1634, by Augerius Clutius, M.D.

1522. "They also related to us that beyond Java Major . . . there is an enormous tree named Campanganghi, in which dwell certain birds named Garuda, so large that they take with their claws, and carry away flying, a buffalo and even an elephant, to the place of the tree. . . . The fruit of this tree is called Buapanganghi, and is larger than a water-melon . . . it was understood that those fruits which are frequently found in the sea came from that place."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc., p. 155.

1553. " . . . it appears . . . that in some places beneath the salt-water there grows another kind of these trees, which gives a fruit bigger than the coco-nut; and experience shows that the inner husk of this is much more efficacious against poison than the Bezoar stone."—Barros, III. iii. 7.

1563. "The common story is that those islands were formerly part of the continent, but being so low they were submerged, whilst these palm-trees continued in situ; and growing very old they produced such great and hard coco-nuts, buried in the earth which is now covered by the sea. . . . When I learn anything in contradiction of this I will write to you in Portugal, and anything that I can discover here, if God grant me life; for I hope to learn all about the matter when, please God, I make my journey to Malabar. And you must know that these cocos come joined two in one, just like the hind quarters of an animal."—Garcia, f. 70-71.

Codavascam, n.p. A region with this puzzling name appears in the Map of Blaeu (c. 1650), and as Ryk * Kalapá, or Klapa, is the Javanese word for coco-nut palm, and is that commonly used by the Dutch.

van Codavascan in the Map of Bengal in Valentijn (vol. v.), to the E. of Chittagong. Wilford has some Wilfordian nonsense about it, connecting it with the Tokosáva R. of Ptolemy, and with a Touascan which he says is mentioned by the "Portuguese writers" (in such case a criminal mode of expression). The name was really that of a Mahommedan chief, "hum Principe Mouro, grande Senhor," and "Vassalo del Rey de Bengála." It was probably "Khodābakhsh Khān." His territory must have been south of Chittagong, for one of his towns was Chacouria, still known as Chakirā on the Chittagong and Arakan Road, in lat. 21° 45'. (See Barros, IV. ii. 8, and IV. ix. 1; and Couto, IV. iv. 10, also Correa, iii. 264-266, and again as below):

1533. "But in the city there was the Rumi whose foist had been seized by Dimião Bernaldes; being a soldier (lascarym) of the King's, and seeing the present (offered by the Portuguese) he said: My Lord, these are crafty robbers; they get into a country with their wares, and pretend to buy and sell, and make friendly gifts, whilst they go spying out the land and the people, and then come with an armed force to seize them, slaying and burning . . . till they become masters of the land. . . . And this Captain-Major is the same that was made prisoner and ill-used by Codavascão in Chatigão, and he is come to take vengeance for the ill that was done him."—Correa, iii. 479.

Coffee, s. Arab. Kahwa, a word which appears to have been originally a term for wine.* It is probable, therefore, that a somewhat similar word was twisted into this form by the usual propensity to strive after meaning. Indeed, the derivation of the name has been plausibly traced to Kaffa, one of those districts of the S. Abyssinian highlands (Enarea and Kaffa) which appear to have been the original habitat of the Coffee plant (Coffea arabica, L.); and if this is correct, then Coffee is nearer the original name than Kahwa. On the other hand, Kahwa, or some form thereof, is in the earliest mentions appropriated to the drink, whilst some form of the word Bunn is that given to the plant, and Bun is the existing name of the plant in Shoa. This name is also that applied in Yemen to the coffee-berry. There is very fair evidence in Arabic literature that the use of coffee was introduced into Aden by a certain Sheikh Shihāb-uddin Dhabhānī, who had made acquaintance with it on the African coast, and who died in the year H. 875, i.e. A.D. 1470, so that the introduction may be put about the middle of the 15th century, a time consistent with the other negative and positive data.* From Yemen it spread to Mecca (where there arose after some years, in 1511, a crusade against its use as unlawful), to Cairo, to Damascus and Aleppo, and to Constantinople, where the first coffee-house was established in 1554. The first European mention of coffee seems to be by Rauwolff, who knew it at Aleppo in 1573. It is singular that in the Observations of Pierre Belon, who was in Egypt, 1546—1549, full of intelligence and curious matter as they are, there is no indication of a knowledge of coffee.

1573. "Among the rest they have a very good Drink, by them called Chaube, that is almost black as Ink, and very good in Illness, chiefly that of the Stomach; of this they drink in the Morning early in open places before everybody, without any fear or regard, out of China cups, as hot as they can; they put it often to their Lips, but drink but little at a Time, and let it go round as they sit. In the same water they take a Fruit called Bunru, which in its Bigness, Shape, and Colour, is almost like unto a Bay-berry, with two thin Shells . . . they agree in the Virtue, Figure, Looks, and Name with the Buncho of Avicenn,† and Bancho of Rasis ad Almans. exactly; therefore I take them to be the same."—Rauwolff, 92.

c. 1580. "Arborem vidi in viridario Halvdei Turcae, cujus tu iconem nunc spectabis, ex qua semina illa ibi vulgarissima, Bon vel Ban appellata, producantur; ex his tum Aegyptii, tum Arabes parant decoctum vulgarissimum, quod vini loco ipsi potant, venditurque in publicis cenopoliis, non secus quod apud nos vinum: illicque ipsum vocant Caava. . . . Avicenna de his seminibus meminit."—Prosper Alpinius, ii. 36.

* See the extract in De Sacy's Chrestomathie Arabe, cited below. Playfair, in his history of Yemen, says coffee was first introduced from Abyssinia by Jamaluddin Ibn Abdalla, Kāfi of Aden, in the middle of the 15th century: the person differs, but the time coincides.

† There seems no foundation for this.

1598. In a note on the use of tea in Japan, Dr. Faludanus says: "The Turkes holde almost the same manner of drinking of their Chaona (read Chaoua), which they make of a certaine fruit, which is like unto the Bakelaar,* and by the Egyptians called Bon or Ban: they take of this fruite one pound and a halfe, and roast them a little in the fire, and then sieth them in twentie poundes of water, till the half be consumed away; this drinke they take everie morning fasting in their chambers, out of an earthen pot, being verie hote, as we doe here drinke acqua composita in the morning; and they say that it strengtheneth them and maketh them warme, breaketh wind, and openeth any stopping."—In Linschoten, 46.

c. 1610. "La boisson la plus commune c'est de l'eau, ou bien du vin de Cocos trié le mesme iour. On en fait de deux autres sortes plus delicates: l'une est chaude, composée de l'eau et de miel de Cocos, avec quantité de poivre (dont ils vsent beaucoup en toutes leurs viandes, et ils le nomment Pasme) et d'une autre graine appellée Cahoa. . . ."—Pyrard de la Val, i. 128.

1615. "They have in steed of it (wine) a certaine drinke called Caahiete as black as Inke, which they make with the barke of a tree (!) and drinke as hot as they can endure it."—Monfart, 28.

" . . . passano tutto il resto della notte con mille feste e bagordi; e particolarmente in certi luoghi pubblici . . . bevendo di quando in quando a sorsi (per ch'è calda che cuoce) più d'uno scodellino di certa loro acqua nera, che chiamano cahue; la quale, nelle conversazioni serve a loro, appunto come a noi il giuoco dello sbaraglino" (i.e. backgammon).—Pietro della Valle (from Constant.), i. 51. See also pp. 74-76.

1616. "Many of the people there (in India), who are strict in their Religion, drink no Wine at all; but they use a Liquor more wholesome than pleasant, they call Coffee; made by a black Seed boyld in water, which turnes it almost into the same colour, but doth very little alter the taste of the water (!): notwithstanding it is very good to help Digestion, to quicken the Spirits, and to cleanse the Blood."—Terry, ed. of 1665, p. 365.

1623. "Turcae habent etiam in usu herbae genus quàm vocant Caphe . . . . quam dicunt haud parvum praestans illis vigorem, et in animas (sic) et in ingenio; quae tamen largius sumpta mentem movet et turbat."—F. Bacon, Hist. Vitae et Mortis, 25.

c. 1628. "They drink (in Persia) . . . . above all the rest, Coho or Copha: by Turk and Arab called Caphe and Cahua: a drink imitating that in the Stigian lake, black, thick, and bitter: destrain'd from Bunchy, Bunnu, or Bay berries; wholesome they say, if hot, for it expels melancholy . . . . but not so much regarded for those good properties, as from a Romance that it was invented and brew'd by Gabriel . . . . to 1690. "For Tea and Coffee which are judg'd the privileg'd Liquors of all the Mahometans, as well Turks, as those of Persia, India, and other parts of Arabia, are condemn'd by them (the Arabs of Muscatt) as unlawful Refreshments, and abominated as Bug-bear Liquors, as well as Wine."—Orington. 427.

1726. "A certain gentleman, M. Paschius, maintains in his Latin work published at Leipzig in 1700, that the parched corn (1 Sam. xxv. 18) which Abigail presented with other things to David, to appease his wrath, was nought else but Coffi-beans."—Valentijn, v. 192.

Coir, s. The fibre of the coco-nut husk, from which rope is made. But properly the word, which is Malayālam kāyār, from v. kāyaru, 'to be twisted', means 'cord' itself (see the accurate Al-Birūnī below). The former use among Europeans is very early; and both the fibre and the rope made from it appear to have been exported to Europe in the middle of the 16th century. The word appears in early Arabic writers in the forms Kānbar and Qanbār, arising probably from some misreading of the diacritical points (for Kāyār, and Kāiyār). The Portuguese adopted the word in the form cuíro.

The form coir seems to have been introduced by the English in the last century. It was less likely to be used by the Portuguese because coiro in their language is 'leather.' And Barros (where quoted below) says allusively of the rope: "parece feito de coiro (leather) encolhendo e estendendo a vontade do mar," contracting and stretching with the movement of the sea.

c. 1030. "The other islands are called Diva Kanbār from the word kanbār signifying the cord plaited from the fibre of the coco-tree with which they stitch their ships together."—Al-Birūnī in J. As., Ser. IV. tom. viii. 266.

c. 1346. "They export . . . cowries and kanbar; the latter is the name which they give to the fibrous husk of the coconut . . . . They make of it twine to stitch together the planks of their ships, and the cordage is also exported to China, India, and Yemen. This kanbar is better than hemp."—Ten Batavia, iv. 121.

1510. "The Governor (Albuquerque) . . in Cananor devoted much care to the preparation of cables and rigging for the whole fleet, for what they had was all rotten from the rains in Goa River; ordering that all should be made of coir (cairo), of which there was great abundance in Cananor; because a Moor called Mamalle, a chief trader there, held the whole trade of the Maldivé islands by a contract with the kings of the isles . . . so that this Moor came to be called the Lord of the Maldives, and that all the coir that was used throughout India had to be bought from the hands of this Moor . . . The Governor, learning this, sent for the said Moor and ordered him to abandon this island trade and to recall his factors . . The Moor, not to lose such a profitable business . . . finally arranged with the Governor that the Isles should not be taken from him, and that he in return would furnish for the king 1000 bahars (barés) of coarse coir, and 1000 more of fine coir, each bahar weighing  $4\frac{1}{2}$  quintals; and this every year, and laid down at his own charges in Cananor and Cochym, gratis and free of all charge to the King (not being able to endure that the Portuguese should frequent the Isles at their pleasure)."—Correia, ii. 129-130.

1516. "These islands make much cordage of palm-trees, which they call cayro."—Barbosa, 164.

c. 1530. "They made ropes of coir, which is a thread which the people of the country make of the husks which the coco-nuts have outside."—Correa, by Stanley, 133.

1553. "They make much use of this caïro in place of nails; for as it has this quality of recovering its freshness and swelling in the sea-water, they stitch with it the planking of a ship's sides, and reckon them then very secure."—De Barros, Dec. III. liv. iii. cap. 7.

1563. "The first rind is very tough, and from it is made cairo, so called by the Malabars and by us, from which is made the cord for the rigging of all kinds of vessels."—Garcia, f. 67 v.

1582. "The Dwellers therein are Moores; which trade to Sofala in great Ships that have no Decks, nor nails, but are sowed with Cayro."—Castañeda (by N. L.) f. 14 b.

c. 1610. "This revenue consists in . . . Cairo, which is the cord made of the coco-tree."—Pyrard de la Val, i. 172.

1673. "They (the Surat people) have not only the Cair-yarn made of the Cocoe for cordage, but good Flax and Hemp."—Fryer, 121.

c. 1690. "Externus nucis cortex putamen ambiens, quum exsiccatus, et stupae similis . . . . dicitur . . . Malabarice Cair, quod nomen ubique usurpatur ubi lingua Portugallica est in usu. . . ."—Rumphius, i. 7.

1727. "Of the Rind of the Nut they make Cayar, which are the Fibres of the Cask that environs the Nut spun fit to make Cordage and Cables for Shipping."—A. Ham. i. 296.

Coja, s. Pers. Khojah for Khvājāh, a respectful title applied to various classes: as in India especially to eunuchs; in Persia to wealthy merchants; in Turkestan to persons of sacred families.

c. 1343. "The chief mosque (at Kaulam) is admirable; it was built by the merchant Khojah Muhaddhab."—Ion Batuta, iv. 100.

1786. "I also beg to acquaint you I sent for Retafit Ali Khān, the Cojah, who has the charge of (the women of Oude Zenanah) who informs me it is well grounded that they have sold everything they had, even the clothes from their backs, and now have no means to subsist."—Capt. Jaques in Articles of Charge, &c., Burke, vii. 27.

1838. "About a century back Khan Khojah, a Mohamedan ruler of Kashghar and Yarkand, eminent for his sanctity, having been driven from his dominions by the Chinese, took shelter in Badakhshan."—Wood's Ouzus, ed. 1872, p. 161.

Coleroon, n.p. The chief mouth, or delta-branch, of the Kāveri River (see Cauvery). It is a Portuguese corruption of the proper name Kōlīdam, vulg. Kolladam. This name, from Tamil Kōl, 'to receive,' and idam, 'place,' perhaps answers to the fact of this channel having been originally an escape formed at the construction of the great Tanjore irrigation works in the 11th century. In full flood the Coleroon is now, in places, nearly a mile wide, whilst the original stream of the Kāveri disappears before reaching the sea. Besides the etymology and the tradition, the absence of notice of the Coleroon in Ptolemy's Tables is (quantum valeat) an indication of its modern origin.

As the sudden rise of floods in the rivers of the Coromandel coast often causes fatal accidents, there seems a curious popular tendency to connect the names of the rivers with this fact. Thus Kōlīdam, with the meaning that has been explained, has been commonly made into Kollidam, "Killing-place." Thus also the two rivers Peṇṇar are popularly connected with pinam, 'corpse.'

Fra Paolino gives the name as properly Colārru, and as meaning 'the River of Wild Boars.' But his etymologies are as wild as the supposed Boars.

1553. De Barros writes Coloran, and speaks of it as a place (lugar) on the coast, not as a river.—Dec. I. liv. ix. cap. 1.

1672. "From Trangebar one passes by Trinilivaas to Colderon; here a Sandbank stretches into the sea which is very dangerous."—Baldaeus, 150. (He does not speak of it as a River either.)

c. 1760. ". . . the same river being written Collarum, by M. la Croze, and Colodham by Mr. Ziegenbalg."—Grose, i. 281.

1780. "About 3 leagues north from the river Triminious (?) is that of Coloran. Mr. Michelson calls this river Danecotta."—Dunn, N. Directory, 138.

The same book has "Coloran or Colde-roon," ib.

1785. "Sundah Saheb having thrown some of his wretched infantry into a temple, fortified according to the Indian method, upon the river Kaldaron, Mr. Clive knew there was no danger in investing it."—Carraccioli's Life of Clive, i. 20.

Collector, s. The chief administrative official of an Indian Zillah or District. The special duty of the office is, as the name intimates, the Collection of Revenue; but in India generally, with the exception of Bengal Proper, the Collector, also holding controlling magisterial powers, has been a small pro-consul, or kind of préfet. This is, however, much modified of late years by the greater definition of powers, and subdivision of duties everywhere. The title was originally no doubt a translation of tahsildār. It was introduced, with the office, under Warren Hastings, but the Collector's duties were not formally settled till 1793, when these appointments were reserved to members of the covenanted Civil Service.

1772. "The Company having determined to stand forth as deewan, the Supervisors should now be designated Collectors."—Reg. of 14th May, 1772.

1773. "Do not laugh at the formality with which we have made a law to change their name from supervisors to collectors. You know full well how much the world's opinion is governed by names."—W. Hastings to Josias Dupre in Gleig, i. 267.

1788. "The numerous Collectors with their assistants had hitherto enjoyed very moderate allowances from their employers."—Letter in Colebrooke's Life, p. 16.

1838. "As soon as three or four of them get together they speak about nothing but 'employment' and 'promotion' . . . and if left to themselves, they sit and conjugate the verb 'to collect': 'I am a Collector—He was a Collector—We shall be Collectors—You ought to be a Collector—They would have been Collectors.'"—Letters from Madras, 146.

1848. "Yet she could not bring herself to suppose that the little grateful gentle governess would dare to look up to such a magnificent personage as the Collector of Boggleywallah."—Thackeray, Vanity Fair, ch. iv.

1871. "There is no doubt a decay of discretionary administration throughout India. . . . it may be taken for granted that in earlier days Collectors and Commissioners changed their rules far oftener than does the Legislature at present."—Maine, Village Communities, 214.

1876. "These 'distinguished visitors' are becoming a frightful nuisance; they think that Collectors and Judges have nothing to do but to act as their guides, and that Indian officials have so little work, and suffer so much from ennui, that even ordinary thanks for hospitality are unnecessary; they take it all as their right."—Ext. of a Letter from India.

College-Pheasant. An absurd enough corruption of kālij; the name in the Himālaya about Simla and Mussooree for the birds of the genus Gallophas of Hodgson, intermediate between the Pheasants and the Jungle-fowls. "The group is composed of at least three species, two being found in the Himalayas, and one in Assam, Chittagong and Arakan" (Jerdon).

Collery, Callery, &c., s. Properly Bengali khālārī, a salt-pan, or place for making salt.

1768. ". . . the Collector-general be desired to obtain as exact an account as he possibly can, of the number of colleries in the Calcutta purgunnehs."—In Carraccioli's L. of Olive, iv. 112.

Collery, n.p. The name given to a non-Aryan race inhabiting part of the country east of Madura. Tamil kallar, 'thieves.' They are called in Nelson's 'Madura,' Kallans; Kallan being the singular, Kallar plural.

1763. "The Polygar Tondiman . . . likewise sent 3000 Colleries; these are a people who, under several petty chiefs, inhabit the woods between Trichinopoly and Cape Comorin; their name in their own language signifies Thieves, and justly describes their general character."—Orme, i. 208.

c. 1785. "Colleries, inhabitants of the woods under the Government of the Pondiman."—Car. Life of Olive, iv. 561.

1790. "The country of the Colleries . . . extends from the sea coast to the confines of Madura, in a range of sixty miles by fifty-five."—Calc. Monthly Register or India Repository, i. 7.

Collery-Horn. s. This is a long brass horn of hideous sound, which is often used at native funerals in the Peninsula, and has come to be called, absurdly enough, Cholera-horn!

1879. ". . . an early start being necessary, a happy thought struck the Chief Commissioner, to have the Amildar's Cholera-horn men out at that hour to sound the reveille, making the round of the camp."—Madras Mail, Oct. 7th.

Collery-Stick, s. This is a kind of throwing-stick or boomerang used by the Colleries.

1801. "It was he also who first taught me to throw the spear, and hurl the Collery-stick, a weapon scarcely known elsewhere, but in a skilful hand capable of being thrown to a certainty to any distance within 100 yards."—Wells's Reminiscences, i. 130.

Nelson calls these weapons "Vallari Thadis (?) or boomerangs."—Madura, Pt. ii. 44. See also Sir Walter Elliot in J. of the Ethnol. Soc., N. S., i. 112-113.

Colombo, n.p. Properly Kolūmbu, the modern capital of Ceylon, but a place of considerable antiquity. The derivation is very uncertain; some suppose it to be connected with the adjoining river, Kalani-ganga. The name Columbum, used in several mediæval narratives, belongs not to this place but to Kaulam; vide Quilon.

c. 1346. "We started for the city of Kalanbū, one of the finest and largest cities of the island of Serendib. It is the residence of the Wazīr Lord of the Sea (Hākīm-al-Bahr), Jālastī, who has with him about 500 Habshis."—Ibn Batūta, iv. 185.

1517. "The next day was Thursday in Passion Week; and they, well remembering this, and inspired with valour, said to the King that in fighting the Moors they would be insensible to death, which they greatly desired rather than be slaves to the Moors. . . . There were not 40 men in all, whole and sound for battle. And one brave man made a cross on the tip of a cane, which he set in front for standard, saying that God was his Captain, and that was his Flag, under which they should march deliberately against Columbo, where the Moor was with his forces."—Correa ii. 521.

1553. "The King, Don Manuel, because . . . he knew . . . that the King of Columbo, who was the true Lord of the Cinnamon, desired to possess our peace and friendship, wrote to the said Affonso d'Albuquerque, who was in the island in person, that if he deemed well, he should establish a fortress in the harbour of Columbo, so as to make sure the officers of the King."—Barros, Dec. III. liv. ii. cap. 2.

Columbo Root (or Columba root), is stated by Milburn (1813) to be a staple export from Mozambique, being in great esteem as a remedy for dysentery, &c. It is Jateorhiza palmata, Miers; and the name Kalumb is of E. African origin (see Hambury and Flückiger, 23). The following quotation is in error as to the name.

c. 1779. "Radix Colombo . . . derives its name from the town of Columbo, from whence it is sent with the ships to Europe(?); but it is well known that this root is neither found near Columbo, nor upon the whole island of Ceylon. . . ."—Thunberg, Travels, iv. 185.

Comar, n.p. This name (Ar. al-Kumār), which appears often in the older Arab geographers, has been the subject of much confusion among modern commentators, and probably also among the Arabs themselves; some of the former (e.g. the late M. Reinaud) confounding it with C. Comorin, others with Kāmṛūp (or Assam). The various indications, e.g. that it was on the continent, and facing the direction of Arabia, i.e. the west; that it produced most valuable aloes-wood; that it lay a day's voyage, or three days' voyage, west of Sanf or Champa (q.v.), and from ten days to twenty days' sail from Zābaj (or Java), together with the name, identify it with Camboja, or Khmer as the native name is (see Reinaud, Relation des Arabes, i. 97, ii. 48, 49; Gildemeister, 156 seqq.; Ibn Batuta, iv. 240; Abulfeda; Cathay and the Way Thither, 519, 569).

Even the sagacious De Orta is misled by the Arabs, and confounds al-comari with a product of Cape Comorin (see Colloquios, f. 120v).

Cōmaty, s. Telug. and Canar. kōmatī, 'a trader.' This is a term used chiefly in the north of the Madras Presidency, and corresponding to Chetty, q.v.

1627. "The next Tribe is there termed Committy, and these are generally the Merchants of the Place who by themselves or their servants, travell into the Countrey, gathering up Callicoos from the weavers, and other commodities, which they sell againe in greater parcels."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 997. See also quotation under Chuckler.

Combacocon, n.p., written Kumpa-kōṇam. Formerly the seat of the Chola dynasty. Col. Branfill gives, as the usual derivation, Skt. Kumbha-kōṇa, 'brim of a water-pot'; and this form is given in Williams's Skt. Dict. as 'name of a town.' The fact that an idol in the Saiva temple at Combacocon is called Kumbhēśvaran ('Lord of the water-pot') may possibly be a justification of this etymology. But see general remarks on S. Indian names in the Introduction.

Comboy, s. A sort of skirt or kilt of white calico, worn by Singhalese of both sexes, much in the same way as the Malay sarong. The derivation which Sir E. Tennent gives of the word is quite inadmissible. He finds that a Chinese author describes the people of Ceylon as wearing a cloth made of koo-pei, i.e. of cotton; and he assumes therefore that those people call their own dress by a Chinese name for cotton!

The word, however, is not real Singhalese; and we can have no doubt that it is the proper name Cambay (q.v.). Paños de Cābaya are mentioned early as used in Ceylon (Castanheda, ii. 78). In fact, since writing the preceding words, we find in the Government List of Native Words (Ceylon, 1869), that the form used in the Island is actually Kambāya.

A picture of the dress is given by Tennent (Ceylon, i. 612). It is now usually of white, but in mourning black is worn.

1726. In list of cloths purchased at Porto Novo are "Cambayen."—See Valentijn, Chorom. 10.

Commercolly, n.p. A small but well-known town of Lower Bengal in the Nadiya District; properly Kumār-khālī.

Commercolly Feathers. See Adjutant.

Commissioner, s. In the Bengal and Bombay Presidencies this is a grade in the ordinary administrative hierarchy; it does not exist in Madras.

The Commissioner is over a Division embracing several Districts or Zillahs, and stands between the Collectors and Magistrates of these Districts on the one side, and the Revenue Board (if there is one) and the Local Government on the other. In the Regulation Provinces he is always a member of the Covenanted Civil Service; in Non-regulation Provinces he may be a military officer; and in these the District officers immediately under him are termed 'Deputy Commissioners.'

Commissioner, Chief. A high official, governing a province inferior to a Lieutenant-governorship, in direct subordination to the Governor General in Council. Thus the Punjab till 1859 was under a Chief Commissioner; as was Oudh till 1877 (and indeed, though the offices are united, the Lieutenant-Governor of the N.W. Provinces still holds also the title of Chief Commissioner of Oudh). The Central Provinces, Assam, and British Burma are other examples of Provinces under Chief Commissioners.

Comorin, Cape, n.p. The extreme southern point of the Peninsula of India; a name of great antiquity. No doubt Wilson's explanation is perfectly correct; and the quotation from the Periplus corroborates it. He says: "Kumārī . . . a young girl, a princess; a name of the goddess Durgā, to whom a temple dedicated at the extremity of the Peninsula has long given to the adjacent cape and coast the name of Kumārī, corrupted to Comorin . . ." The Tamil pronunciation is Kumārī.

c. 80-90. "Another place follows called Komāp, at which place is (* *) and a port; * and here those who wish to consecrate the remainder of their life come and bathe, and there remain in celibacy. The same do women likewise. For it is related that the goddess there tarried a while and bathed."—Periplus, in Müller's Geog. Gr. Min. i. 300.

c. 150. "Κομαρία ἄκρον καὶ πόλις."—Ptol. 1298. "Comari is a country belonging to India, and there you can see something of the North Star, which we had not been able to see from the Lesser Java thus far."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 23.

c. 1330. "The country called Ma'bar is said to commence at the Cape Kumhari, a name applied both to a town and a mountain."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 185.

"Ves corre a costa celebre Indiana Para o Sul até o cabo Comori Ja chamada Cori, que Taprobana (Que ora he Ceilão) de fronte tem de si." Camões, x. 107.

Here Camões identifies the ancient Kāpu or Kālis with Comorin. These are in Ptolemy distinct, and his Kōry appears to be the point of the Island of Rāmesvaram from which the passage to Ceylon was shortest. This, as Kōlis, appears in various forms in other geographers as the extreme seaward point of India, and in the geographical poem of Dionysius it is described as towering to a stupendous height above the waves. Mela regards Colis as the turning point of the Indian coast, and even in Ptolemy's Tables his Kōry is further south than Komarīa, and is the point of departure from which he discusses distances to the further East (see Ptolemy, Bk. I. capp. 13 and 14; also see Bishop Caldwell's Comp. Grammar, Introd. p. 103). It is thus intelligible how comparative geographers of the 16th century identified Kōry with C. Comorin.

In 1864 the late venerated Bishop Cotton visited C. Comorin in company with two of his clergy (now both missionary bishops). He said that having bathed at Hardwar, one of the most northerly of Hindu sacred places, he should like to bathe at this, the most southerly. Each of the chaplains took one of the bishop's hands as they entered the surf, which was heavy; so heavy that his right-hand aid was torn from him, and had not the other been able to hold fast, Bishop Cotton could hardly have escaped.*

" . . . Lightly latticed in With odoriferous woods of Comorin."

Lalla Rookh, Mokanna.

This probably is derived from D'Herbelot, and involves a confusion often made between Comorin and Comar (q. v.)—the land of aloes-wood.

Comotay, or Comaty, n.p. This name appears prominently in some of the old maps of Bengal, e.g., that embraced in the Magni Mogolis Imperium of Blaeu's great Atlas (1645-1650). It represents Kāmata, a state, and Kāmatapūr, a city, of which most extensive remains exist in the territory of Koch Bihār in Eastern Bengal (see Cooch Behar). These are described by Dr. Francis Buchanan, in the book published by Montgomery Martin under the name of Eastern India (vol. iii. pp. 426 seq.). The city stood on the west bank of the R. Darlā, which formed the defence on the east side, about 5 miles in extent. The whole circumference of the enclosure

* There is here a doubtful reading. The next paragraph shows that the word should be Kouapei.

Competition-wallah, s. A hybrid of English and Hindustani, applied in modern Anglo-Indian colloquial to members of the Civil Service who have entered it by the competitive system first introduced in 1856. The phrase was probably the invention of one of the older or Haileybury members of the same service. These latter, whose nominations were due to interest, and who were bound together by the intimacies and esprit de corps of a common college, looked with some disfavour upon the children of Innovation. The name was readily taken up in India, but its familiarity in England is probably due in great part to the "Letters of a Competition-wala," written by one who had no real claim to the title, Mr. G. O. Trevelyan, now M.P. for Hawick Burghs, the able Irish Secretary, and author of the excellent Life of his uncle, Lord Macaulay.

The second portion of the word, wālā, is properly a Hindi adjectival affix, corresponding in a general way to the Latin -arius. Its usual employment as affix to a substantive makes it frequently denote "agent, doer, keeper, man, inhabitant, master, lord, possessor, owner," as Shakespeare vainly tries to define it, and as in Anglo-Indian usage is popularly assumed to be its meaning. But this kind of denotation is incidental; there is no real limitation to such meaning. This is demonstrable from such usual phrases as Kābul-wālā ghōrā, 'the Kabulian horse,' and from the common form of villagenomenclature in the Panjāb, e.g. Mir-Khān-wālā, Ganda-Singh-wālā, and so forth, implying the village established by Mir-Khān or Ganda-Singh. In the three immediately following quotations, the second and third exhibit a strictly idiomatic use of wālā, the first an incorrect English use of it.

1867. "From a deficiency of civil servants . . . it became necessary to seek reinforcements, not alone from Haileybury, . . . but from new recruiting fields whence volunteers might be obtained . . . under the pressure of necessity, such an exceptional measure was sanctioned by Parliament. Mr. Elliot, having been nominated as a candidate by Campbell Marjoribanks, was the first of the since celebrated list of Competition-wallahs."—Biog. Notice prefixed to vol. i. of Douce's Ed. of Elliot's Historians of India, p. xxviii.

The exceptional arrangement alluded to in the preceding quotation was authorised by 7 Geo. IV. cap. 56. But it did not involve competition; it only authorised a system by which writerships could be given to young men who had not been at Haileybury College, on their passing certain test examinations, and they were ranked according to their merit in passing such examinations, but below the writers who had left Haileybury at the preceding half-yearly examination. The first examination under this system was held 29th March, 1827, and Sir H. M. Elliot headed the list. The system continued in force for five years, the last examination being held in April, 1832. In all 83 civilians were nominated in this way, and, among well-known names, the list included H. Torrens, Sir H. B. Harrington, Sir R. Montgomery, Sir J. Cracroft Wilson, Sir T. Pycroft, W. Tayler, the Hon. E. Drummond.

1878. "The Competition-Wallah, at home on leave or retirement, dins perpetually into our ears the greatness of India. . . . We are asked to feel awestruck and humbled at the fact that Bengal alone has 66 millions of inhabitants. Compound, s. The enclosed ground, whether garden or waste, which surrounds an Anglo-Indian house. Various derivations have been suggested for this word, but its history is very obscure. The following are the principal suggestions that have been made:—*

- (a.) That it is a corruption of some supposed Portuguese word.
- (b.) That it is a corruption of the French campagne.
- (c.) That it is a corruption of the Malay word kampung, as first (we believe) indicated by Mr. John Crawford.

(a.) The Portuguese origin is assumed by Bishop Heber in passages quoted below. In one he derives it from campanha (for which, in modern Portuguese at least, we should read campanha); but campanha is not used in such a sense. It seems to be used only for 'a campaign,' or for the Roman Campagna. In the other passage he derives it from campao (sic), but there is no such word.

It is also alleged by Sir Emerson Tennent (infra), who suggests campinho; but this, meaning a 'small plain,' is not used for compound. Neither is the latter word nor any word suggestive of it, used among the Indo-Portuguese.

In the early Portuguese histories of India (e.g. Castanheda, iii. 436, 442; vi. 3) the words used for what we term compound, are jardim, patio, horta. An examination of all the passages of the Indo-Portuguese Bible where the word might be expected to occur, affords only horta.

There is a use of campo by the Italian Capuchin P. Vincenzo Maria (Roma, 1672), which we thought at first to be analogous: "Gionti alla porta della città (Aleppo) . . . arrivati al Campo de' Francesi; done è la Dogana" . . . (p. 475). We find also in Rauwolf's Travels (c. 1573), as published in English by the famous John Ray: "Each of these nations (at Aleppo) have their peculiar Champ to themselves, commonly named after the Master that built it" . . . and again: "When . . . the Turks have washed and cleansed themselves, they go into their Chappells, which are in the Middle of their great Camps or Carvatschars" . . . (p. 84 and p. 259 of Ray's 2nd edition). This use of Campo, and Champ, has a curious kind of analogy to compound, but it is probably only the translation of Maidān or some such Oriental word.

(b.) As regards campagne, which once commended itself as probable, it must be observed that nothing like the required sense is found among the seven or eight classes of meaning assigned to the word in Littré.

The word campo again in the Portuguese of the 16th century seems to mean always, or nearly always, a camp. We have found only one instance in those writers of its use with a meaning in the least suggestive of compound, but in this its real meaning is 'site': "queymou a cidade toda ate não ficar mais que ho campo em que estevera." (They burned the whole city till nothing remained but the site on which it stood, Castanheda, vi. 130). There is a special use of campo by the Portuguese in the Further East, alluded to in the quotation from Pallegoix's 'Siam,' but that we shall see to be only a representation of the Malay Kampung. We shall come back upon it.

(c.) The objection raised to kampung as the origin of compound is chiefly that the former word is not so used in Java by either Dutch or natives, and the author of 'Max Havelaar' expresses doubt if compound is a Malay or Javanese word at all (pp. 360-361). Erf is the usual word among the Dutch. In Java kampung seems to be used only for a native village, or for a particular ward or quarter of a town.

But it is impossible to doubt that among the English in our Malay settlements compound is used in this sense in speaking English, and kampung in speaking Malay. Kampung is also used by the Malays themselves, in our settlements, in this sense. All the modern dictionaries that we have consulted give this sense among others. The old Dictionarium Malaico-Latinum of David Haex (Romae, 1631) is a little vague:

* On the origin of this word for a long time different opinions were held by my lamented friend Burnell and by me. And when we printed a few specimens in the Indian Antiquary, our different arguments were given in brief (see I. A., July, 1879, pp. 202, 203). But at a later date he was much disposed to come round to the other view, inasmuch that in a letter of Sept. 21, 1881, he says: "Compound can, I think, after all, be Malay Kampung; take these lines from a Malay poem"—then giving the lines which I have transcribed on the following page. I have therefore had no scruple in giving the same unity to this article that had been unbroken in almost all other cases.—H. Y.

"Campon, coniunctio, vel conuentus. Hinc viciniae et parua loca, campon etiam appellantur."

Crawford (1852): "Kampung . . . an enclosure, a space fenced in; a village; a quarter or subdivision of a town."

Favre (1875): "Maison avec un terrain qui l'entoure."

Pijnappel (1875), Maleisch-Hollandsch Woordenboek: "Kampoeng—Omheind Erf, Wijk, Buurt, Kamp," i.e. "Ground hedged round, village, hamlet, camp."

And also, let it be noted, the Java-nese Dict. of P. Jansz (Javaansch-Nederlandsch Woordenboek, Samarang, 1876): "Kampoeng—Omheind erf van Woningen; wijk die onder een hoofd staat," i.e. "Enclosed ground of dwellings; village which is under one Headman."

Marre, in his Kata-Kata Malayou (Paris, 1875), gives the following expanded definition: "Village palissadé, ou, dans une ville, quartier séparé et généralement clos, occupé par des gens de même nation, Malays, Siamois, Chinois, Bouguis, &c. Ce mot signifie proprement un enclos, une enceinte, et par extension quartier clos, faubourg, ou village palissadé. Le mot Kampung désigne parfois aussi une maison d'une certaine importance avec le terrain clos qui en dépend, et qui l'entoure" (p. 95).

We take Marsden last (Malay Dictionary, 1812) because he gives an illustration: "Kampung, an enclosure, a place surrounded with a paling; a fenced or fortified village; a quarter, district, or suburb of a city; a collection of buildings. Mem-buat [to make] rumah [house] serta daŋgan [together with] kampung-nia [compound thereof], to erect a house with its enclosure . . . Ber-Kampung, to assemble, come together; meŋgampung, to collect, to bring together." The Reverse Dictionary gives: "YARD, alaman, Kampung."

In a Malay poem given in the Journal of the Ind. Archipelago, vol. i. p. 44, we have these words:—

"Trásláh ka kampung s'orange Saudágar." ["Passed to the kampung of a Merchant."] ] and

"Titáh bágindáh rájá súltáni

Kámpong sidápá garáŋgun int."

["Thus said the Prince, the Raja Sultani, Whose kampung may this be?"]

These explanations and illustrations render it almost unnecessary to add in corroboration that a friend who held office in the Straits for twenty years assures us that the word kampung is habitually used, in the Malay there spoken, as the equivalent of the Indian compound. If this was the case 150 years ago in the English settlements at Bencoolen and elsewhere (and we know from Marsden that it was so 100 years ago), it does not matter whether such a use of kampung was correct or not, compound will have been a natural English corruption of it.*

It is not difficult to suppose that the word, if its use originated in our Malay factories and settlements, should have spread to the continental Presidencies, and so over India.

Our factories in the Archipelago were older than any of our settlements in India Proper. The factors and writers were frequently moved about, and it is conceivable that a word so much wanted (for no English word now in use does express the idea satisfactorily) should have found ready acceptance. In fact the word, from like causes, has spread to the ports of China and to the missionary and mercantile stations in tropical Africa, East and West, and in Madagascar.

But it may be observed that it is possible that the word kampung was itself originally a corruption of the Port. campo, taking the meaning first of camp, and thence of an enclosed area, or rather that in some less definable way the two words reacted on each other. The Chinese quarter at Batavia—Kampung Tzina—is commonly called in Dutch 'het Chinesche Kamp' or 'het Kamp der Chinezen.' Kampung was used at Portuguese Malacca in this way at least 270 years ago, as the quotation from Godinho de Eredia shows. We have found no Anglo-

Stephen's, called Campon China, extends from the said shore of the Jaos Bazar, and mouth of the river to the N.E., . . . and in this part, called Campon China, dwell the Chincheos . . . and foreign traders, and native fishermen."—Godinho de Eredia, f. 6.

In the plans given by this writer we find different parts of the city marked accordingly, as Campon Chelim, Campon China, Campon Bendara (the quarter where the native magistrate, the Bendāra, (q.v.) lived. See also Chelin.

We have found this word singularly transformed, in a passage extracted from a modern novel:

1877. "When the Rebellion broke out at other stations in India, I left our own compost."—Sat. Review, Feb. 3, p. 148.

A little learning is a dangerous thing!

Compradore, Compodore, &c., s. Port. comprador, 'purchaser,' from comprar, 'to purchase.' This word was formerly in use in Bengal, where it is now quite obsolete; but it is perhaps still remembered in Madras, and it is common in China. In Madras the compradore is (or was) a kind of house-steward, who keeps the household accounts, and purchases necessities. In China he is much the same as a butler (q.v.).

Congee, s. In use all over India for the water in which rice has been boiled. The article being used as one of invalid diet, the word is sometimes applied to such slops generally. Congee also forms the usual starch of Indian washermen. It is from the Tamil kañshi, 'boilings.'

Congee-House, s. The 'cells' (or temporary lock-up) of a regiment in India; so called from the traditionary regimen of the inmates.

1835. "All men confined for drunkenness, should, if possible, be confined by themselves in the Congee-House, till sober."—G.O., quoted in Mawson's Records of the Indian Command of Sir C. Napier, 101, note.

Consoo House, n.p. At Canton this was a range of buildings adjoining the foreign Factories, called also the 'Council Hall' of the Foreign Factories. It was the property of the body of Hong merchants, and was the place of meeting of these merchants among themselves, or with the chiefs of the Foreign houses, when there was need for such conference (see Fankwaë, p. 23). The name is probably a corruption of 'Council.'

Consumah, Khansama, s. Pers. Khānsāmān; a house-steward. In Anglo-Indian households in the Bengal Presidency, this is the title of the chief table-servant and provider, now always a Mahomedan. The literal meaning of the word is 'Master of the household-gear;' it is not connected with khawān, 'a tray,' as Wilson suggests. The analogous word Mir-sāmān occurs in Elliot, vii. 153. The Anglo-Indian form Consumer seems to have been not uncommon in the last century, probably with a spice of intention.

From tables quoted in Long, 182, and in Seton-Karr, i. 95, 107, we see that the wages of a "Consumah, Christian, Moor, or Gentoo," were at Calcutta in 1759, 5 rupees a month, and in 1785, 8 to 10 rupees.

1712. "They were brought by a great circuit on the River to the Chansamma or Steward (Dispenser) of the aforesaid Mahal."—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte) 288.

1759. "DUSTUCK or ORDER, under the Chan Sumaun, or Steward's Seal, for the Honourable Company's holding the King's [i.e., the Great Mogul's] fleet."

"At the back of this is the seal of Zecah al Doulat Tidaudin Caun Bahadour, who is Caun Samaun, or Steward to his Majesty, whose prerogative it is to grant this Order."—R. Owen Cambridge, pp. 231-2.

1788. "After some deliberation I asked the Khansaman, what quantity was remaining of the clothes that had been brought from Iran to camp for sale, who answered that there were 15,000 jackets, and 12,000 pair of long drawers."—Mem. of Khojeh Abdulkurream, tr. by Gladwin, 55.

1810. "The Kawsamah may be classed with the house-steward, and butler; both of which offices appear to unite in this servant."—Williamson, V. M., i. 199.

1831. "I have taught my khansama to make very light iced punch."—Jacquemont, Letters, E. T., ii. 104.

Cooch Behar, n.p. Koch Bihār, a native tributary state on the N.E. of Bengal, adjoining Bhotan and the Province of Assam. The first part of the name is taken from that of a tribe, the Koch, apparently a forest race who founded this state about the 15th century, and in the following century obtained dominion of considerable extent. They still form the majority of the population, but, as usual in such circumstances, give themselves a Hindu pedigree, under the name of Rājibansi. The site of the ancient Monarchy of Kāmrap is believed to have been in Koch Bihār, within the limits of which there are the remains of more than one ancient city. The second part of the name is no doubt due to the memory of some important Vihāra, or Buddhist Monastery, but we have not found information on the subject.

1585. "I went from Bengala into the country of Couche, which lieth 25 days journey Northwards from Tanda."—R. Fitch in Hak. ii. 397.

c. 1596. "To the north of Bengal is the province of Coach, the Chief of which commands 1,000 horse, and 100,000 foot. Kamroop, which is also called Kamroo and Kamtah (see Comotay) makes a part of his dominions."—Ayeen (by Gladwin), ed. 1800, ii. 3.

1726. "Cos Bhaar is a Kingdom of itself, the King of which is sometimes subject to the Great Mogol, and sometimes throws his yoke off."—Valentijn, p. 159.

1774. "The country about Bahar is low. Two kos beyond Bahar we entered a thicket . . . frogs, watery insects and dank air . . . 2 miles farther on we crossed the river which separates the Kuch Bahar country from that of the Deb Rajah, in sal canoes . . ."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, &c., 14-15.

(But Mr. Markham spoils all the original spelling. We may be sure Bogle did not write kos, nor "Kuch Bahar" as Mr. M. makes him do.)

1791. "The late Mr. George Bogle . . . travelled by way of Coos-Beynar, Tassasudon, and Faridrong, to Chanmanning the then residence of the Lama."—Rennell (3rd ed.) 301.

Cooch Azo, or Azo simply, n.p. Koch Hūjo, a Hindu kingdom on the banks of the Brahmaputra R., to the E. of Koch Bihār, annexed by Jahāngir's troops in 1637. See Blochmann in J. A. S. B. xli. pt. i. 53, and xlii. pt. i. 235. In Valentijn's map of Bengal (made c. 1660) we have Cos Assam with Azo as capital, and T' Ryk van Asoe, a good way south, and E. of Silhet.

Cooja, s. Pers. kūza. An earthenware water-vessel (not long-necked, like the surāhī, see Serai). It is a word used at Bombay chiefly.

1883. "They (tree-frogs) would perch pleasantly on the edge of the water cooja, or on the rim of a tumbler."—Tribes on my Frontier, 118.

Cook-room, s. Kitchen; in Anglo-Indian establishments always detached from the house.

1758. "We will not in future admit of any expenses being defrayed by the Company either under the head of cook-rooms, gardens, or other expenses whatever."—The Courts Letter, March 3, in Long, 130.

1878. "I was one day watching an old female monkey who had a young one by her side to whom she was giving small bits of a piece of bread which she had evidently just received from my cook-room."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 44.

Coolcurnee, s. This is the title of the village accountant and writer in some of the central and western parts of India. Mahr. Kul'karani, apparently from Kula, 'tribe,' and Karana, a writer, &c. (see under Cranny).

c. 1590. ". . . in this Soobah (Berar) . . . a chowdry they call Deysmuck; a Canoongou with them is Deyspandeh; a Mokuddem . . . they style Putiel; and a Putwaree they name Kulkurnee."—Gladwin's Ayeen Akbery, ii. 57.

Coolicoy, s. A Malay term, properly kulit-kayu ('skin-wood') explained in the quotation:

1784. "The cooliteayo or coolicoy . . . This is a bark procured from some particular trees. (It is used for matting the sides of houses, and by Europeans as dunnage in pepper cargoes.)"—Marsden's H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 51.

Cooly, s. A hired labourer, or burden-carrier; and, in modern days especially, a labourer induced to emigrate from India, or from China, to labour in the plantations of Mauritius, Réunion, or the West Indies, sometimes under circumstances, especially in French colonies, which have brought the cooly's condition very near to slavery. In Upper India the term has frequently a specific application to the lower class of labourer who carries earth, bricks, &c., as distinguished from the skilled workman, and even from the digger.

The original of the word appears to have been a nomen gentile, the name (Koli) of a race or caste in Western India, who have long performed such offices as have been mentioned. The application of the word would thus be analogous to that which has rendered the name of a Slav, captured and made a bondservant, the word for such a bondservant in many European tongues. According to Dr. H. V. Carter the Kolis proper are a true hill-people, whose especial locality lies in the Western Ghâts, and in the northern extension of that range, between 18° and 24° N. lat. They exist in large numbers in Guzerat, and in the Konkan, and in the adjoining districts of the Deccan, but not beyond those limits (see Ind. Antiquary, ii. 154). In the Râs Mâlâ the Koolees are spoken of as a tribe who lived long near the Indus, but who were removed to the country of the Null,* by the goddess Hinglâj.

Though this explanation of the general use of the term Cooly is the most probable, the matter is perplexed by other facts which it is difficult to trace to the same origin. Thus in S. India, there is a Tamil word kûli in common use, signifying 'hire' or 'wages,' which Wilson indeed regards as the true origin of Cooly. Also in both Oriental and Osmanli Turkish Kol is a word for a slave, whilst in the latter also Kûleh means 'a male slave, a bond-man' (Redhouse). Khol is in Tibetan also a word for servant or slave (Note from A. Schiefner).* The familiar use of Cooly has extended to the Straits Settlements, Java, and China, as well as to all tropical and sub-tropical colonies, whether English or foreign.

In the quotations following, those in which the race is distinctly intended are marked with an *.

1875. "A long row of cottages, evidently pattern-built . . . announced the presence of Coolies, Indian or Chinese."—Faigrove, Dutch Guiana, ch. i.

The word Cooly has passed into English thieves' jargon in the sense of 'a soldier' (v. Slang Dictionary).

Coolung, Coolen, and in W. India Cullum, s. Properly the great grey crane (Grus cinerea), Hmd. Kulang (said by the dictionaries to be Persian, but Jerdon gives Mahr. Kallam, and Telug. Kulangi, which seem against Persian origin). Great companies of these are common in many parts of India, especially on the sands of the less frequented rivers; and their clanging, trumpet-like call is often heard as they pass high over head at night.

"Ille gruum . . .
Clamor in aetheriis dispersus nubibus austri."
(Lucr. iv. 182-3.)

The name, in the form Coolen, is often misapplied to the Demoiselle Crane (Anthropoides virgo, L.), which is one of the best of Indian birds for the table (see Jerdon, ed. 1877, ii. 667, and last quotation below). The true Coolung, though inferior, is tolerably good eating. This bird, which is now quite unknown in Scotland, was in the 15th century not uncommon there, and was a favourite dish at great entertainments (see Accts. of L. H. Treasurer of Scotland, i. ccv).

1698. "Peculiarly Brand-geese, Colum, and Scass, a species of the former."—Fryer, 117.

1813. "Peacocks, partridges, quails, doves, and green-pigeons supplied our table, and with the addition of two stately birds, called the Sahras and cullum, added much to the animated beauty of the country."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 29.

1833. "Not being so green as I was, I let the tempting herd of antelopes pass, but the kullum I cannot resist. They are feeding in thousands at the other end of a large field, and to reach them it will only be necessary to crawl round behind the hedge for a quarter of a mile or so. But what will one not do with roast kullum looming in the vista of the future?"—Tribes on my Frontier, p. 162.

"*** N.B.—I have applied the word kullum, as everybody does, to the demoiselle crane, which, however, is not properly the Kullum, but the Koonja."—Ibid. p. 171.

Coomkee, adj., used as sub. This is a derivative from Pers. kumak, 'aid,' and must have been very widely diffused in India, for we find it specialized in different senses in the extreme West and East, besides having in both the general sense of 'auxiliary.'

a.—Kumaki, in N. and S. Canara, is applied to a defined portion of forest, from which the proprietor of the village or estate has the privilege of supplying himself with wood for house-building, &c. (except from the reserved kinds of wood), with leaves and twigs for manure, fodder, &c. See under Coomry.

b.—Koomkee, in Bengal, is the technical name of the female elephant used as a decoy in capturing a male.

1807. "When an elephant is in a proper state to be removed from the Keddah, he is conducted either by koomkies (i.e. decoy females) or by tame males."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, folio ed., p. 30.

Coomry, s. Kumari cultivation is the S. Indian (especially in Canara) appellation of that system pursued by hill-people in many parts of India and its frontiers, in which a certain tract of forest is cut down and burnt, and the ground planted with crops for one or two seasons, after which a new site is similarly treated. This system has many names in different regions; in the east of Bengal it is known as jhūm (vide Jhoom); and in Burma as tounggyan. We find kum- as a quasi-English participle in a document quoted by the High Court, Bombay, in a judgment dated 27th January, 1879, p. 227.

1883. "Kumaki and Kumari privileges stand on a very different platform. The former are perfectly reasonable, and worthy of a civilized country . . . . As for Kumari privileges, they cannot be defended before the tribunal of reason as being really good for the country, but old custom is old custom, and often commands the respect of a wise government even when it is indefensible."—Mr. Grant Duff's Reply to an Address at Mangalore, 15th October.

Coonoor, n.p. A hill-station in the Neilgherries. Kunṇur = 'Hill-Town.'

Coorg, n.p. A small hill state on the west of the table-land of Mysore, in which lies the source of the Cauvery, and which was annexed to the British Government, in consequence of cruel misgovernment in 1834. The name is a corruption of Kōḍagu, of which Gundert says: "perhaps from koḍu, 'steep,' or Tamil kaḍaga, 'west.'"

Coorg is also used for a native of the country, in which case it stands for Kōḍaga.

Coorsy, s.H.—from Ar.—Kursi. The word usually employed in Western India for 'a chair,' Choky (q.v.) (chauki) is always used in the Bengal Presidency. Kursi is the Arabic form, borrowed from the Aramaic, in which the emphatic state is kursēyā. But in Hebrew the word possesses a more original form with ss, for rs (kisse, the usual word in the O. T. for 'a throne'). The original sense seems to be 'a covered seat.'

Coosumba, s. H. kusum and kusumbha = safflower, q. v. But the name is applied in Rajputana and Guzerat to the tincture of opium, which is used freely by Rajputs and others in those territories; also (according to Shakespeare) to an infusion of bang (q.v.).

Cootub, The, n. p. The Kuṭb Minār, near Delhi, one of the most remarkable of Indian architectural antiquities, is commonly so called by Europeans. It forms the minaret of the Great Mosque, now long in ruins, which Kuṭb-uddin Ībak founded A.D. 1191, immediately after the capture of Delhi, and which was built out of the materials of numerous Hindu temples, as is still manifest. According to the elaborate investigation of Gen. A. Cunningham, the magnificent Minār was begun by Kṛṣṇa-uddin Ibak about 1200, and completed by his successor Shamsuddīn Iyaltimish about 1220. The tower has undergone, in its upper part, various restorations. The height as it now stands is 238 feet 1 inch.

The traditional name of the tower no doubt had reference to the name of its founder, but also there may have been a reference to the contemporary Saint, Kṛṣṇa-uddin Ūshī, whose tomb is close by;* and perhaps also to the meaning of the name Kṛṣṇa-uddin, 'The Pole or Axle of the Faith,' as appropriate to such a structure.

c. 1330. "Attached to the mosque (of Delhi) is a tower for the call to prayer which has no equal in the whole world. It is built of red stone, with about 360 steps. It is not square, but has a great number of angles, is very massive at the base, and very lofty, equalling the Pharos of Alexandria."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 190.

c. 1340. "In the northern court of the mosque stands the minaret (al-ṣauma'a), which is without a parallel in all the countries of Islam . . . It is of surpassing height; the pinnacle is of milk-white marble, and the globes which decorate it are of pure gold. The aperture of the staircase is so wide that elephants can ascend, and a person on whom I could rely told me that when the minaret was a-building, he saw an elephant ascend to the very top with a load of stones."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 151.

The latter half of the last quotation is fiction.

1663. "At two Leagues off the City on Agra's side, in a place by the Mahumetans called Koja Kotubeddine, there is a very ancient Edifice which hath been a Temple of Idols. . . ."—Bernier, E. T. 91.

It is evident from this that Bernier had not then visited the Kṛṣṇa.

1825. "I will only observe that the Cuttab Minar . . . is really the finest tower I have ever seen, and must, when its spire was complete, have been still more beautiful."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 308.

Copeck, s. This is a Russian copper coin,  $\frac{1}{100}$  of a ruble. The degeneration of coin denominations is often so great that we may suspect this name to preserve that of the dinār Kopekī often mentioned in the histories of Timur and his family. Kopek is in Turki = dog, and Charmoy explains the term as equivalent to Abū-kalb

("Father of a dog"), formerly applied in Egypt to Dutch crowns (Löwen-thaler) bearing a lion. There could not be Dutch coins in Timur's time, but some other Frank coin bearing a lion may have been so called, probably Venetian. A Polish coin with a lion on it was called by a like name (see Macarius, quoted below, p. 169). Another etymology of kopek suggested (in Chaudoir, Aperçu des Monnaies Russes) is from Russ. kopie, a pike, many old Russian coins representing the Prince on horseback with a spear. Kopeks are mentioned in the reign of Vassili III., about the middle of the 15th century, but only became regularly established in the coinage c. 1536.

1390. (Timour resolved) "to visit the venerated tomb of Sheikh Maslahat . . . and with that intent proceeded to Tashkand . . . he there distributed as alms to worthy objects, 10,000 dinārs kopaki . . ."—Sharifuddin, in Extracts by M. Charmoy, Mém. Acad. St. P., vi. S., tome iii. p. 363, also note, p. 135.

1535. "It was on this that the Grand Duchess Helena, mother of Ivan Vassilievitch, and regent in his minority, ordered, in 1535, that these Dengui should be melted down and new ones struck, at the rate of 300 dengui, or 3 Roubles of Moscow à la grivenka, in Kopeks. . . From that time accounts continued to be kept in Rouble-kopeks, and Dengui."—Chaudoir, Aperçu.

c. 1655. "The pension in lieu of provisions was, for our Lord the Patriarch 25 copecks daily."—Travels of the Patriarch Macarius, Or. Tr. Fund, i. 281.

1783. "The Copeck of Russia, a copper coin, in name and apparently in value, is the same which was current in Tartary during the reign of Timur."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 332.

Coppersmith, s. Popular name both in Hind. (tambayat) and English, of the crimson-breasted barbet (Xantholaema indica, Latham). See the quotation from Jerdon.

1862. "It has a remarkably loud note, which sounds like took-took-took, and this it generally utters when seated on the top of some tree, nodding its head at each call, first to one side and then to another . . . This sound and the motion of its head, accompanying it, have given origin to the name of Coppersmith."—Jerdon, ed. 1877, i. 316.

1883. "For the same reason mynas seek the tope, and the 'blue jay,' so-called, and the little green coppersmith hooting ventriloquistically."—Tribes on my Frontier, 154.

Coprah, s. The dried kernel of the coco-nut, much used for the expression of its oil, and exported largely from the Malabar ports. The Portuguese probably took the word from the Malayalam koppara, which is however apparently borrowed from the Hindi khoprā, of the same meaning. The latter is connected by some with khapnā, 'to dry up.' Shakespear however, more probably, connects khoprā, as well as khoprī, 'a skull, a shell,' and khappar, 'a skull,' with Sansk. kharpāra, having also the meaning of 'skull.' Compare with this a derivation which we have suggested (s.v.) as possible of coco from old Fr. and Span. coque, coca, 'a shell,' and with the slang use of coco there mentioned.

1563. "And they also dry these cocos . . . and these dried ones they call copra, and they carry them to Ormuz, and to the Balaghat."—Garcia, Colloq. f. 68b.

1578. "The kernel of these cocos is dried in the sun, and is called copra. . . From this same copra oil is made in presses, as we make it from olives."—Acosta, 104.

1598. "The other Oyle is prest out of the dried Cocus, which is called Copra. . ."—Linschoten, 101. See also (1602) Couto, Dec. I. liv. iv. cap. 8; (1606) Gourea, f. 62b; (c. 1690) Rumphius, Herb. Amb. i. 7.

1727. "That tree (coco-nut) produceth . . . Copra, or the Kernels of the Nut dried, and out of these Kernels there is a very clear Oil exprest."—A. Ham. i. 307.

1860. "The ordinary estimate is that one thousand full-grown nuts of Jaffna will yield 525 pounds of Copra when dried, which in turn will produce 25 gallons of cocoa-nut oil."—Tennent, Ceylon, ii. 531.

1878. It appears from Lady Brassey's Voyage in the Sunbeam (5th ed. 248) that this word is naturalised in Tahiti.

1883. "I suppose there are but few English people outside the trade who know what copra is; I will therefore explain:—it is the white pith of the ripe cocoa-nut cut into strips and dried in the sun. This is brought to the trader (at New Britain) in baskets varying from 3 to 20 lbs. in weight; the payment . . . was a thimbleful of bead for each pound of copra. . . The nut is full of oil, and on reaching Europe the copra is crushed in mills, and the oil pressed from it . . . half the oil sold as 'olive-oil' is really from the cocoa-nut."—Wilfred Powell, Wanderings in a Wild Country, p. 37.

Coral-tree, s. Erythrina indica, Lam., so called from the rich scarlet colour of its flowers.

Corcopali, s. This is the name of a fruit described by Varrhema, Acosta, and other old writers, the identity of which has been the subject of much conjecture. It is in reality the Garcinia indica, Choisy (N. O. Guttiferae), a tree of the Concan and Canara, which belongs to the same genus as the mangosteen, and as the tree affording the gamboge of commerce. It produces an agreeable, acid, purple fruit, which the Portuguese call brindões. From the seeds a fatty oil is drawn, known as kokun butter. The name in Malayalam is koḷukka, and this possibly, with the addition of puli, 'acid,' gave rise to the name before us. It is stated in the English Cyclopaedia (Nat. Hist. s. v. Garcinia) that in Travancore the fruit is called by the natives Gharika pulli, and in Ceylon goraka.* The Cyclopaedia also contains some interesting particulars regarding the uses in Ceylon of the goraka. But this Ceylon tree is a different species (G. Gambogia, Desrous.). Notwithstanding its name it does not produce gamboge; its gum being insoluble in water. A figure of G. indica is given in Beddome's Flora Sylvatica, pl. lxxxv.

1510. "Another fruit is found here fashioned like a melon, and it has divisions after that manner, and when it is cut, three or four grains which look like grapes, or birdcherries, are found inside. The tree which bears this fruit is of the height of a quince tree, and forms its leaves in the same manner. This fruit is called Corcopali; it is extremely good for eating, and excellent as a medicine."—Varrhema (transl. modified from) Hak. Soc. 167.

1578. "Carcapuli is a great tree, both lofty and thick; its fruit is in size and aspect like an orange without a rind, all divided in lobes. . ."—Acosta, Tractado, 357. (This author gives a tolerable cut of the fruit; there is an inferior plate in DeBry, iv. No. xvii.)

1672. "The plant Carcapuli is peculiar to Malabar. . . The ripe fruit is used as ordinary food; the unripe is cut in pieces and dried in the sun, and is then used all the year round to mix in dishes, along with tamarind, having an excellent flavour, of a tempered acidity, and of a very agreeable and refreshing odour. The form is nearly round, of the size of an apple, divided into eight equal lobes of a yellow colour, fragrant and beautiful, and with another little fruitlet attached to the extremity, which is perfectly round," &c., &c.—P. Vincenzo Maria, 356.

Corge, Coorge, &c., s. A mercantile term for 'a score.' The word is in use among the trading Arabs and others, as well as in India. It is established in Portuguese use apparently, but the Portuguese word is almost certainly of Indian origin, and this is expressly asserted in some Portuguese Dictionaries (e.g. Lacerda's, Lisbon, 1871). Korī is used exactly in the same way by natives all over Upper India. Indeed, the vulgar there in numeration habitually say do korī, tin korī, for 40, 60, and so forth. The first of our quotations shows the word in a form very closely allied to this, and explaining the transition. Wilson gives Telugu khōrjam, 'a bale or lot of 20 pieces, commonly called a corge.' But, unless a root can be traced, this may easily be a corruption of the trade-word. Littré explains corge or courge as "Paquet de toile de coton des Indes;" and Marcel Devic says: "C'est vraisemblablement l'Arabe khordj"—which means a saddle bag, a portmanteau. Both the definition and the etymology seem to miss the essential meaning of corge, which is that of a score, and not that of a packet or bundle, unless by accident.

1510. "If they be stuffs, they deal by curia, and in like manner if they be jewels. By a curia is understood twenty."—Vatthema, 170.

"I recollect about 29 years back, when marching from Berhampore to Cawnpore with a detachment of European recruits, seeing several coarges (of sheep) bought for their use, at 3 and 3 $\frac{1}{2}$  rupees! at the latter rate 6 sheep were purchased for a rupee . . . five pence each." —Williamson, V. M., i. 293.

1813. "Corge is 22 at Judda." —Milburn, i. 93.

Coringa, n.p. Koringa. Probably a corruption of Kalinga (q.v.). The name of a seaport in Godavari Dist. on the northern side of the Delta.

Corle, s. Singh. kōrale, a district.

1726. "A Coraal is an overseer of a Corle or District . . ." —Valentyn, Names of Native Officers in the Villages of Ceylon, 1.

Cornac, s. This word is used, by French writers especially, as an Indian word, and as the equivalent of mahout (q.v.), or driver of the elephant. Littré defines: Nom qu'on donne dans les Indes au conducteur d'un éléphant, &c., &c., adding: "Étym. Sanskrit Karnikīn, éléphant." "Dans les Indes" is happily vague, and the etymology is worthless. Bluteau gives Cornāca, but no etymology. In Singhalese Kūrāwa = 'Elephant Stud.' (It is not in the Singhalese Dict., but is in the official Glossary of Terms, &c.), and our friend Dr. Rost suggests Kūrāwa-nāyaka ('Chief of the Kūrāwa') as a probable origin. This is confirmed by the form Cournakea in Valentijn, and by another title which he gives as used for the head of the Elephant Stable at Matura, viz. Gajinaicke (Names, &c., p. 11), i.e. Gajināyaka, from Gaja, 'an elephant.'

1672. "There is a certain season of the year when the old elephant discharges an oil at the two sides of the head, and at that season they become like mad creatures, and often break the neck of their carnac or driver."*—Baldaeus, Germ. ed., 422.

1685. "O cornaca q estava de baixo delle tinha hum laço que metia em hũa das mãos ao bravo."—Ribeiro, f. 49b.

1712. "The aforesaid author (P. Fr. Gaspar de S. Bernardino in his Itinerary), relates that in the said city (Goa), he saw three Elephants adorned with jewels, adorning the most Holy Sacrament at the Sê Gate on the Octave of Easter, on which day in India they make the procession of Corpus Domini, because of the calm weather. I doubt not that the Cornacas of these animals had taught them to perform these acts of apparent adoration. But at the same time there appears to be Religion and Piety innate in the Elephant."†—In Bluteau, s. v. Elephante.

1726. "After that (at Mongeer) one goes over a great walled area, and again through a gate, which is adorned on either side with a great stone elephant with a Carnak on it."—Valentijn, v. 167.

"Cournakeas, who stable the new-caught elephants, and tend them."—Valentijn, Names, &c., 5 (in vol. v.).

1727. "As he was one Morning going to the River to be washed, with his Carnack or Rider on his Back, he chanced to put his Trunk in at the Taylor's Window."—A. Ham, ii. 110.

This is the only instance of English use that we know (except Mr. Carl Bock's; and he is not an Englishman, though his book is in English). It is in the famous story of the Elephant's revenge on the Tailor.

1884. "The carnac, or driver, was quite unable to control the beast, which roared and trumpeted with indignation."—C. Bock, Temples and Elephants, p. 22.

Coromandel, n.p. A name which has been long applied by Europeans to the Northern Tamil Country, or (more comprehensively) to the eastern coast of the Peninsula of India from Pt. Calimere northward to the mouth of the Kistna, sometimes to Orissa. It corresponds pretty nearly to the Maabar of Marco Polo and the Mahommedan writers of his age, though that is defined more accurately as from C. Comorin to Nellore.

Much that is fanciful has been written on the origin of this name. Tod makes it Kūrū-mandala, the Realm of the Kūrūs.—Trans. R. S. Soc. iii. 157.

Bp. Caldwell, in the first edition of his Dravidian Grammar, suggested that European traders might have taken this familiar name from that of Karumanal ('black sand'), the name of a small village on the coast north of Madras, which is habitually pronounced and written Coromandel by European residents at Madras. The learned author, in his second edition, has given up this suggestion, and has accepted that to which we adhere. But Mr. C. P. Brown, the eminent Telugu scholar, in repeating the former suggestion, ventures positively to assert: "The earliest Portuguese sailors pronounced this Coromandel, and called the whole coast by this name, which was unknown to the Hindus";* a passage containing in three lines several errors. Again, a writer in the Ind. Antiquary (i. 380) speaks of this supposed origin of the name as "pretty generally accepted," and proceeds to give an imaginative explanation of how it was propagated. These etymologies are founded on a corrupted form of the name, and the same remark would apply to Kharamandalam, the 'hot country,' which Bp. Caldwell mentions as one of the names given, in Telugu, to the eastern coast. Padre Paolino gives the name more accurately as Chola (i.e. Chola) mandalam, but his explanation of it as meaning the Country of Cholam (or juwārī,—Sorghum vulgare, Pers.) is erroneous.

An absurd etymology is given by Teixeira (Relacion de Harmuz, 28; 1610). He writes: "Choromadél or Choro Bâdel, i.e. Rice Port, because of the great export of rice from thence." He apparently compounds (Hind.) chaul, 'cooked rice' (!) and bandel, i.e. bandar (qq.v.) 'harbour.' This is a very good type of the way etymologies are made by some people, and then confidently repeated.

† "This Elephant is a very pious animal"—a German friend once observed in India, misled by the double sense of his vernacular fromm ('harmless, tame' as well as 'pious or innocent'.)

* Journ. R. As. Soc., N S., vol. v. 148. He had said the same in earlier writings, and was apparently the original author of this suggestion.

The name is in fact Chôramandala, the Realm of Chôra; this being the Tamil form of the very ancient title of the Tamil Kings who reigned in Tanjore. This correct explanation of the name was already given by W. Hamilton in 1820 (ii. 405), by Ritter quoting him in 1836 (Erdkunde, vi. 296); by the late M. Reinaud in 1845 (Relation, &c., i. lxxxvi.); and by Sir Walter Elliot in 1869 (J. Ethnol. Soc., N. S., i. 117). And the name occurs in the forms Cholamandalam or Solamandalam on the great Temple Inscription of Tanjore (11th century), and in an inscription of A.D. 1101 at a temple dedicated to Varahasvâmi near the Seven Pagodas. We have other quite analogous names in early inscriptions, e.g. Ilamandalam (Ceylon), Cheramandalam, Tondaimandalam, &c.

Chola, as the name of a Tamil people and of their royal dynasty appears as Choda in one of Asoka's inscriptions, and in the Telugu inscriptions of the Châlukya dynasty. Nor can we doubt that the same name is represented by Sôpa of Ptolemy who reigned at 'Αρκατοῦ (Arcot), Sôp-raḡ who reigned at 'Ορβοῦρα (Warior), and the Sôpai vouâdes who dwelt inland from the site of Madras.*

The word Soli, as applied to the Tanjore country, occurs in Marco Polo (Bk. iii. ch. 20), showing that Chola in some form was used in his day. Indeed Soli is used in Ceylon.† And though the Choromandel of Baldaeus and other Dutch writers is, as pronounced in their language, ambiguous or erroneous, Valentijn (1726) calls the country Sjola, and defines it as extending from Negapatam to Orissa, saying that it derived its name from a certain kingdom, and adding that mandalam is 'kingdom.'‡ So that this respectable writer had already distinctly indicated the true etymology of Coromandel.

Some documents in Valentijn speak of the 'old City of Coromandel.' It is not absolutely clear what place was so called (probably by the Arabs in their fashion of calling a chief town by the name of the country), but the indications point almost certainly to Negapatam.*

The oldest European mention of the name is, we believe, in the Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, where it appears as Chomandarla. The short Italian narrative of Hieronymo da Sto. Stefano is however perhaps earlier still, and he curiously enough gives the name in exactly the modern form "Coromandel," though perhaps his C had originally a cedilla (Ramusio, i. f. 345v). These instances suffice to show that the name was not given by the Portuguese. Da Gama and his companions knew the east coast only by hearsay, and no doubt derived their information chiefly from Mahomedan traders, through their "Moorish" interpreter. That the name was in familiar Mahomedan use at a later date may be seen from Rowlandson's Translation of the Tohfât-ul-Mujâhidîn, where we find it stated that the Franks had built fortresses "at Meelapoor (i.e. Mailapûr or San Tomé) and Nagapatam, and other ports of Solmondul," showing that the name was used by them just as we use it (p. 153). Again (p. 154) this writer says that the Mahomedans of Malabar were cut off from extra-Indian trade, and limited "to the ports of Guzerat, the Concan, Solmondul, and the countries about Kael." At p. 160 of the same work we have mention of "Coromandel and other parts," but we do not know how this is written in the original Arabic. Varthema (1510) has Giormandel, i.e. Chormandel, but which Eden in his translation (1577, which probably affords the earliest English occurrence of the name) deforms into Cyromandel (f. 396 b). Barbosa has in the Portuguese edition of the Lisbon Academy, Charamandel; in the Span. MS. translated by Lord Stanley of Alderley, Cholmendel and Cholmender. D'Albuquerque's Commentaries (1557), Mendez Pinto (c. 1550) and Barros (1553) have Choromandel, and Garcia De Orta (1563)

‡ "This coast bears commonly the corrupted name of Choromandel, and is now called only thus: but the right name is Sjola-mandalam, after Sjola, a certain kingdom of that name, and mandalam, 'a kingdom,' one that used in the old times to be an independent and mighty empire."—Fal v. 2.

Charamandel. The ambiguity of the ch, soft in Portuguese and Spanish, but hard in Italian, seems to have led early to the corrupt form Coromandel, which we find in Parkes's Mendoza (1589), and Coromandyll, among other spellings, in the English version of Castanheda (1582). Cesare Federici has in the Italian (1587) Chiaramandel (probably pronounced soft in the Venetian manner), and the translation of 1599 has Coromandel. This form thenceforward generally prevails in English works, but not without exceptions. A Madras document of 1672 in Wheeler has Corman-dell, and so have the early Bengal records in the India Office; Dampier (1689) has Coromondel (i. 509); Lockyer (1711) has "the Coast of Corman-del:" A. Hamilton (1727) Chormondel (i. 349); and a paper of about 1759 published by Dalrymple has "Choromandel Coast" (Orient. Repert. i. 120—121). The poet Thomson has Cor-mandel:

"all that from the tract
Of woody mountains stretch'd through gorgeous Ind
Fall on Cormandel's Coast or Malabar."
Summer.

The Portuguese appear to have adhered in the main to the correcter form Choromandel; e.g. Archivio Port. Oriental, fasc. 3, p. 480, and passim. A Protestant Missionary Catechism, printed at Tranquebar in 1713 for the use of Portuguese schools in India has: "na costa dos Malabaros que se chama Cormandel." Bernier has "la côte de Koromandel" (Amst. ed. ii. 322). W. Hamilton says that it is written Choramandel in the Madras Records until 1779; but this can hardly be correct in its generality.

In the French translation of Ibn Batuta (iv. 142) we find Coromandel, but this is only the perverse and misleading manner of Frenchmen, who make Julius Cæsar cross from "France" to "England." The word is Ma'bar in the original.

"Corporal Forbes." A soldier's grimly jesting name for Cholera Morbus.

1829. "We are all pretty well, only the regiment is sickly, and a great quantity are in hospital with the Corporal Forbes, which carries them away before they have time to die, or say who comes there."—In Shipp's Memoirs, ii. 218.

Corral, s. An enclosure as used in Ceylon for the capture of wild elephants, corresponding to the Keddah of Bengal. The word is Sp. corral, a court, &c., Port. curral, 'a cattle pen, a paddock.' The Americans have the same word, direct from the Spanish, in common use for a cattle-pen; and they have formed a verb 'to corral,' i.e. to enclose in a pen, to pen.

The word Kraal applied to native camps or villages at the Cape of Good Hope appears to be the same word introduced there by the Dutch.

The word corral is explained by Bluteau: "A receptacle for any kind of cattle, with railings round it and no roof, in which respect it differs from Corte, which is a building with a roof." Also he states that the word is used specially in churches for septum nobilium feminarum, a pen for ladies.

c. 1270. "When morning came, and I rose and had heard mass, I proclaimed a council to be held in the open space (corral) between my house and that of Montaragon."—Chron. of James of Aragon, tr. by Foster, i. 65.

1672. "About Mature they catch the Elephants with Corraals" (Coraval, but sing. Coraal).—Baldaeus, Ceylon, 168.

1860. In Emerson Tennent's Ceylon, Bk. viii. ch. iv., the corral is fully described.

1880. "A few hundred pounds expended in houses, and the erection of coralls in the neighbourhood of a permanent stream will form a basis of operations." (In Colorado.)—Fortnightly Rev., Jan., 125.

Corundum, s. This is described by Dana under the species Sapphire, as including the grey and darker coloured opaque crystallized specimens. The word appears to be Indian. Shakespeare gives Hind. kurand, Dakh. kurund. Littré attributes the origin to Skt. kuruvinda, which Williams gives as the name of several plants, but also as 'a ruby.' In Telugu we have kuruvindam, and in Tamil kurvundam for the substance in present question; the last is probably the direct origin of the term.

c. 1666. "Cet emeri blanc se trouve par pierres dans un lieu particulier du Royaume, et s'appelle Corind en langue Telengui."—Thevenot, v. 297.

Cosmin, n.p. This name is given by many travellers in the 16th and 17th centuries to a port on the western side of the Irawadi Delta, which must have been near Bassein, if not identical with it. Till quite recently this was all that could be said on the subject, but Prof. Forchhammer of Rangoon has now identified the name as a corruption of the classical name formerly borne by Bassein, viz. Kusima or Kusumanagara, a city founded about the beginning of the 5th century.

Kusima-mandala was the western province of the Delta Kingdom which we know as Pegu. The Burmese corrupted the name of Kusuma into Kusmein and Kothein, and Alompra after his conquest of Pegu in the middle of last century, changed it to Bathain. So the facts are stated substantially by Forchhammer (see Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma, No. 2, p. 12); though familiar and constant use of the word Persaim, which appears to be a form of Bassein, in the English writings of 1750—60, published by Dalrymple (Or. Repertory, passim), seems hardly consistent with this statement of the origin of Bassein. The last publication in which Cosmin appears is the "Draught of the River Irrawaddy or Irabatty," made in 1796, by Ensign T. Wood of the Bengal Engineers, which accompanies Symes's Account (London, 1800). This shows both Cosmin, and Persaim or Bassein, some 30 or 40 miles apart. But the former was probably taken from an older chart, and from no actual knowledge.

c. 1165. "Two ships arrived at the harbour Kusuma in Aramana, and took in battle and laid waste country from the port Sapattota, over which Kurttipurapam was governor."—J. A. S. Bengal, vol. xli. pt. 1, p. 198.

1516. "Anrique Leme set sail right well equipped, with 60 Portuguese. And pursuing his voyage he captured a junk belonging to Pegu merchants, which he carried off towards Martaban, in order to send it with a cargo of rice to Malaca, and so make a great profit. But on reaching the coast he could not make the port of Martaban, and had to make the mouth of the River of Pegu. . . . Twenty leagues from the bar there is another city called Cosmin, in which merchants buy and sell and do business. . . ."—Correa, ii. 474.

1545. ". . . and 17 persons only out of 83 who were on board, being saved in the boat, made their way for 5 days along the coast; intending to put into the river of Cosmin, in the kingdom of Pegu, there to embark for India (i.e. Goa) in the king's lacker ship. . . ."—F. M. Pinto, ch. cxlvii.

1554. "Cosmym . . the currency is the same in this port that is used in Pegu, for this is a seaport by which one goes to Pegu."—A. Nunez, 38.

1566. "In a few days they put into Cosmi, a port of Pegu, where presently they gave out the news, and then all the Talapins came in haste, and the people who were dwelling there."—Couto, Dec. viii. cap. 13.

c. 1570. "They go it vp the riuier in foure daies . . . with the flood, to a City called Cosmin . . . whither the Customer of Pegu comes to take the note or markes of euery man. . . . Nove from Cosmin to the citie Pegu . . . it is all plaine and a goodly Country, and in 8 dayes you may make your voyage."—Cesar Frederike, in Hakluyt, ii. 366-7.

1585. "So the 5th October we came to Cosmi, the territory of which, from side to side is full of woods, frequented by parrots, tigers, boars, apes, and other like creatures."—G. Balbi, f. 94.

1587. "We entered the barre of Negrais, which is a braue barre, and hath 4 fadomes water where it hath least. Three dayes after we came to Cosmin, which is a very pretie towne, and standeth very pleasantly, very well furnished with all things . . . the houses are all high built, set vpon great high postes . . . for feare of the Tygers, which be very many."—R. Fitch in Hakluyt, ii. 390.

Cospetir, n.p. This is a name which used greatly to perplex us on the 16th and 17th century maps of India, e.g. in Blaeu's Atlas (c. 1650), appearing generally to the west of the Ganges Delta. Considering how the geographical names of different ages and different regions sometimes get mixed up in old maps, we at one time tried to trace it to the Κασπάρπος of Herodotus, which was certainly going far afield! The difficulty was solved by the sagacity of the deeply lamented Prof. Blochmann, who has pointed out (J. As. Soc. Beng., xlii. pt. i. 224) that Cospetir represents the Bengali genitive of Gajapati, 'Lord of Elephants,' the traditional title of the Kings of Orissa. The title Gajapati was that one of the Four Great Kings who, according to Buddhist legend, divided the earth among them in times when there was no Chakravarti, or Universal Monarch (see Chuckerbutty). Gajapati ruled the South; Āśvapati (Lord of Horses) the North; Chhatrapati (The Lord of the Umbrella) the West; Narapati (Lord of Men) the East. In later days these titles were variously appropriated (see Lassen, ii. 27-28), and Akbar, as will be seen below, adopted these names, with others of his own devising, for the suits of his pack of cards.

There is a Raja Gajpati, a chief Zamindar of the country north of Patna, who is often mentioned in the wars of Akbar (see Elliot, v. 399 and passim, vi. 55 &c.) who is of course not to be confounded with the Orissa Prince.

c. 700. (?) "In times when there was no Chakravartti King . . . Chen-pu (Sambadvipa) was divided among four lords. The southern was the Lord of Elephants (Gajapati) &c. . ."—Intro. to Si-yu-ki (in Pèlerin's Bouddh., ii. lxxv.

1553. "On the other, or western side, over against the Kingdom of Orixa, the Bengalis (os Bengalos) hold the Kingdom of Cospetir, whose plains at the time of the risings of the Ganges are flooded after the fashion of those of the River Nile."—Barros, Dec. IV. ix. cap. 1.

This and the next passage compared show that Barros was not aware that Cospetir and Gajpati were the same.

"Of this realm of Bengala, and of other four realms its neighbours, the Gentooes and Moors of those parts say that God has given to each its peculiar gift: to Bengala infantry numberless; to the Kingdom of Orixa elephants; to that of Bisnaga men most skilful in the use of sword and shield; to the Kingdom of Dely multitudes of cities and towns; and to Cou a vast number of horses. And so naming them in this order they give them these other names, viz.: Espati, Gaspatty, Noropaty, Buapaty, and Copaty."—Barros, ibid.

[These titles appear to be Āśvapati, "Lord of Horses;" Gajpati; Narapati, "Lord of Men;" Bhūpati, "Lord of Earth;" Gopati, "Lord of Cattle."]

c. 1590. "His Majesty (Akbar) plays with the following suits of cards. 1st. Ashvapati, the lord of horses. The highest card represents a King on horseback, resembling the King of Delhi. . . 2nd. Gajpati, the King whose power lies in the number of his elephants, as the ruler of Orissah. . . 3rd. Narpati, a King whose power lies in his infantry, as is the case with the rulers of Bijapur, etc."—Āin, i. 306.

c. 1590. "Orissa contains one hundred and twenty-nine brick forts, subject to the command of Gujeputty."—Ayeen (by Gladwin), ed. 1800, ii. 11.

Coss, s. The most usual popular measure of distance in India, but like the mile in Europe, and indeed like the mile within the British Islands up to a recent date, varying much in different localities.

The Skt. word is krośa, which also is a measure of distance, but originally signified 'a call,' hence the distance at which a man's call can be heard.*

In the Pali vocabulary called Abhidhānappadāpika, which is of the 12th century, the word appears in the form koss; and nearly this, kōs, is the ordinary Hindi. Kuroh is a Persian form of the word, which is often found in Mahomedan authors and in early travellers. These latter (English) often write course. It is a notable circumstance that, according to Wrangell, the Yakuts of N. Siberia reckon distance by kiosses (a word which, considering the Russian way of writing Turkish and Persian words, must be identical with kos). With them this measure is "indicated by the time necessary to cook a piece of meat." Kioss is = to about 5 *verst*s, or 1½ miles, in hilly or marshy country, but on plain ground to 7 *verst*s, or 2½ m.† The Yakuts are a Turk people, and their language a Turki dialect. The suggestion arises whether the form kōs may not have come with the Mongols into India, and modified the previous krośa? But this is met by the existence of the word kōs in Pali, as mentioned above.

In ancient Indian measurement, or estimation, 4 krośas went to the yojana. Sir H. M. Elliot deduced from distances in the route of the Chinese pilgrim Fa-hian that the yojana of his age was as nearly as possible 7 miles. Cunningham makes it 7½ or 8, Ferguson 6½; but taking Elliot's estimate as a mean, the ancient kōs would be 1½ miles.

The kos as laid down in the Āin was of 5000 gaz. The official decision of the British Government has assigned the length of Akbar's Ilāhī gaz as 33 inches, and this would make Akbar's kos = 2 m. 4 f. 183½ yards. Actual measurement of road distance between 5 pair of Akbar's kos-mān ārs,‡ near Dehli, gave a mean of 2 m. 4 f. 158 yds.

In the greater part of the Bengal Presidency the estimated kos is about 2 miles, but it is much less as you approach the N.W. In the upper part of the Doab, it is, with fair accuracy,  $1\frac{1}{4}$  miles. In Bundelkhand again it is nearly 3 m. (Carnegy), or, according to Beames, even 4 m. Reference may be made on this subject to Mr. Thomas's ed. of Prinsep's Essays, ii. 129; and to Mr. Beames's ed. of Elliot's Glossary ("The Races of the N. W. Provinces," ii. 194). The latter editor remarks that in several parts of the country there are two kinds of kos, a pakkā and a kachā kos, a double system which pervades all the weights and measures of India; and which has prevailed also in many other parts of the world; see s.v. Pucka.

Cossack, s. It is most probable that this Russian term for the military tribes of various descent on what was the S. frontier of the Empire has come originally from kazzāk, a word of obscure origin, but which from its adoption in Central Asia we may venture to call Turki. It appears in Pavet de Courteille's Dict. Turk-Oriental as "vagabond; aventurier . . . onagre que ses compagnons chassent loin d'eux." But in India it became common in the sense of 'a predatory horseman' and freebooter.

1366. "On receipt of this bad news I was much dispirited, and formed to myself three plans; 1st. That I should turn Cossack, and never pass 24 hours in one place, and plunder all that came to hand."—Mem. of Timūr, tr. by Stewart, p. 111.

1618. "Cossacks (Cosacchi) . . . you should know, is not the name of a nation, but of a collection of people of various countries and sects (though most of them Christians) who without wives or children, and without horses, acknowledge obedience to no prince; but dwelling far from cities in fastnesses among the woods or mountains, or rivers . . . live by the booty of their swords . . . employ themselves in perpetual inroads and cruisions by land and sea to the detriment of their nearest enemies, i.e. of the Turks and other Mahometans. . . As I have heard from them, they promise themselves one day the capture of Constantinople, saying that Fate has reserved for them the liberation of that country, and that they have clear prophecies to that effect."—P. della Valle, i. 614-615.

1748. "The Tappies [dāk runners] on the road to Ganjam being grown so exceedingly indolent that he has called them in, being convinced that our packets may be forwarded much faster by Cassids [mounted postmen*]."—In Long, p. 3.

1803. "I wish that you would open a communication by means of cossids with the officer commanding a detachment of British troops in the fort of Songhur."—Wellington, ii. 159.

Cossimbazar, n.p. Properly Kāsim-bāzār. A town no longer existing, which closely adjoined the city of Murshidābād, but preceded the latter. It was the site of one of the most important factories of the East India Company in their mercantile days, and was indeed a chief centre of all foreign trade in Bengal during the 17th century. Fryer (1673), by an odd corruption, calls it Castle-Buzzar (p. 38); see quotation under Dadny.

1676. "Kasembasar, a Village in the Kingdom of Bengala, sends abroad every year two and twenty thousand Bales of Silk; every Bale weighing a hunderd pound."—Tavernier, E.T., ii. 126.

Cossya, n.p. More properly Kāsia, but now officially Khāsi; in the language of the people themselves Ki-Kāsi, the first syllable being a prefix denoting the plural. The name of a hill people of Mongoloid character, occupying the mountains immediately north of Silhet in Eastern Bengal. Many circumstances in relation to this people are of high interest, such as their practice, down to our own day, of erecting rude stone monuments of the menhir and dolmen kind, their law of succession in the female line, &c.

Shillong, the modern seat of administration of the Province of Assam, and lying about midway between the proper valley of Assam and the plain of Silhet, both of which are comprehended in that government, is in the

Kasia country, at a height of 4,900 feet above the sea.

The Kasias seem to be the people encountered near Silhet by Ibn Batuta as mentioned in the quotation:

c. 1346. "The people of these mountains resemble Turks (i.e. Tartars), and are very strong labourers, so that a slave of their race is worth several of another nation."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 216.

1780. "The first thing that struck my observation on entering the arena was the singularity of the dresses worn by the different tribes of Cusseahs or native Tartars, all dressed and armed agreeable to the custom of the country or mountain from whence they came."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the L.s., iii. 182.

1789. "We understand the Cossyachs who inhabit the hills to the north-westward of Sylhet, have committed some very daring acts of violence."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 218.

Costus, see Putchock.

Cot, s. A light bedstead. There is a little difficulty about the true origin of this word. It is universal as a sea-term, and in the South of India. In Northern India its place has been very generally taken by charpoy (q.v.), and cot, though well understood, is not in such prevalent European use as it formerly was, except as applied to barrack furniture, and among soldiers and their families. Words with this last characteristic have very frequently been introduced from the south. There are, however, both in north and south, vernacular words which may have led to the adoption of the term cot in their respective localities. In the north we have Hind. khāt and khatwa, both used in this sense, the latter also in Sanskrit; in the south, Tamil and Malayāl. kaṭṭil, a form adopted by the Portuguese. The quotations show, however, no Anglo-Indian use of the word in any form but cot.

The question of origin is perhaps further perplexed by the use of quatre as a Spanish term in the West Indies (see Tom Cringle below). A Spanish lady tells us that catre, or catre de tigera ("scissors-cot") is applied to a bedstead with X-trestles. Catre is also common Portuguese for a wooden bedstead, and is found as such in a dictionary of 1611. These forms, however, we shall hold to be of Indian origin; unless it can be shown that they are older in Spain and Portugal than the 16th century. The form quatre has a curious analogy (probably accidental) to chārpāi.

1600. "He retired to the hospital of the sick and poor, and there had his cell, the walls of which were of coarse palm-mats. Inside there was a little table, and on it a crucifix of the wood of St. Thomé, covered with a cloth, and a breviary. There was also a catre of coir, with a stone for pillow; and this completes the inventory of the furniture of that house."—Lucena, V. do P. F. Xavier, 199.

Cotwal, Cutwaul, s. A police-officer; superintendent of police; native town magistrate. From Pers. Kotwāl, 'a seneschal, a commandant of a castle or fort.' This looks as if it had been first taken from an Indian word, Koṭ-wālā; but some doubt arises whether it may not have been a Turki term. In Turki it is written Katāul, Kotāwal, and seems to be regarded by both Vámbéry and Pavet de Courteille as a genuine Turki word. V. defines it as "Ketaul, garde de forteresse, chef de la garnison; nom d'un tribu d'Ozbegs;" P. "Kotāwal, Kotāwāl, gardien d'une citadelle." There are many Turki words of analogous form, as karāwal, a vedette, bakāwal, a table-steward, yasāwal, a chamberlain, tangāwal, a patrol, &c. In modern Bokhara Kataul is a title conferred on a person who superintends the Amir's buildings (Khanikoff, 241).

On the whole it seems probable that the title was originally Turki, but was shaped by Indian associations.

The office of Kotwāl in Western and Southern India, technically speaking, ceased about 1862, when the new police system (under Act, India, V. of 1861, and corresponding local Acts) was introduced. In Bengal the term has been long obsolete.

1763. "The Catwal is the judge and executor of justice in criminal cases."—Orme (ed. 1803), i. 26.

1812. "... an officer retained from the former system, denominated cutwal, to whom the general police of the city and regulation of the market was entrusted."—Fifth Report, 44.

1847. "The Kutwal . . . seems to have done his duty resolutely and to the best of his judgment."—G. O. by Sir C. Napier, 121.

Country, adj. This term is used colloquially, and in trade, as an adjective to distinguish articles produced in India (generally with a sub-indication of disparagement), from such as are imported, and especially imported from Europe. Indeed Europe (q.v.) was, and still occasionally is, used as the contrary adjective. Thus, 'country harness' is opposed to 'Europe harness'; 'country-born people are persons of European descent, but born in India; 'country horses are Indian-bred in distinction from Arabs, Walers (q.v.), English horses, and even from 'stud-breds,' which are horses reared in India, but from foreign sires; 'country ships' are those which are owned in Indian ports, though often officered by Europeans; country bottled beer is beer imported from England in cask and bottled in India. The term, as well as the Hindustani desi, of which country is a translation, is also especially used for things grown or made in India as substitutes for certain foreign articles. Thus the Cicca disticha in Bombay gardens is called 'Country gooseberry'; Convolvulus batatas, or sweet potato, is sometimes called the 'country potato.' It was, equally with our quotidian root which has stolen its name, a foreigner in India, but was introduced and familiarized at a much earlier date.

Thus again desi badām, or 'country almond,' is applied in Bengal to the nut of the Terminalia Catappa. On desi, which is applied, among other things, to silk, the great Ritter (dormitans Homerus) makes the odd remark that desi is just Seide reversed! But it would be equally apposite to remark that Trigon-ometry is just Country-ometry reversed!

Possibly the idiom may have been taken up from the Portuguese who also use it, e.g. 'açafrão da terra,' 'country saffron,' i.e. safflower (q.v.), otherwise called bastard saffron, the term being also sometimes applied to turmeric. But the source of the idiom is general, as the use of desi shows. Moreover the Arabic baladi, having the same literal meaning, is applied in a manner strictly analogous, including the note of disparagement, inasmuch that it has been naturalised in Spanish as indicating 'of little or no value.' Illustrations of the mercantile use of beledi (i.e. baladi) will be found in a note to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 370. For the Spanish use we may quote the Dict. of Cobarruvias (1611): "Baladi, the thing which is produced at less cost, and is of small duration and profit." See also Dozy and Engelmann, 232-3.

1516. "Beledyn ginger grows at a distance of two or three leagues all round the city of Calicut. . . . In Bengal there is also much ginger of the country (Gengivre Beledi)."—Barbosa, 220-1.

1582. "The Nayres maye not take anye Countrie women, and they also doe not marrie."—Castañeda (by N. L.), f. 36.

1619. "The twelfth in the morning Master Methwold came from Messalipatan in one of the Country Boats."—Pring, in Purchas, i. 638.

1685. "The inhabitants of the Gentoo Town, all in arms, bringing with them also elephants, kettle-drums, and all the Country music."—Wheeler, i. 140.

1752. "Captain Clive did not despair . . . and at ten at night sent one Shawlum, a serjeant who spoke the country languages, with a few sepoy to reconnoitre."—Orme, i. 211 (ed. 1803).

1769. "I supped last night at a Country Captain's; where I saw for the first time a specimen of the Indian taste."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 15.

1775. "The Moors in what is called Country ships in East India, have also their chearing songs; at work in hoisting, or in their boats a rowing."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 305.

1793. "The jolting springs of country-made carriages, or the grunts of country-made carriers, commonly called palankeen-boys."—Hugh Boyd, 146.

1809. "The Rajah had a drawing of it made for me, on a scale, by a country Draftsman of great merit."—Ld. Valentia, i. 356.

" . . . split country peas . . ."—Maria Graham, 25.

1817. "Since the conquest (of Java) a very extensive trade has been carried on by the English in country ships."—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 210.

Country-Captain. This is in Bengal the name of a peculiar dry kind of curry, often served as a breakfast dish. We can only conjecture that it was a favourite dish at the table of the skippers of 'country ships,' who were themselves called 'country captains,' as in our first quotation. In Madras the term is applied to a spatch-cock dressed with onions and curry stuff, which is probably the original form.

1792. "But now, Sir, a Country Captain is not to be known from an ordinary man, or a Christian, by any certain mark whatever."—Madras Courier, April 26th.

c. 1825. "The local name for their business was the 'Country Trade,' the ships were 'Country Ships,' and the masters of them 'Country Captains.' Some of my readers may recall a dish which was often placed before us when dining on board these vessels at Whampoa, viz. 'Country Captain.'"—The Fankwaie at Canton (1882), p. 33.

Courtallum, n.p. The name of a town in Tinnevely; written in vernacular Kuttālam. We do not know its etymology.

Covenanted Servants. This term is specially applied to the regular Civil Service of India, whose members used to enter into a formal covenant with the East India Company, and do so now with the Secretary of State for India. Many other classes of servants now go out to India under a variety of contracts or covenants, but the term in question continues to be appropriated as before.

1757. "There being a great scarcity of covenanted servants in Calcutta, we have entertained Mr. Hewitt as a monthly writer . . . and beg to recommend him to be covenanted upon this Establishment."—Letter in Long, 112.

See also Civilian, and Uncovenanted.

Covid, s. Formerly in use as the name of a measure, varying much locally in value, in European settlements not only in India but in China, &c. The word is a corruption, probably an Indo-Portuguese form, of the Port. covado, a cubit or ell.

1672. "Measures of Surat are only two; the Lesser and the Greater Coveld [probably misprint for Coveed], the former of 27 inches English, the latter of 36 inches English."—Fryer, 206.

1720. "Item, I leave 200 pagodas for a tomb to be erected in the burial place in form as follows. Four large pillars, each to be six covids high, and six covids distance one from the other; the top to be arched, and on each pillar a cherubim; and on the top of the arch the effigy of Justice."—Testament of Charles Davers, Merchant, in Wheeler, ii. 338.

c. 1760. According to Grose the covid at Surat was 1 yard English [the greater coveed of Fryer], at Madras  $\frac{1}{2}$  a yard; but he says also: "At Bengal the same as at Surat and Madras."

1794. "To be sold, on very reasonable terms, About 3000 covits of 2-inch Calicut Planks."—Bombay Courier, July 19th.

The measure has long been forgotten under this name in Bengal, though used under the native name hāth. From Milburn (i. 334, 341, &c.) it seems to have survived on the West Coast in the early part of this century, and possibly may still linger.

Covil, s. Tamil. kō-v-il, 'God-house,' a Hindu temple; and also (in Malabar) a palace. In colloquial use in S. India and Ceylon. In S. India it is used, especially among the French, for 'a church;' also among the uneducated English.

Cowcolly, n.p. The name of a well-known light-house and landmark at the entrance of the Hoogly, in Midnapur District. Properly, according to Hunter, Geonkhāl.

Cow-itch, n. The irritating hairs on the pod of the common Indian climbing herb Mucuna pruriens, D. C., N. O. Leguminosae, and the plant itself. Both pods and roots are used in native practice. The name is doubtless the Hind. kewānch (Skt. kāpikachchhu) modified in Hobson-Jobson fashion, by the 'striving after meaning.'

Cowle, s. A lease, or grant in writing; a safe-conduct, amnesty, or in fact any written engagement. The Emperor Sigismund gave Cowle to John Huss—and broke it. The word is Arab. kaul, 'word, promise, agreement,' and it has become technical in the Indian vernaculars, owing to the prevalence of Mahommedan Law.

1688. "The President has by private correspondence procured a Cowle for renting the Town and customs of S. Thomé."—Wheeler i. 176.

1780. "This Caoul was confirmed by another King of Gingy . . . of the Bramin Caste."—Dunn, New Directory, 140.

Sir A. Wellesley often uses the word in his Indian letters: Thus:

1800. "One tandah of brinjaries . . . has sent to me for cowle . . ."—Wellington Desp. (ed. 1837), i. 59.

1804. "On my arrival in the neighbourhood of the pettah I offered cowle to the inhabitants."—Do. ii. 193.

Cowry, s. Hind. kaurī (kaurī), Mahr. kavadi, Sansk. kaparda, and kapardika. The small white shell, Cypraea moneta, current as money extensively in parts of S. Asia and of Africa.

By far the most ancient mention of shell currency comes from Chinese literature. It is mentioned in the famous "Tribute of Yu" (or Yü-Kung); in the Shu-King (about the 14th cent. B.C.); and in the "Book of Poetry" (Shi-King), in an ode of the 10th cent. B.C. The Chinese seem to have adopted the use from the aborigines in the East and South; and they extended the system to tortoise-shell, and to other shells, the cowry remaining the unit. In 338 B.C., the King of Tsin, the supply of shells failing, suppressed the cowry currency, and issued copper coin, already adopted in other states of China. The usurper Wang Mang, who ruled A.D. 9-23, tried to revive the old systems, and issued rules instituting, in addition to the metallic money, ten classes of tortoise-shell and five of smaller shells, the value of all based on the cowry, which was worth 3 cash.*

The currency of cowries in India does not seem to be alluded to by any Greek or Latin author. It is mentioned by Mas'udi (c. 943), and their use for small change in the Indo-Chinese countries is repeatedly spoken of by Marco Polo, who calls them pourcelaines, the name by which this kind of shell was known in Italy (porcellane) and France. When the Mahomedans conquered Bengal, early in the 13th century, they found the ordinary currency composed exclusively of cowries, and in some remote districts this continued to the beginning of the present century. Thus, up to 1801, the whole revenue of the Silhet District, amounting then to Rs. 250,000, was collected in these shells, but by 1813 the whole was realised in specie. Interesting details in connexion with this subject are given by the Hon. Robert Lindsay, who was one of the early Collectors of Silhet (Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 170).

The Sanskrit vocabulary called Trikāṇḍaśeṣha (iii. 3, 206), makes 20 kapardika (or kauris) =  $\frac{1}{4}$  pana; and this value seems to have been pretty constant. The cowry table given by Mr. Lindsay at Silhet, circa 1778, exactly agrees with that given by Milburn as in Calcutta use at the beginning of this century, and up to 1834 or thereabouts it continued to be the same:

4 kauris = 1 ganda
20 gandas = 1 pan
4 pan = 1 ana
4 anas = 1 kāhan, or about  $\frac{1}{4}$  rupee.

This gives about 5120 cowries to the Rupee. We have not met with any denomination of currency in actual use below the cowry, but it will be seen that, in a quotation from Mrs. Parkes, two such are indicated. It is, however, Hindu idiosyncrasy to indulge in imaginary submultiples as well as imaginary multiples. See a parallel under Lack.

* Note communicated by Professor Terrien de la Couperie.

In Bastār, a secluded inland state between Orissa and the Godavery, in 1870, the following was the prevailing table of cowry currency, according to Dr. Hunter's Gazetteer:

20 kauris = 1 borī

12 borīs = 1 dugānī

12 dugānīs = 1 Rupee, i.e. 2880 cowries.

Here we may remark that both the paṇ in Bengal, and the dugānī in this secluded Bastār, were originally the names of pieces of money, though now in the respective localities they represent only certain quantities of cowries. For paṇ see under Fanam; and as regards dugānī see Thomas's Patan Kings of Dehli, pp. 218, 219.

Cowries were at one time imported into England in considerable quantities for use in the African slave-trade.

"For this purpose," says Milburn, "they should be small, clean, and white, with a beautiful gloss" (i. 273). The duty on this importation was £53 16s. 3d. per cent. on the sale value, with  $\frac{1}{2}$  added for war-tax. In 1803, 1418 cwt. were sold at the E. I. auctions, fetching £3,626; but after that few were sold at all. In the height of slave-trade, the great mart for cowries was at Amsterdam, where there were spacious warehouses for them (see the Voyage, &c., quoted 1747).

c. 1020. "These isles are divided into two classes, according to the nature of their chief products. The one are called Dewa-Kaudha, 'the Isles of the Cowries,' because of the cowries that they collect on the branches of coco-trees planted in the sea."—Al-Bīrūnī, in J. As., Ser. IV. tom. iv. 266.

c. 1240. "It has been narrated on this wise that as in that country (Bengal), the kauri [shell] is current in place of silver, the least gift he used to bestow was a lak of kauris. The Almighty mitigate his punishment [in hell]!"—Ṭabaṭāt-i-Nāṣiri, by Raverly, 555-6.

c. 1350. "The money of the Islanders (of the Maldives) consists of cowries (al-wada'). They so style creatures which they collect in the sea, and bury in holes dug on the shore. The flesh wastes away, and only a white shell remains. 100 of these shells are called siyāh, and 700 fāl; 12,000 they call kutta; and 100,000 bustū. Bargains are made with these cowries at the rate of 4 bustū for a gold dinār.* Sometimes the rate falls, and 12 bustū are exchanged for a gold dinār. The islanders barter them to the people of Bengal for rice, for they also form the currency in use in that country. . . . These cowries serve also for barter with the negroes in their own land. I have seen them sold at Māli and Gūgū [on the Niger] at the rate of 1150 for a gold dinār."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 122.

c. 1420. 1880. "A couple of mules came clattering into the court-yard, driven by one muleteer. Each mule carried 2 heavy sacks . . . which jingled pleasantly as they were placed on the ground. These sacks were afterwards opened in my presence, and contained no less than 35,000 silver krans. The one

\* A Kag would seem here to be equivalent to  $\frac{1}{4}$  of a cowry. Wilson, with (?) as to its origin, explains it as "a small division of money of account, less than a ganda of Kauris." Til is properly the sesamum seed, applied in Bengal, Wilson says, "in account, to  $\frac{1}{16}$  of a kauri." The Table would probably thus run: 20 til = 1 kag, 4 kag = 1 kauri, and so forth. And 1 rupee = 409,600 til!

Cranchee, s. Beng. karānchī. This appears peculiar to Calcutta. A kind of ricketty and sordid carriage resembling, as Bp. Heber says below, the skeleton of an old English hackney-coach of 1800—35 (which no doubt was the model), drawn by wretched ponies, harnessed with rope, and standing for native hire in various parts of the city.

1823. "... a considerable number of 'caranchies,' or native carriages, each drawn by two horses, and looking like the skeletons of hackney coaches in our own country."—Heber, i. 28 (ed. 1844).

1834. "As Lady Wroughton guided her horse through the crowd to the right, a kuranchy, or hackney-coach, suddenly passed her at full speed."—The Baboo, i. 228.

Cranganore, n.p. Properly (according to Dr. Gundert), Koḍunrūr, more generally Kodungalūr; an ancient city and port of Malabar, identical with the Mūyiri-kōdu of an ancient copper-plate inscription,* with the Μουῦρις of Ptolemy's Tables and the Perilpus, and with the Muziris primum emporium Indiae of Pliny.† "The traditions of Jews, Christians, Brahmans, and of the Kērala Ulpatti (legendary History of Malabar) agree in making Kodungalūr the residence of the Perumāls (ancient sovereigns of Malabar), and the first resort of Western shipping." (Dr. Gundert in Madras Journal, vol. xiii. p. 120). It was apparently the earliest settlement of Jew and Christian immigrants. It is prominent in all the earlier narratives of the 16th century, especially in connexion with the Malabar Christians; and it was the site of one of the 7 churches alleged in the legends of the latter to have been founded by St. Thomas.‡ Cranganor was already in decay when the Portuguese arrived. They eventually established themselves there with a strong fort (1523), which the Dutch took from them in 1662. This fort was dismantled by Tipoo's troops in 1790, and there is now hardly a trace left of it. In Baldaeus (Malabar und Coromandel, p. 109, Germ. ed.) there are several good views of Cranganore as it stood in the 17th century.

Cranny, s. In Bengal commonly used for a clerk writing English, and thence vulgarly applied generically to the East Indians, or half-caste class, from among whom English copyists are chiefly recruited. The original is Hind. karānī, which Wilson derives from Skt. karan, 'a doer.' Karana is also the name of one of the (so-called) mixt castes of the Hindus, sprung from a Sudra mother and Vaisya father, or (according to others) from a pure Kshatriya mother by a father of degraded Kshatriya origin. The occupation of the members of this mixt caste is that of writers and accountants.

The word was probably at one time applied by natives to the junior members of the Covenanted Civil Service—"Writers" as they were designated. See the quotations from the "Seir Mutagherin" and from Hugh Boyd. And in our own remembrance the "Writers' Buildings" in Calcutta, where those young gentlemen at one time were quartered (a range of apartments which has now been transfigured into a splendid series of public offices; but, wisely, has been kept to its old name), was known to the natives as Karānī kī Bārik.

Crape, s. This is no oriental word, though crape comes from China. It is the French crêpe, i.e. crepe, Lat. crispus, meaning frizzed or minutely curled. As the word is given in a 16th century quotation by Litré, it is probable that the name was first applied to a European texture.

"I own perhaps I might desire
Some shawls of true Cashmere—
Some narrow crapes of China silk,
Like wrinkled skins, or scalded milk."
O. W. Holmes, 'Contentment.'

Crease, Cris, &c. A kind of dagger, which is the characteristic weapon of the Malay nations; from the Javanese name of the weapon, adopted in Malay, viz. kris, kirīs, or kres (see Favre, Dict. Javanais-Français, 137 b., Crawford's Malay Dict. s.v., Jansz, Javanssch-Nederl. Woordenboek, 202). The word has been generalised, and is often applied to analogous weapons of other nations, as 'an Arab crease,' &c. It seems probable that the Hind. word kirich, applied to a straight sword, and now almost specifically to a sword of European make, is identical with the Malay word kris. See the form of the latter word in Barbosa, almost exactly kirich. Perhaps Turki kızılch is the original.

If Reinaud is right in his translation of the Arab Relations of the 9th and 10th centuries, in correcting a reading, otherwise unintelligible, to khrī, we shall have a very early adoption of this word by western travellers. It occurs, however, in a passage relating to Ceylon.

c. 910. "Formerly it was common enough to see in this island a man of the country walk into the market grasping in his hand a khri, i.e., a dagger peculiar to the country, of admirable make, and sharpened to the finest edge. The man would lay hands on the wealthiest of the merchants that he found, take him by the throat, brandish his dagger before his eyes, and finally drag him outside of the town. . . ."—Relation, &c., par Reinaud, p. 126; and see Arabic text, p. 120, near bottom.

1580. A vocabulary of "Wordses of the naturall language of Iaua" in the voyage of Sir Fr. Drake, has Cricke, 'a dagger.'—Hakluyt, iv. 246.

1586-88. "The custom is that whenever the King (of Java) doth die . . . the wives of the said King . . . every one with a dagger in her hand (which dagger they call a crese, and is as sharp as a razor) stab themselves to the heart."—Cavendish, in Hakl. iv. 337.

1591. "Furthermore I enjoin and order in the name of our said Lord . . . that no servant go armed whether it be with staves or daggers, or crisses."—Procl. of Viceroy Mathias d'Albuquerque in Archiv. Port. Oriental, fasc. 3, p. 325.

1598. "In the Western part of the Island (Sumatra) is Manancabo where they make Poinyards, which in India are called Cryses, which are very well accounted and esteemed of."—Linschoten, 33.

1602. " . . . Chinesische Dolchen, so sie Cris nennen."—Hulsius, i. 33.

c. 1610. "Ceux-là ont d'ordinaire à leur costé vn poignard ondé qui s'appelle cris, et qui vient d'Achen en Sumatra, de Iaua, et de la Chine."—Pyrard de la Val, i. 121; also see ii. 101.

1634. "Malayos crises, Arabes alfanges."—Malaca Conquistada, ix. 32.

1686. "The Cresset is a small thing like a Bagonet which they always wear in War or Peace, at Work or Play, from the greatest of them to the poorest or meanest person."—Dampier, i. 337.

1690. "And as the Japanners . . . rip up their Bowels with a Cric . . ."—Ovington, 173.

1727. "A Page of twelve Years of Age . . . (said) that he would shew him the Way to die, and with that took a Cress, and ran himself through the body."—A. Ham. ii. 99.

1770. "The people never go without a poniard which they call cris."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 97.

c. 1850-60. "They (the English) chew hashish, cut themselves with poisoned creases . . . taste every poison, buy every secret."—Emerson, English Traits.

The Portuguese also formed a word crisada, a blow with a cris (see Castanheda, iii. 379). And in English we find a verb to 'crease;' see in Purchas, i. 532, and this :

1604. "This Boyhog we tortured not, because of his confession, but crysed him."—Scott's Discourse of Iava, in Purchas, i. 175.

Also in Braddel's Abstract of the Sijara Malayu :

"He was in consequence creased at the shop of a sweetmeat seller, his blood flowed on the ground, but his body disappeared miraculously."—Sijara Malayu, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 318.

Credere, Del. An old mercantile term.

1813. "Del credere, or guaranteeing the responsibility of persons to whom goods were sold,—commission  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent."—Milburn, i. 235.

Creole, s. This word is never used by the English in India, though the mistake is sometimes made in England of supposing it to be an Anglo-Indian term. The original, so far as we can learn, is Span. criollo, a word of uncertain etymology, whence the French créole, a person of European blood but colonial birth. See Skeat, who concludes that criollo is a negro corruption of criadillo, dim. of criado, and is = 'little nursing.'

Crocodile, s. This word is seldom used in India; alligator (q.v.) being the term almost invariably employed.

c. 1328. "There be also coquodriles, which are vulgarly called calcatia* . . . These animals be like lizards, and have a tail stretched over all like unto a lizard's," etc.—Friar Jordanus, p. 19.

1590. "One Crocodile was so huge and greedy that he devoured an Alibamba, that is a chained company of eight or nine slaves; but the indigestible Iron paid him his wages, and murdered the murderer."—Andrew Battel (West Africa) in Purchas, ii. 985.

Crore, s. One hundred laks, i.e., 10,000,000. Thus a crore of rupees was for many years almost the exact equivalent of a million sterling. It had once been a good deal more, and has now been for some years a good deal less!

The Hind is karor, Sansk. koṭi.

c. 1315. "Kales Dewar, the ruler of Ma'bar, enjoyed a highly prosperous life . . . His coffers were replete with wealth, inasmuch that in the city of Mardi (Madura) there were 1200 crores of gold deposited, every crore being equal to a thousand laks, and every lak to one hundred thousand dinars."—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 52.

N.B.—The reading of the word crore is however doubtful here (see note by Elliot, in loco). In any case the value of crore is misstated by Wassaf.

c. 1343. "They told me that a certain Hindu farmed the revenue of the city and its territories (Daulatabad) for 17 karor . . . as for the karor it is equivalent to 100 laks, and the lak to 100,000 dinars."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 49.

c. 1350. "In the course of three years he had misappropriated about a kror of tankas from the revenue."—Zia-uddin-Barni, in Elliot, iii. 247.

c. 1590. "Zealous and upright men were put in charge of the revenues, each over one Kror of dams." (These, it appears, were called kroris.)—Ain-i-Albani, i. 13.

1609. "The King's yearly Income of his Crowne Land is fiftie Crou of Rupias, every Crou is an hundred Leckes, and every Leck is an hundred thousand Rupias."—Hawkins in Purchas, i. 216.

1623. "The revenues of all the territories under the Emperors of Dehli amounts, according to the Royal registers, to six arbs and thirty krors of dams. One arb is equal to a hundred krors (a kror being ten millions) and a hundred Krors of dams are equivalent to two krors and fifty lacs of rupees."—Muhammad Sharif Hanafi, in Elliot, vii. 138.

1690. "The Nabob or Governour of Bengal was reputed to have left behind him at his Death, twenty Courous of Roupies: A korou is an hundred thousand lacks."—Orington, 189.

1757. "In consideration of the losses which the English Company have sustained . . . I will give them one crore of rupees."—Orme, ii. 162 (ed. 1803).

c. 1785. "The revenues of the city of Decca, once the capital of Bengal, at a low estimation amount annually to two kherore."—Carraccioli's Life of Clive, i. 172.

1797. "An Englishman, for H.E.'s amusement, introduced the elegant European diversion of a race in sacks by old women: the Nabob was delighted beyond measure, and declared that though he had spent a crore of rupees . . . in procuring amusement, he had never found one so pleasing to him."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 407.

"Tell me what lies beyond our brazen gates."

Crow-pheasant, s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of a somewhat ignoble bird (Fam. Cuculidae), common all over the plains of India, in Burma, and the Islands, viz., Centropus rufipennis, Illiger. It is held in S. India to give omens.

1878. "The crow-pheasant stalks past with his chestnut wings drooping by his side."—Phil. Robinson, in My Indian Garden, 7.

1883. "There is that ungainly object the coucal, crow-pheasant, jungle-crow, or whatever else you like to call the miscellaneous thing, as it clambers through a creeper-laden bush or spreads its reddish-bay wings and makes a slow voyage to the next tree. To judge by its appearance only it might be a crow developing for a peacock, but its voice seems to have been borrowed from a black-faced monkey."—Tribes on my Frontier, 155.

Cubeb, s. The fruit of the Piper Cubeba, a climbing shrub of the Malay region.

The word and the article were well known in Europe in the Middle Ages, the former being taken directly from the Arab. kabābah. It was used as a spice like other peppers, though less common. The importation into Europe had become infinitesimal, when it revived in this century, owing to the medicinal power of the article having become known to our medical officers during the British occupation of Java (1811-1815). Several particulars of interest will be found in Hanbury and Flückiger's Pharmacog. 526, and in the notes to Marco Polo, ii. 380.

c. 943. "The territories of this Prince (the Maharaja of the Isles) produce all sorts of spices and aromatics . . . The exports are camphor, lign-aloes, clove, sandal-wood, betel-nut, nutmeg, cardamom, cubeb (al-kabābah) . . ."—Mas'udi, i. 341-2.

1298. "This Island (Java) is of surpassing wealth, producing black pepper, nutmegs, spikenard, galingle, cubebs, cloves. . . .—Marco Polo, ii. 254.

c. 1328. "There too (in Jaua) are produced cubebs, and nutmegs, and mace, and all the other finest spices except pepper."—Friar Jordanus, 31.

c. 1340. "The following are sold by the pound. Raw silk; saffron; clove-stalks and cloves; cubebs; lign-aloes . . . ."—Pegolotti, in Cathay, &c. p. 305.

c. 1390. "Take fresh pork, seethe it, chop it small, and grind it well; put to it hard yolks of eggs, well mixed together, with dried currants, powder of cinnamon, and maces, cubebs, and cloves whole."—Recipe in Wright's Domestic Manners, 350.

1563. "R. Let us talk of cubebs; although, according to Sepulveda, we seldom use them alone; and only in compounds.

"O. Tis not so in India; on the contrary they are much used by the Moors soaked in wine . . . and in their native region, which is Java, they are habitually used for coldness of stomach; you may believe me they hold them for a very great medicine."

Garcia, f. 80-80v.

1572. "The Indian physicians use Cubebs as cordials for the stomach. . . ."—Acosta, p. 138.

1612. "Cubebs, the pound. . . .xvi.s."—Rates and Valuation (Scotland).

1874. "In a list of drugs to be sold in the . . . city of Ulm, A.D. 1596, cubebs are mentioned . . . the price for half an ounce being 8 kreuzers."—Hand. & Flück, 527.

Cubeer Burr, n.p. This was a famous banyan-tree on an island in the Nerbudda, some 12 m. N.E. of Baroch, and a favourite resort of the English there in last century. It is described by Forbes in his Or. Memoirs, i. 28. He says it was thus called by the Hindus in memory of a favourite saint (no doubt Kabir Panth). Possibly, however, the name was merely the Arab. kabīr, 'great,' given by some Mahomedan, and misinterpreted into an allusion to the sectarian leader.

1818. "The popular tradition among the Hindus is that a man of great sanctity named Kubeer, having cleaned his teeth, as is practised in India, with a piece of stick, stuck it into the ground, that it took root, and became what it now is."—Copland, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 290.

Cucuya, Cucuyada, s. A cry of alarm or warning; Malayal. Kukkuya, to cry out; not used by English, but found among Portuguese writers, who formed cucuyada from the native word, as they did crisada from kris. See Correa, Lendas, ii. 2, 926. See also Tennent under Coss. Compare the Australian cooey.

Cuddalore, n.p. A place on the marine backwater 16 m. S. of Pondicherry, famous in the early Anglo-Indian history of Coromandel. It was settled by the Company in 1682-3, and Fort St. David's was erected there soon after. Probably the correct name is Kaḍal-ūr, "Sea-Town."

Cuddapah, n.p. Kaḍapa, a chief town and district of the Madras Presidency. The proper form is said to be Kripa.

It is always written Kurpah in Kirkpatrick's Tr. of Tippoo's Letters. It has been suggested as possible that it is the KAPITH (for KAPIH) of Ptolemy's Tables.

Cuddoo, s. A generic name for pumpkins. Hind. Kaddū.

Cuddy, s. The public or captain's cabin of an Indiaman or other passenger ship. We have not been able to trace the origin satisfactorily. It must, however, be the same with the Dutch and Germ. Kajute, which has the same signification. This is also the Scandinavian languages, Sw. in kajuta, Dan. kahyt, and Grimm quotes Kajute, "Casteria," from a vocabulary of Saxon words used in the first half of 15th century. It is perhaps originally the same with the Fr. cahute, 'a hovel,' which Littré quotes from 12th century as chahute, and 14th century as quahute. Duncange has L. Latin cahua, 'casa, tugurium,' but a little doubtfully.

1726. "Neither will they go into any ship's Cayuyt so long as they see any one in the Skipper's cabin or on the half-deck."—Valentin, Chorom. (and Pegu), 134.

1769. "It was his (the Captain's) invariable practice on Sunday to let down a canvas curtain at one end of the cuddy . . . and to read the church service,—a duty which he considered a complete clearance of the sins of the preceding week."—Life of Lord Teignmouth, i. 12.

Culgee, s. A jewelled plume surmounting the sirpesh or aigrette upon the turban. Shakespear gives kulghī as a Turki word. We have not found it in any other dictionary.

1715. "John Surman received a vest and Culgee set with precious stones."—Wheeler, ii. 246.

1786. "Three Kulgies, three Surpaishes (see Sirpech), and three Puduks (?) of the value of 36,320 rupees have been despatched to you in a casket."—Tippoo's Letters, 263.

Culmureea, Koormureea, s. Nautical Hind. kalmariya, 'a calm,' taken direct from Port. calmaria (Roebuck).

Culsey, s. According to the quotation a weight of about a candy (q.v.). We have traced the word, which is rare, also in Prinsep's Tables (ed. Thomas, p. 115), as a measure in use in Bhūj, kalsē. And we find R. Drummond gives it: "Kulsee or Culsy," (Guz.). A weight of sixteen maunds" (the Guzerat maunds are about 40lbs., therefore Kalsi = about 640 lbs.).

1813. "So plentiful are mangos . . . that during my residence in Guzerat they were sold in the public markets for one rupee the culsey; or 600 pounds in English weight."—Forbes, Orient. Mem. i. 30.

Cumbly, Cumly, Cummul, s. A blanket; a coarse woollen. Sansk. kambala, appearing in the vernaculars in slightly varying forms, e.g., Hind. kamlī. Our first quotation shows a curious attempt to connect this word etymologically with the Arab. hammal, 'a porter' (see Hummaul), and with the camel's hair of John Baptist's raiment. The word is introduced into Portuguese as cambolim, 'a cloak.'

c. 1350. "It is customary to make of those fibres wet-weather mantles for those rustics whom they call camalls,* whose business it is to carry burdens, and also to carry men and women on their shoulders in palankins (lectiois). . . . A garment, such as I mean, of this camall cloth (and not camel cloth) I wore till I got to Florence. . . . No doubt the raiment of John the Baptist was of that kind. For, as regards camel's hair, it is, next to silk, the softest stuff in the world, and never could have been meant . . . ."—John Marignolli, in Cathay, 366.

1606. "We wear nothing more frequently than those cambolins."—Gouvea, f. 132.

1673. "Leaving off to wonder at the Natives quivering and quaking after Sunset wrapping themselves in a Comby or Hair-Cloth."—Fryer, 54.

1690. "Camlees, which are a sort of Hair Coat made in Persia . . ."—Ovington, 455.

1718. "But as a body called the Cammulposhes, or blanket wearers, were going to join Qhandaoran, their commander, they fell in with a body of troops of Mahratta horse, who forbade their going further."—Scir Mutagherin, i. 143.

1781. "One comley as a covering . . .

1798. ". . . a large black Kummul, or blanket."—G. Foster, Travels, i. 194.

1800. "One of the old gentlemen, observing that I looked very hard at his cumly, was alarmed lest I should think he possessed numerous flocks of sheep."—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 281.

1813. Forbes has cameleens.—Or. Mem. i. 195.

Cummerbund, s. A girdle, Hind. from Pers. kamar-band, i.e. 'loin-band.' Such an article of dress is habitually worn in an ornamental form by domestic servants, peons, and irregular troops; but any waist belt is so termed.

1552. "The Governor arriving at Goa received there a present of a rich cloth of Persia which is called comarbados, being of gold and silk."—Castanheda, iii. 396.

1616. "The nobleman of Xaxma sent to have a sample of gallie pottes, jugges, podingers, lookinglasses, table bookes, chint brampton, and combarbands, with the prices."—Cocks's Diary, i. 147.

1638. "Ils serrent la veste d'une ceinture, qu'ils appellent Commerbant."—Mandelslo, 223.

1648. "In the middle they have a well adjusted girdle, called a Commerbant."—Van Twist, 55.

1727. "They have also a fine Turband, embroidered Shoes, and a Dagger of Value, stuck into a fine Cummerband, or Sash."—A. Ham. i. 229.

1810. "They generally have the turbans and cummer-bunds of the same colour, by way of livery."—Williamson, V. M. i. 274.

1880. ". . . The Punjab seems to have found out Manchester. A meeting of native merchants at Umritsur . . . describes the effects of a shower of rain on the English-made turbans and Kummerbunds as if their heads and loins were enveloped by layers of starch."—Pioneer Mail, June 17th.

Cumquot, s. The fruit of Citrus japonica, a miniature orange, often sent in jars of preserved fruits, from China. Kumkwat is the Canton pronunciation of kin-kü, 'gold orange,' the Chinese name of the fruit.

Cumra, s. Hind. kamra, from Port. camara; a chamber, a cabin.

Cumruna, s. See Carambola.

Cumshaw, s. Chin. Pigeon English for bucksheesh (q.v.), or a present of any kind. According to Giles it is the Amoy pron. (kam-sia) of two characters signifying 'grateful thanks.'

1879. "... they pressed upon us, blocking out the light, uttering discordant cries, and clamouring with one voice, Kum-sha, i.e. backsheesh, looking more like demons than living men."—Bird's Golden Chersonese, 70.

1882. "As the ship got under way, the Compradore's cumshas, according to 'olo custom,' were brought on board . . . dried lychee, Nankin dates . . . baskets of oranges, and preserved ginger."—The Fankwaë, 103.

Cunchunee, s. H. Kanchanī. A dancing-girl. According to Shakespear, this is the feminine of a caste, Kanchan, whose women are dancers. But there is a doubt as to this. Kanchan is 'gold'; also a yellow pigment, which the women may have used. See quot. from Bernier.

c. 1660. "But there is one thing that seems to me a little too extravagant . . . the publick Women, I mean not those of the Bazar, but those more retired and considerable ones that go to the great marriages at the houses of the Omrahs and Mansebdars to sing and dance, those that are called Kenchen, as if you should say the gilded, the blossoming ones . . ."—Bernier, E. T. 88.

c. 1661. "On regala dans le Serrail, toutes ces Dames Etrangères, de festins et des dances des Quenchenies, qui sont des femmes, et des filles d'une Caste de ce nom, qui n'ont point d'autre profession que celle de la danse."—Thevenot, v. 151.

1689. "And here the Dancing Wenches, or Quenchenies, entertain you, if you please."—Ovington, 257.

1799. "In the evening the Canchanis . . . have exhibited before the Prince and court."—Diary in Life of Colebrooke, 153.

1810. "The dancing-women are of different kinds . . . the Meerascens never perform before assemblies of men. . . . The Kunchenees are of an opposite stamp; they dance and sing for the amusement of the male sex."—Williamson, V. M. i. 386.

See Dancing Girl.

Curia Muria, n.p. The name of a group of islands off the S.E. coast of Arabia (Kharyān Maryān, of Edrisi).

1527. "Thus as they sailed, the ship got lost upon the coast of Fartaque in (the region of) Curia Muria; and having swum ashore they got along in company of the Moors by land to Calayata, and thence on to Ormuz."—Côrea, iii. 562; see also i. 366.

c. 1535. "Dopo Adem à Fartaque, e le isole Curia, Muria . . ."—Sommario de Regni, in Ramusio, f. 325.

1540. "We letted not to discover the Isles of Curia, Muria, and Avedalcuria (in orig. Abedalcuria)."—Mendez Pinto, E. T. p. 4.

1554. "... it is necessary to come forth between Sūkara and the islands Khūr or Mūria (Khūr Mōriyā)."—The Mohit, in Jour. As. Soc. Beng. v. 459.

1834. "The next place to Saugra is Koorya Moorya Bay."—J. R. Geog. Soc. iii. 208.

Curnum, s. Telug. karanam; a village accountant, a town-clerk. Acc. to Wilson from Skt. karaṇa; see Cranny.

Curounda, s. Hind. karaunda. A small plum-like fruit, which makes good jelly and tarts, and which the natives pickle. It is borne by Carissa carandas, L., a shrub common in many parts of India (N. O. Apocynaceae).

Curry, s. In the East the staple food consists of some cereal, either (as in N. India) in the form of flour baked into unleavened cakes, or boiled in the grain, as rice is. Such food having little taste, some small quantity of a much more savoury preparation is added as a relish, or 'kitchen,' to use the phrase of our forefathers. And this is in fact the proper office of curry in native diet. It consists of meat, fish, fruit, or vegetables, cooked with a quantity of bruised spices and turmeric; and a little of this gives a flavour to a large mess of rice. The word is Tamil, kari, i.e. 'sauce.' The Canarese form karil was that adopted by the Portuguese, and is still in use at Goa. It is remarkable in how many countries a similar dish is habitual; pilāo in the analogous mess in Persia, and kouskousou in Algeria; in Egypt a dish well known as ruzz mufalfal or "peppered rice." In England the proportions of rice and "kitchen" are usually reversed, so that the latter is made to constitute the bulk of the dish.

The oldest indication of the Indian cuisine in this kind, though not a very precise one, is cited by Athenaeus from Megasthenes: "Among the Indians, at a banquet, a table is set before each individual . . . and on the table is placed a golden dish on which they throw, first of all, boiled rice . . . and then they add many sorts of meat dressed after the Indian fashion" (Athen., by Yonge, iv. 39). The earliest precise mention of curry is in the Mahavanso (c. A. D. 477), where it is stated of Kassapo that "he partook of rice dressed in butter, with its full accompaniment of curries." This is Turnour's translation, the original Pali being sīpa.

It is possible, however, that the kind of curry used by Europeans and Mahomedans is not of purely Indian origin, but has come down from the spiced cookery of medieval Europe and Western Asia. The medieval spiced dishes in question were even coloured like curry. Turmeric, indeed, called by Garcia de Orta Indian saffron, was yet unknown in Europe, but it was represented by saffron and sandalwood. A notable incident occurs in the old English poem of King Richard, wherein the Lion-heart feasts on the head of a Saracen—

"soden full hastily
With powder and with spysory,
And with saffron of good colour."

Moreover, there is hardly room for doubt that capsicum or red pepper (see Chilly), was introduced into India by the Portuguese (see Hanbury and Flüchiger, 407); and this spice constitutes the most important ingredient in modern curries. The Sanskrit books of cookery, which cannot be of any considerable antiquity, contain many recipes for curry without this ingredient. A recipe for curry (caril) is given, according to Bluteau, in the Portuguese Arie de Cozinha, p. 101. This must be of the XVIIth century.

It should be added that kari was, among the people of S. India, the name of only one form of 'kitchen' for rice, viz. of that in consistency resembling broth, as several of the earlier quotations indicate. Europeans have applied it to all the savoury concoctions of analogous spicy character eaten with rice. These may be divided into three classes—viz. (1), that just noticed; (2), that in the form of a stew of meat, fish, or vegetables; (3), that called by Europeans 'dry curry.' These form the successive courses of a Hindu meal in S. India, and have in the vernaculars several discriminating names.

In Java the Dutch, in their employment of curry, keep much nearer to the original Indian practice. At a breakfast, it is common to hand round with the rice a dish divided into many sectoral spaces, each of which contains a different kind of curry, more or less liquid.

According to the Fankwaë at Canton, 1882, the word is used at the Chinese ports (we presume in talking with Chinese servants) in the form käärle (p. 62).

1560. "Then the Captain-major commanded them to cut off the hands and ears of all the crews, and put all that into one of the small vessels, into which he ordered them to put the friar, also without ears or nose or hands, which he ordered to be strung round his neck with a palm-leaf for the King, on which he told him to have a curry (caril) made to eat of what his friar brought him." *—Correa, Three Voyages, Hak. Soc. 331.

1563. "They made dishes of fowl and flesh, which they call caril."—Garcia, f. 68.

c. 1580. "The victual of these (renegade soldiers) is like that of the barbarous people; that of Moors all bringe; that of Gentoos rice-carril."—Primor e Honra, &c., f. 9v.

1598. "Most of their fish is eaten with rice, which they seeth in broth, which they put upon the rice, and is somewhat soure, as if it were sodden in gooseberries, or unripe grapes, but it tasteth well, and is called Carriel, which is their daily meat."—Linschoten, 88.

This is a good description of the ordinary tamarind curry of S. India.

1606. "Their ordinary food is boiled rice with many varieties of certain soups which they pour upon it, and which in those parts are commonly called caril."—Gouvea, 61b.

1608-1610. This perhaps indicates that the English curry is formed from the Portuguese caris, plural of caril.

N.B. Tennent is misled in supposing (i. 437) that chillies are mentioned in the Mahavanso. The word is maricha, which simply means "pepper," and which Turnour has translated erroneously (p. 158).

1874. "The craving of the day is for quasi-intellectual food, not less highly peppered than the curries which gratify the faded stomach of a returned Nabob."—Blackwood's Magazine, Oct. 434.

The Dutch use the word as Kerrie or Karrie; and Kari d' l'Indienne has a place in French cartes.

This device seems to be ascribed by Abul Fazl to the invention of Akbar. These roots are well known in France by the name vettyver, which is the Tamil name vettyvērū (vēr=root). In Mahr. and Guz. khashkas is 'poppy-seed.'

Custard-Apple, s. The name in India of a fruit (Anona squamosa, L.) originally introduced from S. America, but which spread over India during the 16th century. Its commonest name in Hindustan is sharīfa, i.e. 'noble'; but it is also called by the Hindus Ṣṭap'hal, i.e. 'the Fruit of Ṣṭa,' whilst another Anona ('bullock's-heart,' A. reticulata, L., the custard-apple of the W. Indies, where both names are applied to it) is called in the south by the name of her husband Rāmā. And the Ṣṭap'hal and Rāmp'hal have become the subject of Hindu legends (see Forbes, Oriental Memoirs, iii. 410). A curious controversy has arisen from time to time as to whether this fruit and its congeners were really imported from the New World, or were indigenous in India. They are not mentioned among Indian fruits by Baber (c. A.D. 1530), but the translation of the Ain (c. 1590) by Mr. Blochmann contains among the "Sweet Fruits of Hindustan," Custard-apple (p. 66). On referring to the original, however, the word is sadāp'hal (fructus perennis) a Hind. term for which Shakespear gives many applications, not one of them the anona. The bel is one (Aegle marmelos), and seems as probable as any (see Bael). The custard-apple is not mentioned by Garcia De Orta (1563), Linschoten (1597), or even by P. della Valle (1624). It is not in Bontius (1631), nor in Piso's commentary on Bontius (1638), but is described as an American product in the West Indian part of Piso's book, under the Brazilian name Araticu. Two species are described as common by P. Vincenzo Maria, whose book was published in 1672. Both the Custard-apple and the Sweet-sop are fruits now generally diffused in India; but of their having been imported from the New World, the name Anona, which we find in Oviedo to have been the native West Indian name of one of the species, and which in various corrupted shapes is applied to them over different parts of the East, is an indication. Crawford, it is true, in his 'Malay Dictionary' explains nona or buah- ("fruit") nona in its application to the custard-apple as fructus virginialis, from nona, the term applied in the Malay countries (like missey in India) to an unmarried European lady. But in the face of the American word this becomes out of the question.

It is, however, a fact that among the Bharhut sculptures, among the carvings dug up at Muttra by General Cunningham, and among the copies from wall-paintings at Ajanta (as pointed out by Dr. Birdwood in 1874,*) there is a fruit represented which is certainly very like a custard-apple (though an abnormally big one), and not very like anything else yet pointed out. General Cunningham is convinced that it is a custard-apple, and urges in corroboration of his view that the Portuguese in introducing the fruit (which he does not deny) were merely bringing coals to Newcastle; that he has found extensive tracts in various parts of India covered with the wild custard-apple; and also that this fruit bears an indigenous Hindi name, ātā or at, from the Sanskrit ātripya.

It seems hard to pronounce about this ātripya. A very high authority,† to whom we once referred, doubted whether the word (meaning "delightful") ever existed in real Sanskrit. It was probably an artificial name given to the fruit, and he compared it aptly to the factitious Latin of caureum malum for "orange," though the latter word really comes from the Sanskrit nāranga. On the other hand, ātripya is quoted by Raja Radhakant Deb, in his Sanskrit dictionary, from a mediæval work, the 'Dravyaguna.'

And the question would have to be considered how far the MSS. of such a work are likely to have been subject to modern interpolation. Sanskrit names have certainly been invented for many objects which were unknown till recent centuries. Thus, for example, Williams gives more than one word for cactus, or prickly pear, a class of plants which was certainly introduced from America (see Vidara and Vis-vasaraka, in his Skt. Dictionary).

A new difficulty, moreover, arises as to the indigenous claims of ātā, which is a name for the fruit in Malabar as well as in Upper India. For, on turning for light to the splendid works of the Dutch ancients, Rheede and Rumphius, we find in the former ('Hortus Malabaricus,' part iv.) a reference to a certain author, 'Recchus de Plantis Mexicanis,' as giving a drawing of a custard-apple tree, the name of which in Mexico was ahatē or atē, "fructu apud Mexicanos præcellenti arbor nobilis" (the expressions are noteworthy, for the most popular Hindustani name of the fruit is sharīfa = "nobilis"). We find also in a Manilla Vocabulary that ate or atte is the name of this fruit in the Philippines. And from Rheede we learn that in Malabar the ātā was sometimes called by a native name meaning "the Manilla jack-fruit;" whilst the Anona reticulata, or sweet-sop, was called by the Malabars "the Parangi (i.e., Firingi or Portuguese) jack-fruit."

These facts seem to indicate that probably the ātā and its name came to India from Mexico viā the Philippines, whilst the anona and its name came to India from Hispaniola viā the Cape. In the face of these probabilities the argument of General Cunningham from the existence of the tree in a wild state loses force. The fact is undoubted, and may be corroborated by the following passage from "Observations on the nature of the Food of the Inhabitants of South India," 1864, p. 12:

"I have seen it stated in a botanical work that this plant (Anona sq.) is not indigenous, but introduced from America, or the W. Indies. If so, it has taken most kindly to the soil of the Deccan, for the jungles are full of it." The author adds that the wild custard-apples saved the lives of many during famine in the Hyderabad country. But, on the other hand, the Argemone Mexicana, a plant of unquestioned American origin, is now one of the most familiar of weeds all over India.

The cashew (Anacardium occidentale), also of American origin, and carrying its American name with it to India, not only forms tracts of jungle now (as Dr. Birdwood has stated) in Canara and the Concan (and, as we may add from personal knowledge, in Tanjore), but was described by P. Vincenzo Maria, two hundred and twenty years ago, as then abounding in the wilder tracts of the western coast.

The question raised by General Cunningham is an old one, for it is alluded to by Rumphius, who ends by leaving it in doubt. We cannot say that we have seen any satisfactory suggestion of another (Indian) plant as that represented in the ancient sculpture of Bharhut. But it is well to get rid of fallacious arguments on either side.

In the "Materia Medica of the Hindus" by Uday Chand Dutt, with a Glossary by G. King, M.B., Calc. 1877, we find the following synonyme given:

"Anona squamosa: Skt. Gandagatra; Beng. Ātā; Hind. Sharīfa, and Sītā-phal.

"Anona reticulata: Skt. Lavali; Beng. Lonā."*

Cutch, s. See Catechu.

Cutch, n.p. Properly Kachchh, a native State in the West of India, immediately adjoining Sind, the Rajput ruler of which is termed the Rāo. The name does not occur, so far as we have found, in any of the earlier Portuguese writers, nor in Linschoten. The Skt. word kachchha seems to mean a morass, or low flat land.

Cutch Gundava, n.p. Kachchh Gandāva or Kachchh, a province of Biluchistan, under the Khan of Kela't, adjoining our province of Sind; a level plain, subject to inordinate heat in summer, and to the visitation of the simūm. Across the northern part of this plain runs the railway from Sukkur to Sibi. Gandava, the chief place, has been shown by Sir H. Elliot to be the Kandābāl or Kandhābāl of the Arab geographers of the 9th and 10th centuries. The name in its modern shape, or what seems intended for the same, occurs in the Persian version of the Chachnāmāh, or H. of the Conquest of Sind, made in A.D. 1216 (see Elliot, i. 166).

Cutchā, Kutcha, adj. Hind. kachchā, 'raw, crude, unripe, uncooked.' This word is, with its opposite pucka q.v. (pakkā), among the most constantly recurring Anglo-Indian colloquial terms, owing to the great variety of metaphorical applications of which both are susceptible. The following are a few examples only, but they will indicate the manner of use better than any attempt at comprehensive definition.

A pucka Brick is a properly kiln-burnt brick.

" House is of burnt brick or stone with lime, and generally with a terraced plaster roof.

" Road is a macadamised one.

" Appointment is permanent.

Captain Burton, in a letter dated Aug. 26th, 1879, and printed in the "Academy," (p. 177), explains the gypsy word gorgio, for a Gentile or non-Rommany, as being kachhā or cutch. This may be, but it does not carry conviction.

Cutch-pucka, adj. This term is applied in Bengal to a mixt kind of building in which burnt brick is used, but which is cemented with mud instead of lime-mortar.

Cutcherry, and in Madras Cut'chery, s. An office of administration, a court-house. Hind. Kachahri. Used also in Ceylon.

The word is not usually now, in Bengal, applied to a merchant's counting-house, which is called dufter, but it is applied to the office of an Indigo-Planter or a Zemindar, the business in which is more like that of a Magistrate's or Collector's Office.

In the service of Tippoo Sahib Cutcherry was used in peculiar senses besides the ordinary one. In the civil administration it seems to have been used for something like what we should call Department (see e.g. Tippoo's Letters, 292); and in the army for a division or large brigade (e.g. ib., 332; and see under Jyshe).

Cuttack, n.p. The chief city of Orissa, and district immediately attached. From Skt. kaṭaka, 'an army, a camp, a royal city.' This name Al-kataka is applied by Ibn Batuta in the 14th century to Deogir in the Deccan (iv. 46), or at least to a part of the town adjoining that ancient fortress.

1807. "The argeelah as well as the cyrus, and all the aquatic tribe are extremely fond of snakes, which they . . . swallow down their long throats with great despatch."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, p. 27.

1813. In Forbes's Or. Memoirs (ii. 277, seqq.), there is a curious story of a sahras (as he writes it) which Forbes had tamed in India, and which nine years afterwards recognised its master when he visited General Conway's menagerie at Park Place near Henley.

D.

Dabul, n.p. Dābhol. In the later middle ages a famous port of the Konkan, often coupled with Choul (q.v.), carrying on extensive trade with the West of Asia. It lies in the modern dist. of Ratnagiri, in lat. 17° 34', on the north bank of the Anjanwel or Vashishti R. In some maps (e.g., A. Arrow-smith's of 1816, long the standard map of India), and in W. Hamilton's Gazetteer, it is confounded with Dāpoli, 12m. north, and not a seaport.

c. 1475. "Dabyl is also a very extensive seaport, where many horses are brought from Mysore,* Rabast [Arabistan? v.e. Arabia], Khorassan, Turkistan, Neghistan."—Nikitin, p. 20. "It is a very large town, the great meeting-place for all nations living along the coast of India and of Ethiopia."—Ibid., 30.

1502. "The gale abated, and the caravels reached land at Dabul, where they rigged their lateen sails, and mounted their artillery."—Correa, Three Voyages of V. da Gama (Hak. Soc.), 308.

1510. "Having seen Ceval and its customs, I went to another city, distant from it two days journey, which is called Dabuli. . . . There are Moorish merchants here in very great numbers."—Varthema, 114.

* Mysore is nonsense. As suggested by Mr. J. Campbell in the Bombay Gazetteer, Misir (Egypt) is probably the word.

1516. "This Dabul has a very good harbour, where there always congregate many Moorish ships from various parts, and especially from Mekkah, Aden, and Ormuz with horses, and from Cambay, Diu, and the Malabar country."—Barbosa, 72.

1554. "23d Voyage, from Dābul to Aden."—The Mohit, in J. As. Soc. Beng., v. 464.

1572. See Camões, x. 72.

Dacca, n.p. Properly Dhākā. A city in the east of Bengal, once of great importance, especially in the later Mahomedan history; famous also for the "Dacca muslins" woven there, the annual advances for which, prior to 1801, are said to have amounted to £250,000.

c. 1612. "... liberos Osmanis assecutus vivos cepit, eosque cum elephantis et omnibus thesauris defuncti, postquam Daec Bengala metropolim esse reversus, misit ad regem."—De Laet, quoted by Blochmann, Ain, i. 521.

c. 1660. "The same Robbers took Sultan-Sujah at Daka, to carry him away in their Galeasses to Rakan..."—Bernier, E.T. 55.

1665. "Daca is a great Town, that extends itself only in length; every one coveting to have an House by the Ganges side. The length... is above two leagues. . . . These Houses are properly no more than paltry Huts built up with Bambouc's, and daub'd over with fat Earth."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 55.

1682. "The only expedient left was for the Agent to go himself in person to the Nabob and Duan at Decca."—Hedges, MS. Journal, October.

Dacoit, also Dacoo, s. Hind. dakait and dākūyat, dākū; a robber belonging to an armed gang. The term, being current in Bengal, got into the Penal Code. By law, to constitute dacoity, there must be five or more in the gang committing the crime. Beames derives the word from dākud, 'to shout,' a sense not in Shakespear's Dict.

1810. "Decoits, or water-robbers."—Williamson, V.M., ii. 396.

1812. "Dacoits, a species of depredators who infest the country in gangs."—Fifth Report, p. 9.

1817. "The crime of dacoity" (that is, robbery by gangs), says Sir Henry Strachey, "... has, I believe, increased greatly since the British administration of justice."—Mill, H. of B. I., v. 466.

1834. "It is a conspiracy! a false warrant!—they are Dakoos! Dakoos!!"—The Baboo, ii. 202.

1872. "Daroga! Why, what has he come here for? I have not heard of any dacoity or murder in the Village."—Gorinda Samanta, i. 264.

Dadny, s. H. dādñi; an advance made to a craftsman, a weaver, or the like, by one who trades in the goods produced.

1683. "Chuttermulland Deepchund, two Cassumbazar merchants, this day assured me Mr. Charnock gives out all his new Sicca Rupees for Dadny at 2 per cent., and never gives the Company credit for more than 1½ rupee—by which he gains and puts in his own pocket Rupees ¾ per cent. of all the money he pays, which amounts to a great Summe in ye Yeare: at least £1,000 sterling."—Hedges, MS. Journal, Oct. 2d.

1772. "I observe that the Court of Directors have ordered the gomastahs to be withdrawn, and the investment to be provided by Dadney merchants."—Warren Hastings to J. Purling, in Gleig, i. 227.

Dagbail, s. Hind. from Pers. dāgh-i-bel, 'spade-mark.' The line dug to trace out on the ground a camp,* or a road or other construction. As the central line of a road, canal, or railroad is the equivalent of English 'lockspit.'

Dagoba, s. Singhalese dāgaba, from Pali dhātugabbha, and Sansk. dhātugarbha, 'Relic-receptacle'; applied to any dome-like Buddhist shrine (see Tope and Pagoda). Gen. Cunningham alleges that the Chaitya was usually an empty tope dedicated to the Adhi-Buddha (or Supreme, of the quasi-Theistic Buddhists), whilst the term Dhātu-garbha, or Dhagoba, was properly applied only to a tope which was an actual relic-shrine, or repository of ashes of the dead (Bhilsa Topes, 9).

We are unable to say who first introduced the word into European use. It was well known to William von Humboldt, and to Ritter; but it has become more familiar through its frequent occurrence in Fergusson's Hist. of Architecture.

The only surviving example of the native use of this term on the Continent of India, so far as we know, is in the neighbourhood of the remains of the great Buddhist establishments at Nalanda in Behar. See quotation below.

1806. "In this irregular excavation are left two dhagopes, or solid masses of stone, bearing the form of a cupola."—Salt; Caves of Salsette, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo., i. 47, pub. 1819.

1823. "... from the centre of the screens or walls, projects a daghope."—Des. of Caves near Nasik, by Lt.-Col. Delamaine in As. Journal, N.S. 1830, vol. iii. 276.

1834. "... Mihindu-Kumara . . . preached in that island (Ceylon) the Religion of Buddha, converted the aforesaid King, built Dagobas (Dagops, i.e. sanctuaries under which relics or images of Buddha are deposited) in various places."—Ritter, Asien, Bd. iii. 1162.

1835. "The Temple (cave at Nāsik) . . . has no interior support, but a rock-ceiling richly adorned with wheel-ornaments and lions, and in the end-niche a Dagop . . ."—Id. iv. 683.

1836. "Although the Dagops, both from varying size and from the circumstance of their being in some cases independent erections and in others only elements of the internal structure of a temple, have very different aspects, yet their character is universally recognised as that of closed masses devoted to the preservation or concealment of sacred objects."—W. v. Humboldt, Kawi-Sprache, i. 144.

1840. "We performed pradakshina round the Dhagobs, reclined on the living couches of the devotees of Nirwan."—Letter of Dr. John Wilson, in Life, 282.

1853. "At the same time he (Sakya) foresaw that a dāgoba would be erected to Kantaka on the spot. . . ."—Hardy, Manual of Buddhism, 160.

1855. "All kinds and forms are to be found . . . the bell-shaped pyramid of dead brickwork in all its varieties . . . the bluff knob-like dome of the Ceylon Dagobas . . ."—Mission to Ava, 35.

1872. "It is a remarkable fact that the line of mounds (at Nalanda in Bihar) still bears the name of 'dagop' by the country people. Is not this the dagoba of the Pāli annals?"—Broadley, Buddh. Remains of Bihār, in J. A. S. B. xli, Pt. i. 305.

Dagon, n.p. A name often given by old European travellers to the place now called Rangoon, from the great Relic-shrine or Dagoba there, called Shwé (Golden) Dagôn. Some have suggested that it is a corruption of dagoba, but this is merely guesswork. In the Talaing language tā'kkān signifies 'athwart,' and, after the usual fashion, a legend had grown up connecting the name with a story of a tree lying 'athwart the hill-top,' which supernaturally indicated where the sacred relics of one of the Buddhas had been deposited (see J. A. S. B., xxxviii. 477).

Prof. Forchhammer has recently (see Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of B. Burma, No. 1) explained the true origin of the name. Towns lying near the sacred site had been known by the successive names of Asitāñña-nagara and Ukkalanagara. In the 12th century the last name disappears and is replaced by Trikumbha-nagara, or in Pāli form Tikumbha-nagara, signifying '3-Hill-city.* The Kalyāni inscriptions near Pegu contain both forms. Tikumbha gradually in popular utterance became Tikum, Tāikum, and Tāekum, whence Dagôn. The classical name of the great Dagoba is Tikumbha-cheti, and this is still in daily Burman use. When the original meaning of the word Tāekum had been effaced from the memory of the Talaings, they invented the fable alluded to above in connexion with the word tā'kkān.

c. 1546. "He hath very certain intelligence, how the Zemindoo hath raised an army, with an intent to fall upon the Towns of Cosmin and Dalaa (qq.v.), and to gain all along the rivers of Digon and Meidoo, the whole Province of Donaphun, even to Ansadaa (hod. Donabyu and Henzada).—F. M. Pinto, tr. by H. C. 1653, p. 288.

c. 1585. "After landing we began to walk, on the right side, by a street some 50 paces wide, all along which we saw houses of wood, all gilt, and set off with beautiful gardens in their fashion, in which dwell all the Talapoins, which are their Friars, and the rulers of the Pagode or Varella of Dogon."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 96.

c. 1587. "About two dayes iourney from Pegu there is a Varelle (see Varella) or Pagode, which is the pilgrimage of the Pegues: it is called Dogonne, and is of a wonderfulle bignesse, and all gilded from the foot to the toppe."—R. Fitch in Hakl. ii. 398.

c. 1755. Dagon and Dagoon occur in a paper of this period in Dalrymple's Oriental Repertory, i. 141, 177.

Daibul, n.p. See Diulsind.

Daiseye, s. This word, representing Desai, repeatedly occurs in Kirkpatrick's Letters of Tipoo (e.g. p. 196) for a local chief of some class. See Dessaye.

Kumbha means an earthen pot, and also the "frontal globe on the upper part of the forehead of the elephant." The latter meaning was, according to Prof. Forchhammer, that intended, being applied to the hillocks on which the town stood, because of their form. But the Burmese applied it to 'alms-bowls,' and invented a legend of Buddha and two disciples having buried their alms-bowls at this spot.

Dala, n.p. This is now a town on the (west) side of the river of Rangoon, opposite to that city. But the name formerly applied to a large province in the Delta, stretching from the Rangoon River westward.

1546. See Pinto under Dagon.

1585. "The 2d November we came to the city of Dala, where among other things there are 10 halls full of elephants, which are here for the King of Pegu, in charge of various attendants and officials."—Gasp. Balbi, f. 95.

Dalaway, s. In S. India the Commander-in-chief of an army. Cananese and Malayāl. dhalavāy and dalavāyi. In old Cananese, dhalā = army.

1615. "Caeterum Deleuanius . . . vehementer à rege contendit, ne cōfitteret vt vllum condenda nova hac urbe Arcomaganensis portus antiquissimus detrimentum caperet."—Jarric, Thesaurus, i. 179.

1700. "Le Talavai, c'est le nom qu'on donne au Prince, qui gouverne aujourd'hui le Royaume sous l'autorité de la Reine."—Lettres Édif. x. 162. See also p. 173 and xi. 90.

1754. "You are imposed on, I never wrote to the Maissore King or Dalloway any such thing, nor they to me; nor had I a knowledge of any agreement between the Nabob and the Dalloway."—Letter from Gov. Saunders of Madras to French Deputies in Cambridge's Acct. of the War, App. p. 29.

1763-78. "He (Haidar) has lately taken the King (Mysore) out of the hands of his Uncle, the Dalaway."—Orme, iii. 636.

Daloyet, Deloyet, s. An armed attendant and messenger, the same as a Peon, q.v., Hind. dhalāyat, Wilson thinks from dhāl, 'a shield.' The word is never now used in Bengal and Upper India.

1772. "Suppose every farmer in the province was enjoined to maintain a number of good serviceable bullocks . . . obliged to furnish the Government with them on a requisition made to him by the Collector in writing (not by sepoys, delects (sic), or hercarras).—W. Hastings to G. Vansittart, in Gleig, i. 237.

1809. "As it was very hot, I immediately employed my delogets to keep off the crowd."—Ld. Valentia, i. 339.

The word here and elsewhere in that book is a misprint for delogets.

Dam, s. Hind. dām. Originally an actual copper coin, regarding which we find the following in the Ain:

"1. The Dām weighs 5 tānkis, i.e. 1 tolah, 8 māshahs, and 7 surkhs; it is the fortieth part of a rupee. At first this coin was called Paisah, and also Bahloli; now it is known under this name (dām). On one side the place is given where it was struck, on the other the date. For the purpose of calculation, the dām is divided into 25 parts, each of which is called a jētn. This imaginary division is only used by accountants.

"2. The adhelah is half of a dām.

3. The Pāulah is a quarter of a dām.

4. The damrī is an eighth of a dām" (p. 31).

It is curious that Akbar's revenues were registered in this small currency, viz. in laks of dāms. We may compare the Portuguese use of reis (q.v.).

The tendency of denominations of coin is always to sink in value. The jetal (q.v.), which had become an imaginary money of account in Akbar's time, was, in the 14th century, a real coin, which Mr. E. Thomas, chief of Indian numismatologists, has unearthed. And now the dām itself is imaginary. According to Elliot the people of the N. W. P. not long ago calculated 25 dāms to a paisa, which would be 1600 to a rupee. Carnegie gives the Oudh popular currency table as:

26 kauris	=	1 damrī
1 damrī	=	3 dām
20	=	1 ānā
25 dām	=	1 pice .

But the Calcutta Glossary says the dām is in Bengal reckoned =  $\frac{1}{36}$  of an ānā, i.e., 320 to the rupee. We have not in our own experience met with any reckoning of dāms. In the case of the damrī the denomination has increased instead of sinking in relation to the dām. For above we have the damrī = 3 dāms, or according to Elliot (Beames, ii. 296) =  $3\frac{1}{2}$  dāms, instead of  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a dām as in Akbar's time. But in reality the damrī's absolute value has remained the same. For by Carnegie's table 1 rupee or 16 ānas would be equal to 320 damris, and by the Ain, 1 rupee =  $40 \times 8$  damris = 320 damris. Damrī is a common enough expression for the infinitesimal in coin, and one has often heard a Briton in India say: "No! I won't give a damrī!" with but a vague notion what a damrī meant, as in Scotland we have heard, "I won't give a plack," though certainly the speaker could not have stated the value of that ancient coin. And this leads to the suggestion that a like expression, often heard from coarse talkers in England as well as in India, originated in the latter country, and that whatever profanity there may be in the animus there is none in the etymology, when such an one blurts out "I don't care a dām!" i.e., in other words, "I don't care a brass farthing!"

If the Gentle Reader deems this a far-fetched suggestion, let us back it by a second. We find in Chaucer (The Miller's Tale):

"— ne raught he not a kers," which means, "he recked not a cross" (ne flocci quidem); an expression which is found also in Piers Plowman:

"Wisdom and witte nowe is not worthe a kersc."

And this we doubt not has given rise to that other vulgar expression, "I don't care a curse;"—curiously parallel in its corruption to that in illustration of which we quote it.

1628. "The revenue of all the territories under the Emperors of Dehli amounts, according to the Royal registers, to 6 arbs and 30 krors of dāms. One arb is equal to 100 krors (a kror being 10,000,000), and a hundred krors of dāms are equal to 2 krors and 50 lacs of rupees."—Muhammad Sharif Hanafi, in Elliot, vii. 138.

1881. "A Bavarian printer, jealous of the influence of capital, said that 'Cladstone baid millions of money to the beebie to fote' for him, and Beegonsfeel would not bay them a tam, so they fote for Cladstone."—A Socialist Picnic, in St. James's Gazette, July 6th.

Daman, n.p. Damān, one of the old settlements of the Portuguese which they still retain, on the coast of Guzerat, about 100 miles north of Bombay; written by them Damão.

1554. "... the pilots said: 'We are here between Diu and Daman; if the ship sinks here, not a soul will escape; we must make sail for the shore.'—Sidi Ali, 80.

1623. "Il capitano... sperava che potessimo esser vicini alla città di Daman; laqual esta dentro il golfo di Cambaia a man destra...."—P. della Valle, ii. 499.

Damani, s. Applied to a kind of squall. See Elephanta.

Dammer, s. This word is applied to various resins in different parts of India, chiefly as substitutes for pitch. The word appears to be Malayo-

Javanese damar, used generically for resins, a class of substances the origin of which is probably often uncertain. To one of the dammer-producing trees of the Archipelago the name Dammara alba, Rumph. (N.O. Coniferæ), has been given, and this furnishes the 'East India Dammer' of English varnish-makers. In Burma the dammer used is derived from at least three different genera of the N. O. Dipterocarpeæ; in Bengal it is derived from the Sāl tree (Shorea robusta) and other Shoreæ, as well as by importation from transmarine sources. In S. India "white dammer," "Dammer Pitch," or Piney resin, is the produce of Vateria indica, and "black dammer" of Canarium strictum; in Cutch the dammer used is stated by Lieut. Leech (Bombay Selections, No. xv., pp. 215-216) to be made from chandruā (or chandras = copal) boiled with an equal quantity of oil. This is probably Fryer's 'rosin taken out of the sea' (infra). Some of the Malay dammer also seems, from Major M'Nair's statement, to be, like copal, fossil.

The word is sometimes used in India for 'a torch,' because torches are formed of rags dipped in it. This is perhaps the use which accounts for Hæx's explanation below.

1584. "Demnar (for demmar) from Siacca and Blington" (i.e. Siak and Billiton).—Barret in Hakluyt, ii. 43.

1631. In Hæx's Malay Vocabulary: "Damar, Lumen quod accenditur."

1673. "The Boat is not strengthened with Knee-Timbers as ours are, the bended Planks are sowed together with Rope-yarn of the Cocoe, and calked with Dammar (a sort of Rosin taken out of the sea)."—Fryer, 37.

"The long continued Current from the Inland Parts (at Surat) through the vast Wildernesses of huge Woods and Forests, wafts great Rafts of Timber for Shipping and Building: and Damar for Pitch, the finest sented Bitumen (if it be not a gum or Rosin) I ever met with."—Ib. 121.

1727. "Damar, a Gum that is used for making Pitch and Tar for the use of Shipping."—A. Ham. ii. 73.

c. 1755. "A Demar-Boy (Torch-boy)."—Ives, 50.

1878. "This dammar, which is the general Malayan name for resin, is dug out of the forests by the Malays, and seems to be the fossilised juices of former growth of the jungle."—McNair, Perak, &c., 138.

Dana, s. Hind. dāna; literally

'grain,' and therefore the exact translation of gram in its original sense (q.v.). It is often used (in Bengal) as synonymous with gram, thus: "Give the horse his dāna." We find it also used in this specific way by an old traveller:

1616. "A kind of graine called Donna, somewhat like our Pease, which they boyle, and when it is cold give them mingled with course Sugar, and twice or thrise in the weeke, Butter to scoure their Bodies."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

Dancing-girl, s. This, or among the older Anglo-Indians, Dancing-Wench, was the representative of the (Portuguese Bailadeira) Bayadère or Nautch-girl (qq. v.), also Cunchunee, &c.).

In S. India dancing-girls are all Hindu; in N. India they are both Hindu, called Rāmjanī (see Rumjohnny), and Mussulman, called Kanchanī (see Cunchunee). In Dutch the phrase takes a very plainspoken form, see quotation from Valentijn.

1606. See description by Gourea, f. 39.

1673. "After Supper they treated us with the Dancing Wenches, and good soops of Brandy and Deif Beer, till it was late enough."—Fryer, 152.

1701. "The Governor conducted the Nabob into the Consultation Room. . . . after dinner they were diverted with the Dancing Wenches."—In Wheeler, i. 377.

1726. "Wat de dans-Hoeren (anders Dewataschi * . . . genaamd, en an de Goden hunner Fagoden als getrouwd) belangd."—Valentijn, Chor, 54.

1763-78. "Mandelslow tells a story of a Nabob who cut off the heads of a set of dancing girls . . . - because they did not come to his palace on the first summons."—Orme, i. 28 (ed. 1803).

1789. . . . "dancing girls who display amazing agility and grace in all their motions."—Munro, Narrative, 73.

c. 1812. "I often sat by the open window, and there, night after night, I used to hear the songs of the unhappy dancing girls, accompanied by the sweet yet melancholy music of the cithāra."—Mrs. Sherwood's Autobiog. 423.

1815. "Dancing girls were once numerous in Persia; and the first poets of that country have celebrated the beauty of their persons and the melody of their voices."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, ii. 587.

1838. "The Maharajah sent us in the evening a new set of dancing girls, as they were called, though they turned out to be twelve of the ugliest old women I ever saw."

—Osborne, Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh, 154.

1843. "We decorated the Temples of the false gods. We provided the dancing-girls. We gilded and painted the images to which our ignorant subjects bowed down."—Macaulay's Speech on the Sonnauth Proclamation.

Dandy, s. (a). A boatman. The term is peculiar to the Gangetic rivers. Hind. and Beng. dāndī, from dānd or dānd, 'a staff, an oar.'

1685. "Our Dandees (or boatmen) boyled their rice, and we supped here."—Hedgcs, Jan. 6.

1763. "The oppressions of your officers were carried to such a length that they put a stop to all business, and plundered and seized the Dandies and Mangies' vessel."—W. Hastings to the Nawab, in Long, 347.

1809. "Two naked dandys paddling at the head of the vessel."—Ld. Valentia, i. 67.

1824. "I am indeed often surprised to observe the difference between my dandees (who are nearly the colour of a black teapot) and the generality of the peasants whom we meet."—Bp. Heber, i. 149 (ed. 1844).

—(b). A kind of ascetic who carries a staff. Same etymology. See Solvyns, who gives a plate of such an one.

—(c). Hind. same spelling, and same etymology. A kind of vehicle used in the Himalaya, consisting of a strong cloth slung like a hammock to a bamboo staff, and carried by two (or more) men. The traveller can either sit sideways, or lie on his back. It is much the same as the Malabar muncheel (q.v.).

1876. "In the lower hills when she did not walk she travelled in a dandy."—Kinloch, Large Game Shooting in Thibet, 2nd S., p. vii.

Darjeeling, or Dārjiling, n.p. A famous sanitarium in the Eastern Himalaya, the cession of which was purchased from the Raja of Sikkim in 1835; a tract largely added to by an annexation in 1849, following on an outrage committed by the Sikkim Minister in imprisoning Dr. (now Sir) Joseph Hooker and the late Dr. A. Campbell, Superintendent of Darjeeling. The sanitarium stands at 6500 to 7500 feet above the sea. The popular Tibetan spelling of the name is, according to Jaeschke, r Dor-rje-glin, 'Land of the Dorje,' i.e. 'of the Adamant, or thunderbolt,' the ritual sceptre of the Lamas. But 'according to several titles of books in the Petersburg list of MSS. it ought properly to be spelt Dar-rgyas-glin' (Tib. Engl. Dict. p. 287).

Darōga, s. Pers. and Hind. dārōgha. This word seems to be originally Mongol (see Kovalevsky's Dict. No. 1672). In any case it is one of those terms brought by the Mongol hosts from the far East. In their nomenclature it was applied to the Governor of a province or city, and in this sense it continued to be used under Timur and his immediate successors. But it is the tendency of official titles, as of denominations of coin, to descend in value; and that of dārōgha has in later days been bestowed on a variety of humbler persons. Wilson defines the word thus: "The chief native officer in various departments under the native government, a superintendent, a manager: but in later times he is especially the head of a police, customs, or excise station." Under the British police system, from 1793 to 1862-63, the Darogha was a local Chief of Police, or Head Constable.

The word occurs in the sense of Governor in a Mongol inscription, of the year 1314, found in the Chinese Province of Shensi, which is given by Pauthier in his Marc Pol, p. 773. The Mongol Governor of Moscow, during a part of the Tartar domination in Russia, is called in the old Russian Chronicles Doroga (see Hammer, Golden Horde, 384). And according to the same writer the word appears in a Byzantine writer (unnamed) as Δάρπυας (Ib. 238-9).

c. 1220. "Tuli Khan named as Darugha at Merv one called Barmas, and himself marched upon Nishapur."—Abulghāzi, by Demaisons, 135.

1441. . . . "I reached the city of Kerman. . . . The deroghah (governor) the Emir Hadji Mohamed Kaiaschirin, being then absent. . . ."—Abdurrazak, in India in the XVth Cent., p. 5.

c. 1590. "The officers and servants attached to the Imperial Stables. 1. The Atbegi. . . . 2. The Dārōghah. There is one appointed for each stable. . . ."—Ain, i. 137.

1621. "The 10th of October, the darogā, or Governor of Ispahan, Mir Abdulaazim, the King's son-in-law, who, as was afterwards seen in that charge of his, was a downright madman..."—P. della Valle, ii. 166.

1673. "The Droger, or Mayor of the City, or Captain of the Watch, or the Rounds; It is his duty to preside with the Main Guard a-nights before the Palace-Gates."—Ferr, 339.

1673. "The Droger being Master of his Science, persists; what comfort can I reap from your Disturbance?"—Ib. 389.

1682. "I received a letter from Mr. Hill at Rajemaul advising ye Droga of ye Mint would not obey a Copy, but required at least a sight of ye Originall."—Hedges, Dec. 14.

c. 1781. "About this time, however, one day being very angry, the Darogha, or master of the mint, presented himself, and asked the Nawaub what device he would have struck on his new copper coinage. Hydur, in a violent passion, told him to stamp an obscene figure on it."—Hydur Naik, tr. by Miles, 488.

1812. "Each division is guarded by a Darogha, with an establishment of armed men."—Fifth Report, 44.

Datchin, s. This word is used in old books of Travel and Trade for a steelyard employed in China and the Archipelago. It is given by Leyden as a Malay word for 'balance,' in his Comp. Vocab. of Burma, Malay and Thai, Serampore, 1810. It is also given by Crawford as dachin, a Malay word from the Javanese. There seems to be no doubt that in Peking dialect ch'eng is 'to weigh,' and also 'steelyard'; that in Amoy a small steelyard is called ch'in; and that in Canton dialect the steelyard is called t'okch'ing. Some of the Dictionaries also give ta 'ch'eng, 'large steelyard.' Datchin or dotchin may therefore possibly be a Chinese term; but, considering how seldom traders' words are really Chinese, and how easily the Chinese monosyllables lend themselves to plausible combinations, it remains probable that the Canton word was adopted from foreigners. It has sometimes occurred to us that it might have been borrowed from Achin (d'Achin); see the first quotation.

1554. At Malacca. "The baar of the great Dachem contains 200 cates, each cate weighing two arratels, 4 ounces, 5 eighths, 15 grains, 3 tenths. . . . The baar of the little Dachem contains 200 cates; each cate weighing two arratels."—A. Nunes, 39.

1696. "For their Dotchin and Ballance they use that of Japan."—Boveyear's Journal at Cochin-China, in Dalrymple, O. R., i. 88.

1711. "Never weigh your Silver by their Dotchins, for they have usually two Pair, one to receive, the other to pay by."—Lockyer, 113.

"In the Dotchin, an expert Weigher will cheat two or three per cent. by placing or shaking the Weight, and minding the Motion of the Pole only."—Ib. 115.

1711. "... every one has a Chopchin and Dotchin to cut and weigh silver."—Ib. 141.

1748. "These scales are made after the manner of the Roman balance, or our English Stillards, called by the Chinese Litang, and by us Dot-chin."—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748, &c., London, 1762, p. 324.

The same book has, in a short vocabulary at p. 265, "English scales or dodgeons. . . Chinese Litang."

Datura, s. This Latin-like name is really Sansk. dhattūra, and so has past into the derived vernaculars. The widely spread Datura Stramonium, or Thorn-apple, is well known over Europe, but is not regarded as indigenous to India; though it appears to be wild in the Himalāya from Kashmir to Sikkim. The Indian species, from which our generic name has been borrowed, is Datura alba, Nees* (D. fastuosa, L.). Garcia de Orta mentions the common use of this by thieves in India. Its effect on the victim was to produce temporary alienation of mind, and violent laughter, permitting the thief to act unopposed. He describes his own practice in treating such cases, which he had always found successful. Datura was also often given as a practical joke, whence the Portuguese called it Burladora ('Joker'). De Orta strongly disapproves of such pranks. The criminal use of datura by a class of Thugs is rife in our own time. One of the present writers has judicially convicted many. Coolies returning with fortunes from the colonies often become the victims of such crimes.

1563. "Maid servant. A black woman of the house has been giving datura to my mistress; she stole the keys, and the jewels that my mistress had on her neck and in her jewel box, and has made off with a black man. It would be a kindness to come to her help."—Garcia, Colloquios, f. 83.

1578. "They call this plant in the Malabar tongue unmata caya. . . in Canarese Datyro. . . ."—Acosta, 87.

1598. "They name likewise an hearbe called Deutroa, which beareth a seede, whereof bruising out the sap, they put it into a cup, or other vessell, and give it to their husbands, eyther in meate or drinke, and presently therewith the Man is as though hee were halfe out of his wits."—Linschoten, 60.

1608-10. "Mais ainsi de mesme les femmes quand elles scauent que leurs maris en entretiennent quelqu'autre, elles s'en desfont par poison ou autrement, et se seruent fort à cela de la semence de Datura, qui est d'une estrange vertu. Ce Datura ou Duroa, espee de Stramonium, est vne plante grande et haute qui porte des fleurs blanches en Campanne, comme le Cusampelo, mais plus grande."—Mocquet, Voyages, 312.

1673. "Dutry, the deadliest sort of Solarium (Solanum) or Nightshade."—Fryer, 32.

"Make lechers and their punks with dewtry Commit fantastical adwotry."

Hudibras, Pt. iii. Canto 1.

1690. "And many of them (the Moors) take the liberty of mixing Dutra and Water together to drink . . . which will intoxicate almost to Madness."—Orington, 235.

1810. "The datura that grows in every part of India."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 135.

1874. "Datura. This plant, a native of the East Indies, and of Abyssinia, more than a century ago had spread as a naturalized plant through every country in Europe except Sweden, Lapland, and Norway, through the aid of gipsy quacks, who used the seed as anti-spasmodics, or for more questionable purposes."—R. Brown, in Geog. Magazine, i. 371.

Note.—The statements derived from Hanbury and Flückiger in the beginning of this article disagree with this view, both as to the origin of the European datura and the identity of the Indian plant. The doubts about the birthplace of the various species of this genus remain in fact undetermined.

Datura, Yellow, and Yellow Thistle. These are Bombay names for the Argemone mexicana,—fico del inferno of Spaniards, introduced accidentally from America, and now an abundant and pestilent weed all over India.

Dawk, s. Hind. and Mahr. dāk. 'Post,' i.e. properly transport by relays of men and horses, and thence 'the mail' or letter-post, as well as any arrangement for travelling, or for transmitting articles for such relays. The institution was no doubt imitated from the barid, or post, established throughout the empire of the Caliphs by Mo'awia. And barid is itself connected with the Latin verēdus, and verēdius.

c. 1310. "It was the practise of the Sultan (Alā-uddīn) when he sent an army on an expedition to establish posts on the road, wherever posts could be maintained. . . . At every half or quarter kos runners were posted . . . the securing of accurate intelligence from the court on one side and the army on the other was a great public benefit."—Zid-uddin Barni, in Elliot, iii. 203.

c. 1340. "The foot-post (in India) is thus arranged: every mile is divided into three equal intervals which are called Dāwah, which is as much as to say 'the third part of a mile' (the mile itself being called in India Koruh). At every third of a mile there is a village well inhabited, outside of which are three tents where men are seated ready to start. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 95.

"So he wrote to the Sultan to announce our arrival, and sent his letter by the dāwah, which is the foot post, as we have told you."—Ibid. 145.

"At every mile (i.e. Koruh or coss) from Dehli to Daulatabad there are three dāwah or posts."—Ibid. 191-2.

It seems probable that this dāwah is some misunderstanding of ḍāk.

"There are established, between the capital and the chief cities of the different territories, posts placed at certain distances from each other, which are like the post-relays in Egypt and Syria . . . but the distance between them is not more than four bowshots or even less. At each of these posts ten swift runners are stationed . . . as soon as one of these men receives a letter he runs off as rapidly as possible. . . . At each of these post stations there are mosques, where prayers are said, and where the traveller can find shelter, reservoirs full of good water, and markets . . . so that there is very little necessity for carrying water, or food, or tents."—Shahābuddin Dimishki, in Elliot, iii. 581.

c. 1612. "He (Akbar) established posts throughout his dominions, having two horses and a set of footmen stationed at every five coss. The Indians call this establishment 'Dak chowky.'"—Firishda, by Briggs, ii. 280-1.

1657. "But when the intelligence of his (Dara-Shekoh's) officious meddling had spread abroad through the provinces by the dak chauki. . . ."—Khāfi Khān, in Elliot, vii. 214.

1727. "The Post in the Mogul's Dominions goes very swift, for at every Caravan-seray, which are built on the High-roads, about ten miles distant from one another, Men, very swift of Foot, are kept ready. . . . And those Curriers are called Dog Chouckies."—A. Ham. i. 149.

1771. "I wrote to the Governor for permission to visit Calcutta by the Dawks. . . ."—Letter in the Intrigues of a Nabob, &c., 76.

1781. "I mean the absurd, unfair, irregular and dangerous Mode, of suffering People to pass over their Neighbour's Letters at the Dock. . . ."—Letter in Hicky's Bengal Gazette, Mar. 24.

1796. "The Honble. the Governor-General in Council has been pleased to order the re-establishment of Dawk Bearers upon the new road from Calcutta to Benares and Patna. . . . The following are the rates fixed. . . .

"From Calcutta to Benares . . . Sicca Rupees 500."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 185.

1809. "He advised me to proceed immediately by Dawk. . . ."—Ld. Valentia, i. 62.

1824. "The dāk or post carrier having passed me on the preceding day, I dropped a letter into his leathern bag, requesting a friend to send his horse on for me."—Seely, Wonders of Ellora, ch. iv.

A letter so sent by the post-runner, in the absence of any receiving office, was said to go "by outside dawk."

1843. "JAM: You have received the money of the British for taking charge of the dawk; you have betrayed your trust, and stopped the dawks. . . . If you come in and make your salam, and promise fidelity to the British Government, I will restore to you your lands . . . and the superintendence of the dawks. If you refuse I will wait till the hot weather has gone past, and then I will carry fire and sword into your territory . . . and if I catch you, I will hang you as a rebel."—Sir C. Napier to the Jam of the Jokees (in Life of Dr. J. Wilson, p. 440).

1873. ". . . the true reason being, Mr. Barton declared, that he was too stingy to pay her dawk."—The True Reformer, i. 63.

Dawk, s. Name of a tree; see Dhauk.

Dawk, To lay a, v. To cause relays of bearers, or horses, to be posted on a road. As regards palankin bearers this used to be done either through the post-office, or through local chowdries (q.v.) of bearers. During the mutiny of 1857-58, when several young surgeons had arrived in India, whose services were urgently wanted at the front, it is said that the Head of the Department to which they had reported themselves, directed them immediately to 'lay a dawk.' One of them turned back from the door, saying: 'Would you explain, Sir; for you might just as well tell me to lay an egg!'

Dawk Bungalow. See under Bungalow.

Daye, Dhye, s. A wet-nurse; used in Bengal and N. India, where this is the sense now attached to the word. Hind. dāi, from Pers. dāyah, a nurse, a midwife. The word also in the earlier English Regulations is applied, Wilson states, to "a female commissioner employed to interrogate and swear native women of condition, who could not appear to give evidence in a court."

1578. "The whole plant is commonly known and used by the Dayas, or as we call them comadres" ("gossips," midwives).—Acosta, Tractado, 282.

1613. "The medicines of the Malays . . . ordinarily are roots of plants . . . horns and claws and stones, which are used by their leeches, and for the most part by Dayas, which are women physicians, excellent herbalists, apprentices of the schools of Java Major."—Godinho de Eredia, f. 37.

1808. "If the bearer hath not strength what can the Dae (midwife) do?"—Guzerati Proverb, in Drummond's Illustrations, 1803.

1810. "The Dhye is more generally an attendant upon native ladies."—Williamson, V.M., i. 341.

1883. "... the 'dyah' or wet-nurse is looked on as a second mother, and usually provided for life."—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.

Deaner, s. This is not Anglo-Indian, but it is a curious word of English Thieves' cant, signifying 'a shilling.' It seems doubtful whether it comes from the Italian danaro or the Arabic dīnār (q. v.); both eventually derived from the Latin denarius.

Debal, n.p.—See Diul.

Deccan, n.p. and adj. Hind. Dakhin or Dakhan. The Southern part of India, the Peninsula, and especially the Table-land between the Eastern and Western Ghauts. It has been often applied also, politically, to specific States in that part of India, e.g. by the Portuguese in the 16th century to the Mahomedan Kingdom of Bijāpūr, and in more recent times by ourselves to the State of Hyderabad. In Western India the Deccan stands opposed to the Concan (q. v.), i.e. the table-land of the interior to the maritime plain; in Upper India the Deccan stands opposed to Hindustān, i.e. roundly speaking, the country south of the Nerbudda to that north of it.

The word is from the Prakrit form dakṣhiṇa of Sansk. dakṣhiṇa, 'the South'; originally, 'on the right hand'; compare dester, degiōs.

The term frequently occurs in Sanskrit books in the forms dakṣhiṇāpatha ('Southern region,' whence the Greek form in our first quotation), and dakṣhīṇātya ('Southern'—qualifying some word for 'country'). So, in the Pai- chatantra: "There is in the Southern region (dakṣhiṇātya janapada) a town called Mihilārōpya."

c. A.D. 80-90. "But immediately after Barygaza the adjoining continent extends from the North to the South, wherefore the region is called Dachinabādēs (δακινωβάνης), for the South is called in their tongue Dachanos (δάχανος)."—Periplus M. E., Geog. Gr. Min. i. 254.

1510. "In the said city of Decan there reigns a King, who is a Mahomedan."—Varthema, 117.

(Here the term is applied to the city and kingdom of Bijapur).

1517. "On coming out of this Kingdom of Guzerat and Cambay towards the South, and the inner parts of India, is the Kingdom of Decani, which the Indians call Decan."—Barbosa, 69.

1552. "Of Decani or Daquē as we now call it."—Castanheda, ii. 50.

"He (Mahmūd Shah) was so powerful that he now presumed to style himself King of Canara, giving it the name of Decan. And the name is said to have been given to it from the combination of different nations contained in it, because Decanij in their language signifies 'mongrel.'"—De Barros, Dec. II., liv. v. cap. 2.

It is difficult to discover what has led astray here the usually well-informed De Barros.

1608. "For the Portugals of Daman had wrought with an ancient friend of theirs a Rage, who was absolute Lord of a Prouince (between Daman, Guzerat, and Decan) called Cruly, to be readie with 200 Horsemen to stay my passage."—Capt. W. Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 209.

1616. "... his son Sultan Coron, who he designed, should command in Deccan."—Sir T. Roe.

1667. "But such as at this day, to Indians known, In Malabar or Decan spreads her arms," Paradise Lost, ix.

1726. "Decan [as a division] includes Decan, Cunkam, and Balagatta."—Valentijn, v. 1.

c. 1750. "... alors le Nababe d'Arcate, tout petit Seigneur qu'il étoit, comparé au Souba du Dekam dont il n'étoit que le Fermier traître (sic) avec nous comme un Souverain avec ses sujets."—Letter of M. Bussy, in Cambridge's War in India, p. xxix.

1870. "In the Deccan and in Ceylon trees and bushes near springs, may often be seen covered with votive flowers."—Lubbock, Origin of Civilization, 200.

N.B.—This is a questionable statement as regards the Deccan.

Deccany, adj., also used as subst. Properly Dakhnī. Coming from the Deccan. A (Mahomedan) inhabitant of the Deccan. Also the very peculiar dialect of Hindustani spoken by such people.

1516. "The Decani language, which is the natural language of the country."—Barbosa, 77.

1572. " . . . .
Decanys, Orias, que a esperança
Tem de sua salvação nas resonantes
Águas do Gange . . . ." Camões, vii. 20.

1578. "The Decanins (call the Betel-leaf) Pan."—Acosta, 139.

c. 1590. "Hence Dak'hinis are notorious in Hindústán for stupidity. . . ."—Author quoted by Blochmann, Ain, 443.

"Ah, I rode a Deccanee charger, with the saddle-cloth gold laced,
And a Persian sword, and a twelve-foot spear, and a pistol at my waist."
A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

Deck, s. A look, a peep. Hind.
lekhn-ā, 'to look.'

1854. "... these formed the whole assemblage, with the occasional exception of some officer, stopping as he passed by, returning from 'his morning ride 'just to have a dekh at the steamer.' . . ."—Oakfield, by W. Arnold, i. 85.

Deen, s. Ar. Hind. dīn, 'the faith.'
The cry of excited Mahommedans, Dīn, Din !

c. 1580. "... crying, as is their way, Dim, Dim, Mafamede ! so that they filled earth and air with terror and confusion."—Primer e Honra, &c., f. 19.

Delhi, n.p. The famous capital of the great Moghuls, in the latter years of that family; and the seat under various names of many preceding dynasties, going back into ages of which we have no distinct record. Dillī is, according to Cunningham, the old Hindu form of the name. Dihli is that used by Mahommedans.

1205. (Muhammed Ghori marched) "towards Dehli (may God preserve its prosperity, and perpetuate its splendour !), which is among the chief (mother) cities of Hind."—Hasan Nizāmi, in Elliot, ii. 216.

c. 1321. "Hanc terram (Tana, near Bombay) regunt Sarraceni, nunc subjacentes dal dill. . . . Audiens ipse imperator dol Dali . . . misit et ordinavit at ipse Lomelic penitus caperetur . . ."—Fry. Odoric. See Cathay, &c., App., pp. v. and x.

c. 1330. "Dilli . . . a certain traveller relates that the brick-built walls of this great city are loftier than the walls of Hamath; it stands in a plain on a soil of mingled stones and sand. At the distance of a parasang runs a great river, not so big, however, as Euphrates."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 189-190.

c. 1334. "The wall that surrounds Dihli has no equal. . . . The city of Dihli has 28 gates . . ." etc.—Ibn Batuta, iii. 147 seqq.

c. 1375. The Carta Catalana of the French Library shows ciutat de Dilli and also Lo Rey Dilli, with this rubric below it: "Ací esta un soldá gran e podaros molt rich. Aquest Soldá ha DCC orífans e o millia homens á cavall sot lo seu imperi. Ha encora paons sens nombre . . ."

1459. Fra Mauro's great map at Venice shows Deli cittade grandissima, and the rubric Questa cittade nobilissima zá dominava tuto el paese del Deli over India Prima.

1516. "This king of Dely confines with Tatars, and has taken many lands from the King of Cambay; and from the King of Dacan, his servants and captains with many of his people, took much, and afterwards in time they revolted, and set themselves up as kings."—Barbosa, p. 100.

1533. "And this kingdom to which the Badur proceeded was called the Dely; it was very great, but it was all disturbed by wars and risings of one party against another, because the King was dead, and the sons were fighting with each other for the sovereignty."—Correa, iii. 506.

c. 1568. "About sixteen yeeres past, this King (of Cuttack), with his Kingdome, were destroyed by the King of Patane, which was also King of the greatest part of Bengala . . . but this tyrant enioyed his Kingdome but a small time, but was conquered by another tyrant, which was the great Mogol King of Agra, Delly, and of all Cambaia."—Caesar Frederike in Hakl, ii. 358.

1611. "On the left hand is seene the carkasse of old Dely, called the nine castles and fiftie-two gates, now inhabited onely by Googers. . . . The city is 2<sup>c</sup> betweene Gate and Gate, begirt with a strong wall, but much ruinate. . . ."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 430.

Deling, s. This was a kind of hammock conveyance, suspended from a pole, mentioned by the old travellers in Pegu. The word is not known to Burmese scholars, and is perhaps a Persian word. Meninski gives "deleng, adj. pendulus, suspensus." The thing seems to be the Malayálam Manchul. See Muncheel and also Dandy.

1569. "Carried in a closet which they call Deling, in the which a man shall be very well accommodated, with cushions under his head."—Master Caesar Frederike, in Hakluyt, ii. 367.

1585. "This Delingo is a strong cotton cloth doubled, . . . as big as an ordinary rug, and having an iron at each end to attach it by, so that in the middle it hangs like a pouch or purse. These irons are attached to a very thick cane, and this is borne by four men. . . . When you go on a journey, a cushion is put at the head of this Delingo, and you get in, and lay your head on the cushion," &c.—Gasparo Balbi, p. 99 b.

1587. "From Cirion we went to Macao, which is a pretie towne, where we left our boats and Paroes, and in the morning taking Delingeges, which are a kind of Coches made of cords and cloth quilted, and caried vpon a stang betweene 3. and 4. men : we came to Pegu the same day."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 391.

Delly, Mount, n.p. Port. Monte D'Elí. A mountain on the Malabar coast which forms a remarkable object from seaward, and the name of which occurs sometimes as applied to a State or City adjoining the mountain. It is prominently mentioned in all the old books on India, though strange to say the Map of India in Keith Johnstone's Royal Atlas has neither name nor indication of this famous hill. It was, according to Correa, the first Indian land seen by Vasco da Gama. The name is Malayalam, Ēli mala, 'High Mountain.' Several erroneous explanations have however been given. A common one is that it means 'Seven Hills.' This arose with the compiler of the local Sanskrit Mahātmya or legend, who rendered the name Sapta-saila, 'Seven Hills,' confounding ēli with ēlu, 'seven,' which has no application. Again we shall find it explained as 'Rat-hill'; but here ēli is substituted for ēli.

The position of the town and port of Ely or Hili mentioned by the older travellers is a little doubtful, but see Marco Polo, notes to Bk. III. ch. 24.

The Ely-maide of the Peutingerian Tables is not unlikely to be an indication of Ely.

1298. "Eli is a Kingdom towards the west, about 300 miles from Comari. . . . There is no proper harbour in the country, but there are many rivers with good estuaries, wide and deep."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 24.

c. 1330. "Three days journey beyond this city (Manjarūr, i.e. Mangalore) there is a great hill which projects into the sea, and is descried by travellers from afar, the promontory called Hili."—Abulfedu in Gildemeister, 185.

c. 1343. "At the end of that time we set off for Hili, where we arrived two days later. It is a large, well-built town on a great bay (or estuary) which big ships enter."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 81.

c. 1440. "Proceeding onwards he . . . arrived at two cities situated on the sea shore, one named Pacamura, and the other Helly."—Nicolo Conti, in India in the XVth Cent. p. 6.

1516. "After passing this place along the coast is the Mountain Dely, on the edge of the sea; it is a round mountain, very lofty, in the midst of low land; all the ships of the Moors and the Gentiles . . . sight this mountain . . . and make their reckoning by it."—Barbosa, 149.

c. 1562. "In twenty days they got sight of land, which the pilots foretold before that they saw it, this was a great mountain which is on the coast of India, in the Kingdom of Cananor, which the people of the country in their language call the mountain Dely, elly meaning 'the rat,' and they call it Mount Dely, because in this mountain there are so many rats that they could never make a village there."—Correa, Three Voyages, &c., Hak. Soc. 145.

(Here and elsewhere in this ill-edited book Hili Marāwi is read and printed Hubae Murawee).

Deloll, s. A broker; Hind. from Ar. dallāl; the literal meaning being one who directs (the buyer and seller to their bargain). In Egypt the word is now also used in particular for a broker of old clothes and the like, as described by Lane below. See also under Neelām.

1684. "Five Delolls, or Brokers, of Decca, after they had been with me went to Mr. Beard's chamber. . ."—Hedges, July 25.

1824. "I was about to answer in great wrath, when a dalal, or broker, went by, loaded with all sorts of second-hand clothes, which he was hawking about for sale."—Haji Baba, 2nd ed. i. 183.

1835. "In many of the sooks in Cairo, auctions are held . . . once or twice a week. They are conducted by "dellāls" (or brokers). . . . The "dellāls" carry the goods up and down, announcing the sums bidden by the cries of 'harāg.'"—Lane, Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1860, p. 317.

- A correction is made here on Lord Stanley's translation.

Demijohn, s. A large glass bottle holding 20 or 30 quarts, or more. The word is not Anglo-Indian, nor is the thing, but it is introduced here because it has been supposed to be the corruption of an Oriental word, and suggested to have been taken from the name of Damaghān in Persia. This looks plausible (compare the Persian origin of carboy, which is another name for just the same thing), but no historical proof has yet been adduced, and it is doubted by Mr. Marsh in his Notes on Wedgwood's Dictionary, and by Dozy (Sup. aux Dict. Arabes). Niebuhr, however, in a passage quoted below, uses the word as an Oriental one, and in a note on the 5th ed. of Lane's Mod. Egyptians, 1860, p. 149, there is a remark quoted from Hammer-Purgstall as to the omission from the detail of domestic vessels of two whose names have been adopted in European languages, viz. the garra or jarra, a water 'jar,' and the demigān or demijān, 'la dame-jeanne.' The word is undoubtedly known in modern Arabic. The Molūt of B. Bistāni, the chief modern native lexicon, explains Dāmijāna, as 'a great glass vessel, big-bellied and narrow-necked, and covered with wicker-work; a Persian word.* The vulgar use the forms damajāna and damanjāna. Dame-jeanne appears in P. Richelet, Dict. de la Langue Franç. (1759) with this definition: "[Lagena amphior] Nom que les matelots donnent à une grande bouteille couverte de natte." It is not in the great Castilian Dict. of 1729, but it is in those of this century, e.g. Dict. of the Span. Academy, ed. 1869. "Damajuana, f. Provincia de) And(alucia) CASTAÑA . . ."—and castaña is explained as a "great vessel of glass or terra cotta, of the figure of a chestnut, and used to hold liquor."

1762. "Notre vin étoit dans de grands flacons de verre (Damasjanés) dont chacun tenoit près de 20 bouteilles."—Niebuhr, Voyage, i. 171.

Deodar, s. The Cedrus deodara, Loud., of the Himālaya, now known as an ornamental tree in England for some sixty years past. The finest specimens in the Himālaya are often found in clumps shadowing a small temple.

* Probably not much stress can be laid on this statement.

The Deodar is now regarded by botanists as a variety of Cedrus Libani. It is confined to the W. Himālaya from Nepal to Afghanistan; it reappears as the Cedar of Lebanon in Syria, and on through Cyprus and Asia Minor; and emerges once more in Algeria, and thence westwards to the Riff Mountains in Morocco, under the name of C. Atlantica.

The word occurs in Avicenna, who speaks of the Deiudar as yielding a kind of turpentine (see below). We may note that an article called Deodar-wood Oil appears in Dr. Forbes Watson's "List of Indian Products" (No. 2941).

Deodar is by no means the universal name of the great Cedar in the Himālaya. But it is called so (Deudār and Diār) in Kashmir, where the deodār pillars of the great mosque of Srinagar date from A.D. 1401. The name, indeed (deva-dāru, 'timber of the gods'), is applied in different parts of India to different trees, and even in the Himālaya to more than one. The List just referred to (which however has not been revised critically) gives this name in different modifications as applied also to the pencil Cedar (Juniperus excelsa), to Gnatteria (or Uvaria) longifolia, to Sethia Indica, to Erythroxylon areolatum, and (on the Rāvi and Sutlej) to Cupressus torulosa.

The Deodār first became known to Europeans in the beginning of this century, when specimens were sent to Dr. Roxburgh, who called it a Pinus. Seeds were sent to Europe by Capt. Gerard in 1819; but the first that grew were those sent by the Hon. W. Leslie Melville in 1822.

c. 1030. "Deiudar (or rather Diudar) est ex genere abhel (i.e. juniper) quae dicitur pinus Inda, et Syr deiudar (Milk of Deodar) est ejus lac (turpentine)."—Avicenna, Lat. Transl. p. 297.

c. 1220. "He sent for two trees, one of which was a . . . white poplar, and the other a deodār, that is a fir. He planted them both on the boundary of Kashmir."—Chach Nūmah in Elliot, i. 144.

Derrishacst, adj. This extraordinary word is given by C. P. B. (MS.) as a corruption of (P.) daryā-shikast, 'destroyed by the river.'

Dervish, s. A member of a Mahomedan religious order. The word is hardly used now among Anglo-Indians; fakir having taken its place.

On the Mahomedan confraternities of this class, see Herklots, 179 seqq.; see also Lane's Mod. Egyptians, Brown's Dervishes, or Oriental Spiritualism, and Les Khouan, Ordres Religieux chez les Musulmans (Paris, 1846), by Capt. E. de Neven.

1673. "The Dervises professing Poverty, assume this Garb here (i.e. in Persia), but not with that state they ramble up and down in India."—Fryer, 392.

Dessaye, s. Mahr. desū; in W. and S. India a native official in principal revenue charge of a district, often held hereditarily; a petty chief.

1590-91. "... the Desayes, Mukaddams, and inhabitants of several parganahs made a complaint at Court."—Order in Mirat-i-Ahmadi (Bird's Tr.), 408.

1883. "The Desai of Sawantwari has arrived at Delhi on a visit. He is accompanied by a European Assistant Political Officer and a large following. From Delhi His Highness goes to Agra, and visits Calcutta before returning to his territory, viâ Madras."—Pioneer Mail, Jan. 24th.

The regular title of this chief appears to be Sar-Desū.

See Daiseye and Dissave.

Destoor, s. A Parsee priest; Pers. das̄tūr, from the Pahlavi das̄tōbar, 'a prime minister, councillor of state . . . a high priest, a bishop of the Parsees; a custom, mode, manner' (Haug, Old Pahlavi and Pazard Glosary).

1630. "... their Distoree or high priest. . . ."—Lord's Display, &c., ch. viii.

1877. "... le Destour de nos jours, pas plus que le Mage d'autrefois, ne soupconne les phases successives que sa religion a traversées."—Darmesteter, Ormazd et Ahri-man, 4.

Deva-dāsī, s. i.e. (Hind.) 'Slave-girl of the gods'; the official name of the poor girls who are devoted to dancing and prostitution in the idol-temples, of Southern India especially. "The like existed at ancient Corinth under the name of ιερόδουλα, which is nearly a translation of the Hindi name . . . (see Strabo, viii. 6)." Marco Polo, 2d ed. ii. 338. These appendages of Aphrodite worship, borrowed from Phœnicia, were the same thing as the Phœnician kēdēshōth repeatedly mentioned in the Old Testament, e.g. Deut. xxiii. 18, "Thou shalt not bring the wages of a kēdēsha . . . into the House of Jehovah." Both male and female ιερόδουλοι are mentioned in the famous inscription of Citium in Cyprus (Corp. Inscr. Semit. No. 86); the latter under the name of 'alma, curiously near that of the modern Egyptian 'ālīma. See Dancing-girl, &c.

1702. "Peu de temps après je baptisai une Deva-Dachi, ou Esclave Divine, c'est ainsi qu'on appelle les femmes dont les Prêtres des idoles abusent, sous prétexte que leurs dieux les demandent."—Lettres Edifiantes, x. 245.

1868. "The Dāsīs, the dancing girls attached to Pagodas. They are each of them married to an idol when quite young. Their male children . . . have no difficulty in acquiring a decent position in society. The female children are generally brought up to the trade of their mothers. . . . It is customary with a few castes to present their superfluous daughters to the Pagodas. . . ."—Nelson's Madura, Pt. 2, p. 79.

Devil Worship. This phrase is a literal translation of bhūta-pūja, i.e. worship of bhūtas, a word which appears in slightly differing forms in various languages of India, including the Tamil country. A bhūta, or, as in Tamil more usually, pēy, is a malignant being which is conceived to arise from the person of any one who has come to a violent death. This superstition, in one form or another, seems to have formed the religion of the Dravidian tribes of S. India before the introduction of Brahmanism, and is still the real religion of nearly all the low castes in that region, whilst it is often patronized also by the higher castes. These superstitions, and especially the demonolatrous rites called 'devil-dancing,' are identical in character with those commonly known as Shamanism, and which are spread all over Northern Asia, among the red races of America, and among a vast variety of tribes in Ceylon and in Indo-China, not excluding the Burmese. A full account of the demon-worship of the Shanars of Tinnevely was given by Bp. Caldwell thirty-five years ago, in a small pamphlet on the "Tinnevely Shanars" (Madras, 1849), and interesting evidence of its identity with the Shamanism of other regions will be found in his Comparative Grammar (2d ed. 579 seqq.); see also Marco Polo, 2d ed. ii. 79, 80.

Déwal, s. H. dewal, Mahr. dewal; a Temple or pagoda. This, or Dewalgarh, is the phrase commonly used in the Bombay territory for a Christian church.

Dewaleea, s. H. Diwaliyā, 'a bankrupt,' from dewāla, 'bankruptcy,' and that, though the etymology is disputed, is alleged to be connected with dīpā, a lamp; because "it is the custom . . . when a merchant finds himself failing, or failed, to set up a blazing lamp in his house, shop, or office, and abscond therefrom for some time until his creditors are satisfied by a disclosure of his accounts or dividend of assets."—Drummond's Illustrations, s.v.

Dewally, s. (a). Hind. dīwālī, from Sansk. dīpālī and dīpāvalī, 'a row of lamps,' i.e. an illumination. An autumnal feast attributed to the celebration of various divinities, as of Lakshmi and of Bhavāni, and also in honour of Krishna's slaying of the demon Narakā, and the release of 16,000 maidens, his prisoners. It is held on the last two days of the dark half of the month Āsrina or Āsan, and on the new moon and four following days of Karttika, i.e. usually some time in October. But there are variations of Calendar in different parts of India, and feasts will not always coincide, e.g. at the three Presidency towns, nor will any curt expression define the dates. In Bengal the name Dīwālī is not used; it is Kālī Pūja, the feast of that grim goddess, a midnight festival on the most moonless night of the month, celebrated by illuminations and fireworks, on land and river, by feasting, carousing, gambling, and sacrifice of goats, sheep, and buffaloes.

1651. "In the month of October, eight days after the full moon, there is a feast held in honour of Vistnou which is called Dipāwali."—A. Rogersius, De Open-Deure.

1673. "The first New Moon in October is the Banyan's Dually."—Fryer, 110.

1690. "... their Grand Festival Season, called the Dually Time."—Ovington, 401.

1820. "The Dewalee, Deepaullee, or Time of Lights, takes place 20 days after the Dussera, and lasts three days; during which there is feasting, illumination, and fireworks."—T. Coats, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo., ii. 211.

1843. "Nov. 5. The Diwālī, happening to fall on this day, the whole river was bright with lamps. . . . Ever and anon some votary would offer up his prayers to Lakshmi the Fortuna, and launch a tiny raft bearing a cluster of lamps into the water,—then watch it with fixed and anxious gaze. If it floats on till the far distance hides it, thrice happy he . . . but if, caught in some wild eddy of the stream, it disappears at once, so will the bark of his fortunes be engulfed in the whirlpool of adversity."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 84.

1883. "The Dīwālī is celebrated with splendid effect at Benares. . . . At the approach of night small earthen lamps, fed with oil, are prepared by millions, and placed quite close together, so as to mark out every line of mansion, palace, temple, minaret, and dome in streaks of fire."—Monier Williams, Religious Thought and Life in India, 432.

(b). In Ceylon dēwālē is a temple dedicated to a Hindu god; properly dēwālaya.

1681. "The second order of Priests are those called Koppuks, who are the Priests that belong to the Temples of the other Gods (i. e., other than Boddou, or Buddha). Their Temples are called Dewals."—Knox, 75.

Dewaun, s. The chief meanings of this word in Anglo-Indian usage are:

(1) Under the Mahomedan Governments which preceded us, "the head financial minister, whether of the state or a province . . . charged, in the latter, with the collection of the revenue, the remittance of it to the imperial treasury, and invested with extensive judicial powers in all civil and financial causes" (Wilson). It was in this sense that the grant of the Dewan-y (q.v.) to the E. I. Company in 1765 became the foundation of the British Empire in India. (2) The prime minister of a native state. (3) The chief native officer of certain Government establishments, such as the Mint; or the native manager of a Zemindary. (4) (in Bengal) a native servant in confidential charge of the dealings of a house of business with natives, or of the affairs of a large domestic establishment.

These meanings are perhaps all reducible to one conception, of which 'Steward' would be an appropriate expression. But the word has had many other ramifications of meaning, and has travelled far.

The Arabic dīwān is, according to Lane, an Arabized word of Persian origin (though some hold it for pure Arabic), and is in original meaning nearly equivalent to Pers. daftar (see Dufter), i. e., a collection of written leaves or sheets (forming a book for registration); hence a 'register of accounts'; a 'register of soldiers or pensioners'; a 'register of the rights or dues of the State, or relating to the acts of government, the finances, and the administration'; also any book, and especially a collection of the poems of some particular poet. It was also applied to signify 'an account'; - then 'a writer of accounts'; a 'place of such writers of accounts'; also 'a council, court, or tribunal'; and in the present day, 'a long seat formed of a mattress laid along the wall of a room, with cushions, raised or on the floor'; or 'two or more of such seats.' Thus far (in this paragraph) we abstract from Lane.

The Arabian historian Bīlādūrī (c. 860) relates as to the first introduction of the dīwān that, when 'Omar was discussing with the people how to divide the enormous wealth derived from the conquests in his time, Walid bin Hishām bin Moghaira said to the caliph, 'I have been in Syria, and saw that its kings make a dīwān; do thou the like.' So 'Omar accepted his advice, and sent for two men of the Persian tongue, and said to them:

'Write down the people according to their rank' (and corresponding pensions).*

We must observe that in the Mahomedan States of the Mediterranean the word dīwān became especially applied to the Custom-house, and thus passed into the Romance languages as aduana, douane, dogana, &c. Littré indeed avoids any decision as to the etymology of douane, &c. And Hyde† derives dogana from docān (i. e., Pers. dukān, 'officina, a shop'). But such passages as that below from Ibn Jubair, and the fact that, in the mediæval Florentine treaties with the Mahomedan powers of Barbary and Egypt, the word dīwān in the Arabic texts constantly represents the dogana of the Italian, seem sufficient to settle the question (see Amari, Diplomi Arabi del Real Archivio, &c.; e.g. p. 104, and (Latin) p. 305, and in many other places).‡ The Spanish Dict. of Cobarruvias (1611) quotes Urrea as saying that "from the Arabic noun Diuanum, which signifies the house where the duties are collected, we form diuana, and thence adivana, and lastly aduana."

At a later date the word was reimported into Europe in the sense of a hall furnished with Turkish couches and cushions, as well as of a couch of this kind. Hence we get cigar-divans, et hoc genus omne.

The application to certain collections of poems is noticed above. It seems to be especially applied to assemblages of short poems of homogeneous character. Thus the Odes of Horace, the Sonnets of Petrarch, the In Memoriam of Tennyson, answer to the character of Dīwān so used. Hence also Goethe took the title of his West-östliche Diwan.

treasury of Medina, where it was distributed almost as soon as received. What was easy in small beginnings, by equal sharing or discretionary preference, became now a heavy task. . . . At length, in the 2nd or 3rd year of his Caliphate, Omar determined that the distribution should be regulated on a fixed and systematic scale. . . . To carry out this vast design, a Register had to be drawn and kept up of every man, woman, and child, entitled to a stipend from the State. . . . The Register itself, as well as the office for its maintenance and for pensionary account, was called the Dewān or Department of the Evchequer."—Muir's Annals, etc., pp. 225-229.

In the following quotations the identity of dīwān and douane or dogana is shown more or less clearly.

A.D. 1178. "The Moslem were ordered to disembark their goods (at Alexandria), and what remained of their stock of provisions; and on the shore were officers who took them in charge, and carried all that was landed to the Diwān. They were called forward one by one; the property of each was brought out, and the Diwān was straitened with the crowd. The search fell on every article, small or great; one thing got mixt up with another, and hands were thrust into the midst of the packages to discover if anything were concealed in them. Then, after this, an oath was administered to the owners that they had nothing more than had been found. Amid all this, in the confusion of hands and the greatness of the crowd many things went amissing. At length the passengers were dismissed after a scene of humiliation and great ignominy, for which we pray God to grant an ample recompense. But this, past doubt, is one of the things kept hidden from the great Sultan Salāh-ud-dīn, whose well-known justice and benevolence are such that, if he knew it, he would certainly abolish the practice" [viz. as regards Mecca pilgrims].*—Ibn Jubair, orig. in Wright's ed., p. 36.

c. 1340. "Doana in all the cities of the Saracens, in Sicily, in Naples, and throughout the Kingdom of Apulia . . . Dazio at Venice; Gabella throughout Tuscany; . . . Costuma throughout the Island of England . . . All these names mean duties which have to be paid for goods and wares and other things, imported to, or exported from, or passed through the countries and places detailed."—Francesco Balducci Pegolotti, see Cathay, etc., ii. 285-6.

c. 1348. "They then order the skipper to state in detail all the goods that the vessel contains. . . . Then everybody lands, and the keepers of the custom-house (al-diwān) sit and pass in review whatever one has."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 265.

The following mediæval passage in one of our note-books remains a fragment without date or source:

The present generation in England can have no conception how closely this description applies to what took place at many an English port before Sir Robert Peel's great changes in the import tariff. The present writer, in landing from a P. & O. steamer at Portsmouth in 1843, after four or five days' quarantine in the Solent, had to go through fire to six hours of such treatment as Ibn Jubair describes, and his feelings were very much the same as the Moor's.—[H. The use of Diwānī for civil as opposed to criminal is probably modern and Indian. For Kaempfer in his account of the Persian administration at the end of the 17th century, has: "Diwaen begi, id est, Supremus criminalis Judicii Dominus . . . de latrociniiis et homicidiis non modo in hac Regiā metropoli, verum etiam in toto Regno disponendi facultatem habet."—Amoenit. Exot. 80.

Dhall, doll, s. Hind. dāl, a kind of pulse much used in India, both by natives as a kind of porridge, and by Europeans as an ingredient in kedgree (q. v.) or to mix with rice as a breakfast dish. It is best represented in England by what are called 'split peas.' The proper dāl, which Wilson derives from Sansk. root dal, 'to divide' (and which thus corresponds in meaning also to 'split peas'), is according to the same authority, Phaseolus aureus; but, be that as it may, the *dāl*s most commonly in use are varieties of the shrubby plant Cajanus Indicus, Spreng., called in Hind. arhar, rahar, &c. It is not known where this is indigenous; it is cultivated throughout India. The term is also applied occasionally to other pulses, such as māng, urd, &c. (See Mōong, Oord).

1673. "At their coming up out of the Water they bestow the largess of Rice or Doll (an Indian Bean)."—Fryer, 101.

1690. "Kitcheree . . . made of Doll, that is, a small round Pea, and Rice boiled together, and is very strengthening, tho' not very savory."—Ovington, 310.

1727. "They have several species of Legumen, but those of Doll are most in use, for some Doll and Rice being mingled together and boiled, make Kitcheree."—A. Ham, i. 162.

1776. "If a person hath bought the seeds of . . . doll . . . or such kinds of Grain, without Inspection, and in ten Days discovers any Defect in that Grain, he may return such Grain."—Hulhed, Code, 178.

1778. " . . . the essential articles of a Sepoy's diet, rice, doll (a species of pea), ghee (an indifferent kind of butter), &c., were not to be purchased."—Acc. of the Gallant Defence made at Mangalore.

1809. " . . . dol, split country peas."—Maria Graham, 25.

Dhawk, s. Hind. dhāk; also called palās. A small bushy tree, Butea frondosa (N. O. Leguminosae), which forms large tracts of jungle in the Punjab and in many dry parts of India. Its deep orange flowers give a brilliant aspect to the jungle in the early part of the hot weather, and have suggested the occasional name of 'Flame of the Forest.' They are used for dyeing basanto, a fleeting yellow; and in preparing Hoṭi powder (see Hooly). The second of the two Hindī words for this tree gave a name to the famous village of Plassy (Palāśī), and also to ancient Magadha or Bahār as Palāśa or Parāśa, whence Parāśiya, a man of that region, which, if Gen. Cunningham's suggestion be accepted, was the name represented by the Prasii of Strabo, Pliny, and Arrian, and the Pharrasii of Curtius (Anc. Geog. of India, p. 454).

1761. "The pioneers, agreeably to orders, dug a ditch according to custom, and placed along the brink of it an abatis of dhāk trees, or whatever else they could find."—Saiyid Ghulām 'Alī, in Elliot, viii. 400.

Dhooly, Doolie, s. A covered litter, or rudimentary palankin; Hind. doli. It consists of a cot or frame, suspended by the four corners from a bamboo pole, and is carried by two or four men (see figure in Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, pl. vii. fig. 4). As it is lighter and cheaper than a palankin it costs less both to buy or hire and to carry, and is used by the poorer classes. It also forms the usual ambulance of the Indian army. Hence the familiar story of the orator in Parliament who, in celebrating a battle in India, spoke of the "ferocious Doolies rushing down from the mountains and carrying off the wounded;" a story which, to our regret, we have not been able to verify.

c. 1590. "The Kahārs or Paki-bearers. They form a class of foot servants peculiar to India. With their pātkis . . . and dūlis, they walk so evenly that the man inside is not inconvenienced by any jolting."—Ain, i. 254.

1609. "He turned Moore, and bereaved his elder Brother of this holde by this stratageme. He invited him and his women to a Banquet, which his Brother requiting with like invitation of him and his, in steed of women he sends choice Souldiers well appointed, and close couered, two and two in a Dowie."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 435.

1662. "The Rājah and the Phūkans travel in singhāsans, and chiefs and rich people in dūlis, made in a most ridiculous way."—Mir Jumlah's Invasion of Asem, tr. by Blochmann, in J. As. Soc. Ben., xli, pt. 1, 80.

c. 1760. "Doolies are much of the same make as the andolas; but made of the meanest materials."—Grose, i. 155.

1774. "If by a dooley, chairs, or any other contrivance they can be secured from the fatigues and hazards of the way, the expense is to be no objection."—Letter of W. Hastings, in Markham's Tibet, 18.

1785. "You must despatch Doolies to Dhārwar to bring back the wounded men."—Letters of Tippoo, 133.

1789. ". . . doolies, or sick beds, which are a mean representation of a palanquin: the number attached to a corps is in the proportion of one to every ten men, with four bearers to each."—Munro, Narrative, 184.

1845. "Head Qrs., Kurrahee, 27 Decr., 1845.

"The Governor desires that it may be made known to the Doolie-wallas and Camel-men, that no increase of wages shall be given to them. They are very highly paid. If any man deserts, the Governor will have him pursued by the police, and if caught he shall be hanged."—G. O. by Sir Charles Napier, 113.

1872. "At last . . . a woman arrived from Dargānagar with a dūli and two bearers, for carrying Mālātī."—Govinda Samanta, ii. 7.

1880. "The consequences of holding that this would be a Trust enforceable in a Court of Law would be so monstrous that persons would be probably startled . . . if it be a Trust, then every one of those persons in England or in India—from persons of the highest rank down to the lowest dhoolie-bearer, might file a bill for the administration of the Trust."—Ld. Justice James, Judgment on the Kirwee and Banda Prize Appeal, 13th April.

1883. "I have great pleasure here in bearing my testimony to the courage and devotion of the Indian dhooly-bearers. I . . . never knew them shrink from the dangers of the battle-field, or neglect or forsake a wounded European. I have several times seen one of these bearers killed and many of them disabled while carrying a wounded soldier out of action."—Surgeon-General Munro, C.B., Reminiscences of Mil. Service with the 93rd Sutherland Highlanders, p. 193.

Dhoby, Dobie, s. A washerman; Hind. dhobi. In colloquial Anglo-Indian use all over India.

A common Hind. proverb runs: "Dhobi kā kutta kā sā, na ghar kā na ghāt kā," i. e., Like a dhoby's dog belonging neither to the house nor to the river-side.

Dhooon, s. Hind. dān. A word in N. India specially applied to the flat valleys, parallel to the base of the Himālaya, and lying between the rise of that mountain mass and the low tertiary ranges known as the sub-Himalayan or Siwālik Hills (q.v.), or rather between the interior and exterior of these ranges. The best known of these valleys is the Dūn of Dehra, below Mussooree, often known as "the Dhooon;" a form of expression which we see by the first quotation to be old.

1654-55. "Khalilu-lla Khan . . . having reached the Dūn, which is a strip of country lying outside of Srinagar, 20 kos long and 5 broad, one extremity of its length being bounded by the river Jumna, and the other by the Ganges."—Shāh-Jahān-Nāma, in Elliot, vii. 106.

1814. "Me voici in the far-famed Dhooon, the Tempe of Asia . . . The fort stands on the summit of an almost inaccessible mountain . . . it will be a tough job to take it; but by the 1st proximo I think I shall have it, auspice Deo."—In Asiatic Journal, ii. 151; ext. of letter from Sir Rollo Gillespie before Kalanga, dated 29th Oct. He fell next day.

1879. "The Sub-Himalayan Hills . . . as a general rule . . . consist of two ranges, separated by a broad flat valley, for which the name 'dūn' (doon) has been adopted . . . When the outer of these ranges is wanting, as is the case below Naini Tal and Darjiling, the whole geographical feature might escape notice, the inner range being confounded with the spurs of the mountains."—Manual of the Geology of India, 521.

Dhoty, s. Hind dhoti. The loin-cloth worn by all the respectable Hindu castes of Upper India, wrapt round the body, the end being then passed between the legs and tucked in at the waist, so that a festoon of calico hangs down to either knee. The word duttee in old trade lists of cotton goods is probably the same.

1622. "Price of calicoes, duttees fixed."

"List of goods sold, including diamonds, pepper, bastas (read bastas), duttees, and silks from Persia."—Court Minutes, &c., in Sainsbury, iii. 24.

1810. ". . . a dotee or waist-cloth."—Williamson, V. M., i. 247.

1872. "The human figure which was moving with rapid strides had no other clothing than a dhuti wrapped round the waist, and descending to the knee-joints."—Govinda Samanta, i. 8.

Dhow, Dow, s. The last seems the more correct, though not perhaps the more common. The term is common in Western India, and on various shores of the Arabian sea, and is used on the E. African coast for craft in general (see Burton, in J. R. G. S., xxix. 239); but in the mouths of Englishmen on the western seas of India it is applied specially to the old-fashioned vessel of Arab build, with a long "grab" stem, i. e., rising at a long slope from the water, and about as long as the keel, usually with one mast and lateen-rig. There are the lines of a dow, and a technical description, by Mr. Edie, in J. R. As. Soc., vol. i. p. 11. The slaving dow is described and illustrated in Capt. Colomb's Slave-catching in the Indian Ocean; see also Capt. W. F. Owen's Narrative (1833), p. 385. Most people suppose the word to be Arabic, and it is in (Johnson's) Richardson (dāo) as an Arabic word. But no Arabic scholar whom we have consulted admits it to be genuine Arabic. Can it possibly have been taken from Pers. dav, 'running'? Capt. Burton identifies it with the word zabra applied in the Roteiro of Vasco's Voyage (p. 37) to a native vessel at Mombasa. But zabra or zavra was apparently a Basque name used for a kind of small craft in Biscay (see s.v. Bluteau, and the Dicc. de la Lingua Castel., vol. vi. 1739). Dāo or Dāwa is indeed in Molesworth's Mahr. Dicty. as a word in that language, but this gives no assurance of origin. Anglo-Indians on the west coast usually employ dhow and buggalow interchangeably. The word is used on Lake V. Nyanza.

Dhurmsalla, s. Hind. and Mahr. dharm-sālā, ('pious edifice'); a rest-house for wayfarers, corresponding to the S. Indian choultry or chuttrum (q.v.).

1826. "We alighted at a durhmsallah where several horsemen were assembled."—Pandurang Hari, 254.

Dhurna, To sit, v. In Hind. dharnā denā or baithnā (comp. Skt. root dhri, 'to hold'). A mode of extorting payment or compliance with a demand, effected by the complainant or creditor sitting at the debtor's door, and there remaining without tasting food till his demand shall be complied with, or (sometimes) by threatening to do himself some mortal violence if it be not complied with. Traces of this custom in some form are found in many parts of the world, and Sir Henry Maine (see below) has quoted a remarkable example from the Irish Brehon Laws. There was a curious variety of the practice, in arrest for debt, current in S. India, which is described by Marco Polo and many later travellers (see M. P., 2nd ed., ii. 327, 335).

The practice of dharnā is made an offence under the Indian Penal Code.

There is a systematic kind of dharnā practised by classes of beggars, e. g. in the Punjab by a class called tasmī-wālās, or 'strap-riggers,' who twist a leather strap round the neck, and throw themselves on the ground before a shop, as if strangling themselves, until alms are given (see Ind. Antiq. i. 162).

c. 1794. "The practice called dharna, which may be translated caption, or arrest."—Sir J. Shore in As. Res., iv.

* 1837. "Whoever voluntarily causes or attempts to cause any person to do anything which that person is not legally bound to do . . . by inducing . . . that person to believe that he . . . will become . . . by some act of the offender, an object of the divine displeasure if he does not do the thing . . . shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

1875. "If you have a legal claim against a man of a certain rank and you are desirous of compelling him to discharge it, the Senchus Mor tells you 'to fast upon him.' . . . The institution is unquestionably identical with one widely diffused throughout the East, which is called by the Hindoos 'sitting dharna.' It consists in sitting at your debtor's door and starving yourself till he pays. From the English point of view the practice has always been considered barbarous and immoral, and the Indian Penal Code expressly forbids it. It suggests, however, the question—what would follow if the debtor simply allowed the creditor to starve? Undoubtedly the Hindoo supposes that some supernatural penalty would follow; indeed, he generally gives definiteness to it by retaining a Brahmin to starve himself vicariously, and no Hindoo doubts what would come of causing a Brahmin's death."—Maine, Hist. of Early Institutions, 40. See also 297–304.

A striking story is told in Forbes's Rās Māla of a farther proceeding following upon unsuccessful dharnā, put in practice by a company of chārāns, or bards, in Kathiawār, to enforce payment of a debt by a chief of Jailā to one of their number. After fasting three days in vain, they proceeded from dharnā to the further rite of (q.v.) trāgā. Some hacked their own arms; others decapitated three old women of their party, and hung the heads up as a garland at the gate. Certain of the women cut off their own breasts. The bards also pierced the throats of four of the older men with spikes, and took two young girls and dashed their brains out against the town-gate. Finally the chārān creditor soaked his quilted clothes in oil, and set fire to himself. As he burned to death he cried out, 'I am now dying, but I will become a headless ghost (Kavīs) in the Palace, and will take the chief's life, and cut off his posterity!' See Rās Māla, ii. 393–4.

Dinapore, n.p. A well-known cantonment on the right bank of the Ganges (being the station of the garrison of the great city of Patna). The name is properly Dārāpūr. Ives (1755) writes Dunapoor (p. 167). The cantonment was established under the government of Warren Hastings about 1772, but we have failed to ascertain the exact date.

Dīnār, s. This word is not now in any Indian use. But it is remarkable as a word introduced into Sanskrit at a comparatively early date. "The names of the Arabic pieces of money . . . are all taken from the coins of the Lower Roman Empire. Thus, the copper piece was called faḡs from folḡis; the silver dirham from drachma, and the gold coin dīnār, from denarius, which, though properly a silver coin, was used generally to denote coins of other metals, as the denarius aeris, and the denarius auri, or aureus" (James Prinsep, in Essays, &c., ed. by Thomas, i. 19). But it was long before the rise of Islām that the knowledge and name of the denarius as applied to a gold coin had reached India. The inscription on the eastern gate of the great tope at Sanchi is probably the oldest instance preserved, though the date of that is a matter greatly disputed. But in Amarakoṣha (c. A.D. 500) we have 'dīnāre pi cha nishkaḡ,' i. e., 'a nishkaḡ (or gold coin) is the same as dīnāra.' And in the Kalpasūtra of Bhadrabāhu (of about the same age) § 36, we have 'dīnāra mālaya,' 'a necklace of dīnārs,' mentioned (see Max Müller, below).

The dīnār in modern Persia is a very small imaginary coin, of which 10,000 make a tomaun (q.v.).

In the middle ages we find Arabic writers applying the term dīnār both to the staple gold coin (corresponding to the gold mohr of more modern times) and to the staple silver coin (corresponding to what has been called since the 16th century the rupee).

A.D. (?) "The son of Amuka . . . having made salutation to the eternal gods and goddesses, has given a piece of ground purchased at the legal rate; also five temples, and twenty-five (thousand ?) dīnārs . . . as an act of grace and benevolence of the great emperor Chandragupta."—Inscription on Gateway at Sanchi (Prinsep's Essays, i. 246).

A.D. (?) "Quelque temps après, à Pataliputra, un autre homme dévoué aux Brahmanes renversa une statue de Bouddha aux pieds d'un mendiant, qui la mit en pièces. Le roi (Aḡoka) . . . fit proclamer cet ordre : Celui qui m'apportera la tête d'un mendiant brahmanique, recevra de moi un Dīnāra."—Tr. of Divya avadāna, in Burnouf, Int. à l'Hist. du Bouddhisme Indien, p. 422.

c. 1333. "The lak is a sum of 100,000 dīnārs (i.e. of silver); this sum is equivalent to 10,000 dīnārs of gold, Indian money; and the Indian (gold) dīnār is worth 2½ dīnārs in money of the West (Maghrab)."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 106.

1859. "Cosmas Indicopleustes remarked that the Roman denarius was received all over the world;* and how the denarius came to mean in India a gold ornament we may learn from a passage in the 'Life of Mahāvīra.' There it is said that a lady had around her neck a string of grains and golden dinārs, and Stevenson adds that the custom of stringing coins together, and adorning with them children especially, is still very common in India."—Max Müller, Hist. of Sanskrit Literature, 247.

Dingy, Dinghy, s. Beng. dingy. A small boat or skiff; sometimes also 'a canoe,' i. e., dug out of a single trunk. This word is not merely Anglo-Indian; it has become legitimately incorporated in the vocabulary of the British Navy, as the name of the smallest ship's-boat.

Dingū occurs as the name of some kind of war-boat used by the Portuguese in the defence of Hugli in 1631 ("Sixty-four large díngas," Elliot, vii. 35). The word díngi is also used for vessels of size in the quotation from Tippoo.

* The passage referred to is probably that where Cosmas relates an adventure of his friend Sopatrus, a trader in Taprobane, or Ceylon, at the king's court. A Persian present brags of the power and wealth of his own monarch. Sopatrus says nothing till the king calls on him for an answer. He appeals to the king to compare the Roman gold denarius (called by Cosmas ρωμαῖον), and the Persian silver drachma, both of which were at hand, and to judge for himself which suggested the greater monarch. "Now the nomisma was a coin of right good ring and fine ruddy gold, bright in metal and elegant in execution, for such coins are picked on purpose to take thither, whilst the millaresion (or drachma), to say it in one word, was of silver, and of course bore no comparison with the gold coin," &c. In another passage he says that elephants in Taprobane were sold at from 50 to 100 nomismata and more, which seems to imply that the gold denarīs were actually current in Ceylon. See the passages at length in Cathay, &c. pp. clxxx-clxxx.

Mr. Campbell, in the Bombay Gazetteer, says that dhangī is a large vessel belonging to the Mekrān coast; the word is said to mean "a log" in Bilūchi. In Guzerat the larger vessel seems to be called danga; and besides this there is dhangī, like a canoe, but built, not dug out.

Diu, n.p. A port at the south end of Peninsular Guzerat. The town stands on an island, whence its name, from Skt. dvīpa. The Portuguese were allowed to build a fort here by treaty with Bahādur Shāh of Guzerat, in 1535. It was once very famous for the sieges which the Portuguese successfully withstood (1538 and 1545) against the successor of Bahādur Shāh. It still belongs to Portugal, but is in great decay.

By Burton:

"Castro succeeds, who Lusias estandard shall bear for ever in the front to wave;

Successor the Succeded's work who endeth; that buildeth Diu, this buildeth Diu defendeth."

1648. "At the extremity of this Kingdom, and on a projecting point towards the south lies the city Diul, where the Portuguese have 3 strong castles; this city is called by both Portuguese and Indians Dive (the last letter, e, being pronounced somewhat softly), a name which signifies 'Island.'—Van Twist, 13.

1727. "Diul is the next Port. . . . It is one of the best built Cities, and best fortified by Nature and Art, that ever I saw in India, and its stately Buildings of free Stone and Marble, are sufficient Witnesses of its ancient Grandeur and Opulency; but at present not above one-fourth of the City is inhabited."—A. Ham. i. 137.

Diul-Sind, n.p. A name by which Sind is often called in early European narratives, taken up by the authors, no doubt, like so many other prevalent names, from the Arab traders who had preceded them. Dewal or Daibul was a once celebrated city and seaport of Sind, mentioned by all the old Arabian geographers, and believed to have stood at or near the site of modern Karāchī. It had the name from a famous temple (devālya), probably a Buddhist shrine, which existed there, and which was destroyed by the Mahomedans in 711. The name of Dewal long survived the city itself, and the specific addition of Sind or Sindi being added, probably to distinguish it from some other place of resembling name, the name of Dewal-Sind or Sindi came to be attached to the delta of the Indus.

c. 700. The earliest mention of Dewal that we are aware of is in a notice of Chinese Voyages to the Persian Gulf under the T'ang dynasty (7th and 8th centuries) quoted by Duguignes. In this the ships, after leaving Tiyu (Diul) sailed 10 days further to another Tiyu near the great river Milan or Sinteu. This, no doubt, was Dewal near the great Mihirān or Sindhū, i.e. Indus.—Mém. de l'Acad. des Ins., xxxii. 367.

c. 880. "There was at Debal a lofty temple (budd) surmounted by a long pole, and on the pole was fixed a red flag, which when the breeze blew was unfurled over the city . . . Muhammad informed Hajjāj of what he had done, and solicited advice . . . One day a reply was received to this effect:—'Fix the manjanik . . . call the manjanik-master, and tell him to aim at the flag-staff of which you have given a description.' So he brought down the flagstaff, and it was broken; at which the infidels were sore afflicted."—Bildāquri in Elliot, i. 120.

c. 900. "From Nāmasirā to Debal is 8 days' journey, and from Debal to the junction of the river Mihirān with the sea, is 2 parasangs."—Ibn Khordādhah, in Elliot, i. 15.

976. "The City of Debal is to the west of the Mihirān, towards the sea. It is a large mart, and the port not only of this, but of the neighbouring regions. . . ."—Ibn Hawkal, in Elliot, i. 37.

c. 1150. "The place is inhabited only because it is a station for the vessels of Sind and other countries . . . ships laden with the productions of Uman, and the vessels of China and India come to Debal."—Idrisi, in Elliot, i. p. 77.

1228. "All that country down to the sea-shore was subdued. Malik Sinān-ud-dīn Habsh, chief of Dewal and Sind, came and did homage to the Sultan."—Ṭabakāt-i-Nāsiri, in Elliot, ii. 326.

1516. "Leaving the Kingdom of Ormuz . . . the coast goes to the South-east for 172 leagues as far as Diulcinde, entering the Kingdom of Ulcinde, which is between Persia and India."—Barbosa, 49.

1553. "From this Cape Jasque to the famous river Indus are 200 leagues, in which space are these places Guadel, Calara, Calamente, and Diul, the last situated on the most westerly mouth of the Indus."—De Barros, Dec. I. liv. ix. cap. 1.

c. 1554. "If you guess that you may be drifting to Jaked . . . you must try to go to Karāushī, or to enter Khur (the estuary of) Diūl Sind."—The Mohit, in J. As. Soc. Ben., v. 463.

1554. "He offered me the town of Lahori, i.e., Diūli Sind, but as I did not accept it I begged him for leave to depart."—Sidi 'Alī Kapudān, in Journ. As., 1st Ser. tom. ix. 131.

"Olha a terra de Ulcinde fertilissima E de Jaquete a intima enseada."

Camões, x. cvi.

1614. "At Diulsinde the Expedition in her former Voyage had delivered Sir Robert Sherley the Persian Embassadour."—Capt. W. Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.

1638. "Les Perses et les Arabes donnent au Royaume de Sindo le nom de Diul."—Mandelslo, 114.

c. 1650. Diul is marked in Blaeu's great Atlas on the W. of the most westerly mouth of the Indus.

c. 1666. " . . . la ville la plus Méridionale est Diul. On la nomme encore Diul-Sind, et autrefois on l'a appelée Dobil . . . Il y a des Orientaux qui donnent le nom de Diul au Pais de Sinde."—Therivet, v. 158.

1727. "All that shore from Jasques to Sindy, inhabited by uncivilized People, who admit of no Commerce with Strangers, tho' Guaddel and Diul, two Sea-ports, did about a Century ago afford a good Trade."—A. Ham. i. 115.

Doab, s. and n.p. Pers. Hind. doāb, 'two waters,' i.e., 'Mesopotamia,' the tract between two confluent rivers. In Upper India, when used absolutely, the term always indicates the tract between the Ganges and Jumna. Each of the like tracts in the Punjab has its distinctive name, several of them compounded of the names of the limiting rivers, e.g. Kāchā Doāb, between Rāvi and Chenāb, Jech Doāb, between Jelam and Chenāb, &c. These names are said to have been invented by the Emperor Akbar. The only Doāb familiarly known by that name in the South of India is the Raichūr Doāb in the Nizam's country, lying between the Kistna and Tungabhadra.

Doai! Dwe! Interj. Properly Hind. dohāi or dūhāi, Guzarati dawāhī, an exclamation (hitherto of obscure etymology) shouted aloud by a petitioner for redress at a court of justice, or as any one passes who is supposed to have it in his power to aid in rendering the justice sought. It has a kind of analogy, as Thevenot pointed out 200 years ago, to the old Norman Haro! Haro! viens à mon aide, mon Prince! * but does not now carry the privilege of the Norman cry; though one may conjecture, both from Indian analogies and from the statement of Ibn Batuta quoted below, that it once did.

Every Englishman in Upper India has often been saluted by the calls of 'Dohāi Khudāvand kī, Dohāi Mahārāj, Dohāi Kompani Bahādur!' 'Justice, my Lord! Justice, O King! Justice, O Company!'—perhaps in consequence of some oppression by his followers, perhaps in reference to some grievance with which he has no power to interfere.

Wilson derives the explanation from dō, 'two' or repeatedly, and hāi, 'alas,' illustrating this by the phrase 'dohāi thāi karnā,' 'to make exclamation (or invocation of justice) twice and thrice.' This phrase, however, we take to be merely an example of the 'striving after meaning,' usual in cases where the real origin of a phrase is forgotten. We cannot doubt that the word is really a form of the Sansk. droha, 'injury, wrong.' And this is confirmed by the form in Ibn Batuta, and the Mahr. durāhi: "an exclamation or expression used in prohibiting in the name of the Raja . . . implying an imprecation of his vengeance in case of disobedience" (Moles- worth's Dict.); also Tel. and Canar. durāi, protest, prohibition, caveat, or veto in arrest of proceedings (Wilson and C. P. B., MS.).

c. 1340. "It is a custom in India that when money is due from any person who is favoured by the Sultan, and the creditor wants his debt settled, he lies in wait at the Palace gate for the debtor, and when the latter is about to enter he assails him with the exclamation Darōhai us-Sultan! "O Enemy of the Sultan."—I swear by the head of the King thou shalt not enter till thou hast paid me what thou owest. The debtor cannot then stir from the spot, until he has satisfied the creditor, or has obtained his consent to the respite."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 412.

The signification assigned to the words by the Moorish traveller probably only shows that the real meaning was unknown to his Musalman friends at Dehli, whilst its form strongly corroborates our etymology, and shows that it still kept close to the Sanskrit.

1609. "He is severe enough, but all helpeth not; for his poore Riats or clownes complaine of Iniustice done them, and cry for justice at the King's hands."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 223.

c. 1666. "Quand on y veut arrêter une personne, on crie seulement Doa padecha; cette clameur a autant de force que celle de haro en Normandie; et si on defend à quelqu'un de sortir du lieu où il est, en disant Doa padecha, il ne peut partir sans se rendre criminel, et il est obligé de se presenter à la Justice."—Thevenot, v. 61.

1834. "The servant woman began to make a great outcry, and wanted to leave the ship, and cried Dohæe to the Company, for she was murdered and kidnapped."—The Baboo, ii. 242.

Doar, n.p. A name applied to the strip of moist land, partially cultivated with rice and partially covered with forest, which extends at the foot of the Himalāya mountains of Bhotan. It corresponds to the Terai further west; but embraces the conception of the passes or access to the hill country from this last verge of the plain, and is apparently the Skt. dvāra, a gate or entrance.

Dobund, s. This word is not in the Hind. dictionaries (nor is it in Wilson), but it appears to be sufficiently elucidated by the quotation:

1787. "That the power of Mr. Fraser to make dobunds, or new and additional embankments in aid of the old ones . . . was a power very much to be suspected, and very improper to be entrusted to a contractor who had already covenanted to keep the old pools in perfect repair." &c.—Articles against W. Hastings, in Burke, vii. 98.

* It will be seen that the Indian cry also appeals to the Prince expressly. It was the good fortune of one of the present writers (A. B.) to have witnessed the call of Haro! brought into serious operation at Jersey.

Dolly, s. Hind. dālī. A complimentary offering of fruit, flowers, vegetables, sweetmeats and the like, presented usually on one or more trays; also the daily basket of garden produce laid before the owner by the Mālī or gardener ("the Molly with his dolly"). The proper meaning of dālī is 'a tray,' or 'a pair of trays slung to a yoke,' as used in making the offerings.

Twenty years ago the custom of presenting dālīs was innocent and merely complimentary; but, if the letter quoted under 1882 is correct, it must have since grown into a gross abuse, especially in the Punjab.

1880. "Brass dishes filled with pistachio nuts and candied sugar are displayed here and there; they are the oblations of the would-be visitors. The English call these offerings dollies; the natives dālī. They represent in the profuse East the visiting cards of the meagre West."—Ali Baba, 84.

1882. "I learn that in Madras dallies are restricted to a single gilded orange or lime, or a tiny sugar pagoda, and Madras officers who have seen the bushels of fruit, nuts, almonds, sugar-candy . . . &c., received by single officials in a single day in the N.W. Provinces, and in addition the number of bottles of brandy, champagne, liquors, &c., received along with all the preceding in the Punjab, have been . . . astounded that such a practice should be countenanced by Government."—Letter in Pioneer Mail, March 15.

Dome, Dhome; in S. India commonly Dombaree, s. Hind. Ḍom or Ḍomrā. The name of a very low caste, representing some old aboriginal race, spread all over India. In many places they perform such offices as carrying dead bodies, removing carrion, &c. They are often musicians; in Oudh sweepers; in Champāran professional thieves (see Elliot's Races of the N. W. P.). It is possible, as has been suggested by some one, that the Gypsy Romany is this word.

c. 1328. "There be also certain others which be called Dumbri who eat carrion and carcases; who have absolutely no object of worship; and who have to do the drudgeries of other people, and carry loads."—Friar Jordanus, Hak. Soc. p. 21.

1817. "There is yet another tribe of vagrants, who are also a separate sect. They are the class of mountebanks, buffoons, posture-masters, tumblers, dancers, and the like . . . The most dissolute body is that of the Dumbars or Dumbaru."—Abbé Dubois, 468.

Dondera Head, n.p. The southernmost point of Ceylon; called after a magnificent Buddhist shrine there, much frequented as a place of pilgrimage, which was destroyed by the Portuguese in 1587. The name is a corruption of Dewa-nagara, in Elu (or old Singalese) Dewu-nuwara; in modern Singalese Dewuṇḍara (Ind. Antig. i. 329). The place is identified by Tennent with Ptolemy's "Dagana, sacred to the Moon." Is this name in any way the origin of the opprobrium 'dunderhead?' The name is so written in Dunn's Directory, 5th ed. 1780, p. 59; also in a chart of the Bay of Bengal, without title or date, in Dalrymple's Collection.

1344. "We travelled in two days to the city of Dinawar, which is large, near the sea, and inhabited by traders. In a vast temple there, one sees an idol which bears the same name as the city . . . The city and its revenues are the property of the idol."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 184.

Doney, Dhony, s. In S. India, a small native vessel, properly formed (at least the lower part of it) from a single tree. Tamil tōṇi. Dr. Gundert suggests as the origin Sansk. drōṇa, 'a wooden vessel.' But it is perhaps connected with the Tamil tonḍuga, 'to scoop out'; and the word would then be exactly analogous to the Anglo-American 'dug-out.' In the J. R. As. Soc. vol. i. is a paper by Mr. Edye, formerly H. M.'s Master Shipwright in Ceylon, on the native vessels of South India, and among others he describes the Doni (p. 13), with a drawing to scale. He calls it "a huge vessel of ark-like form, about 70 feet long, 20 feet broad, and 12 feet deep; with a flat bottom or keel part, which at the broadest place is 7 feet . . . the whole equipment of these rude vessels, as well as their construction, is the most coarse and unseaworthy that I have ever seen." From this it would appear that the doney is no longer a 'dug-out,' as the suggested etymology, and Pyrrard de la Val's express statement, indicate it to have been originally.

1552. Castanheda already uses the word as Portuguese: "foy logo coṛra ho tōne."—iii. 22.

1553. "Vasco da Gama having started . . . on the following day they were becalmed rather more than a league and a half from Calicut, when there came towards them more than 60 tonês, which are small vessels, crowded with people."—Barros, I. iv., xi.

1561. The word constantly occurs in this form (toné) in Correa, e.g., vol. i., pt. 1, 403, 502, &c.

1606. There is a good description of the vessel in Gouvea, f. 29.

c. 1610. "Le bateau s'appelloit Donny, c'est à dire oiseau, pource qu'il estoit proviste de voiles."—Pyrard de la Val, i. 65.

"La plupart de leurs vaisseaux sont d'une seule piece, qu'ils appellent Tonny, et les Portugais Almediés."—Ibid., i. 278.

1644. "They have in this city of Cochín certain boats which they call Tones, in which they navigate the shallow rivers, which have 5 or 6 palms of depth, 15 or 20 cubits in length, and with a broad parana of 5 or 6 palms, so that they build above an upper story called Bayleu, like a little house, thatched with Ola, and closed at the sides. This contains many passengers, who go to amuse themselves on the rivers, and there are spent in this way many thousands of cruzados."—Bocarro, MS.

1666. "... with 110 paraos, and 100 captures and 80 tones of broad beam, full of people... the enemy displayed himself on the water to our caravels."—Faria y Sousa, Asia Portug. i. 66.

1672. "... four fishermen from the town came over to us in a Tony."—Baldæus, Ceylon (Dutch ed.), 89.

1860. "Amongst the vessels at anchor (at Galle) lie the dows of the Arabs, the Patamars of Malabar, the dhoneys of Coromandel."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 103.

Doob, s. H. dāb, from Skt. dūrva. A very nutritious creeping grass (Cynodon dactylon, Pers.), spread very generally in India. In the hot weather of Upper India, when its growth is scanty, it is eagerly sought for horses by the 'grass-cutters.' The natives, according to Roxburgh, quoted by Drury, cut the young leaves and make a cooling drink from the roots. The popular etymology from dūp, 'sunshine,' has no foundation. Its merits, its lowly gesture, its spreading quality, give it a frequent place in native poetry.

1810. "The doob is not to be found everywhere; but in the low countries about Dacca... this grass abounds; attaining to a prodigious luxuriance!"—Williamson, V. M., i. 259.

Doocaun, s. Ar. dukkān, Pers. and H. dukān, a shop; dūkāndār, a shop-keeper.

1354. "And when you buy in the dukāns (nos ducões), they don't give picotaa (q.v.), and so the Dukāndārs (os Ducamdares) gain..."—A. Nunes, 22.

1810. "L'estrade élevée sur laquelle le marchand assis, et d'où il montre sa marchandise aux acheteurs, est proprement ce qu'on appelle dukān; mot qui signifie, suivant son étymologie, une estrade ou plate-forme, sur laquelle on se peut tenir assis, et que nous traduisons improprement par boutique."—Note by Silvestre de Sacy in Relation de l'Égypte, 304.

1835. "The shop (dookkān) is a square recess, or cell, generally about 6 or 7 feet high. . . . Its floor is even with the top of a muštubah, or raised seat of stone or brick, built against the front."—Lane's Mod. Egyptians. ed. 1836, ii. 9.

Dooputty, s. Hind. do-paṭṭah, Beng. dupattā, &c. A piece of stuff of 'two breadths,' a sheet. "The principal or only garment of women of the lower orders" (in Bengal—Wilson). Applied in S. India by native servants, when speaking their own language, to European bed-sheets.

Doorga pooja. Sansk. Durgā-pūjā, 'Worship of Durgā.' The chief Hindu festival in Bengal, lasting for 10 days in September—October, and forming the principal holiday-time of all the Calcutta offices. See Dussera.

c. 1835.

"And every Doorga Pooja would good Mr. Simms explore The famous river Hoogly up as high as Barrackpore."

Lines in honour of the late Mr. Simms, Bole Ponjis, 1857, ii. 220.

Doorsumund, n.p. Dūrsamand; a corrupt form of Dvāra-Samudra (Gate of the Sea), the name of the capital of the Balālās, a medieval dynasty in S. India, who ruled a country generally corresponding with Mysore. The city itself is identified with the fine ruins at Halabīdu, in the Hassan district of Mysore.

c. 1300. "There is another country called Deogir. Its capital is called Dūrā Samundūr."—Rashīduddīn, in Elliot, i. 73. (There is confusion in this.)

1309. "The royal army marched from this place towards the country of Dūr Samun."—Wassāf, in Elliot, iii. 49.

1310. "On Sunday, the 23rd . . . he took a select body of cavalry with him, and on the 5th Shawwūl reached the fort of Dhūr Samund, after a difficult march of 12 days."—Amīr Khusrū, ib. 88. See also Notices et Extraits, xiii. 171.

Dorado, s. Port. A kind of fish; apparently a dolphin (not the cetaceous animal so called). The Coryphæna hippurus of Day's Fishes is called by Cuvier and Valenciennes C. dorado. See also quotation from Drake. One might doubt, because of the praise of its flavour in Bontius, whilst Day only says of the C. hippurus that "these dolphins are eaten by the natives." Fryer, however, uses an expression like that of Bontius:—"The Dolphin is extolled beyond these,"—i.e. Bonito and Albicore (p. 12).

1578. "When he is chased of the Bonito, or great mackrel (whom the Aurata or Dolphin also pursueth)."—Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc. 32.

1631. "Pisces Dorados dicti a Portugalensibus, ab aureo quem ferunt in cutecolore . . . hic piscis est longe optimi saporis, Bonitas bonitate excellens."—Jac. Bontii, Lib. V., cap. xix., 73.

Doray, Durai, s. This is a South Indian equivalent of Ṣāhib (q.v.), Tamil turai, 'Master.' Sinna-turai, 'small gentleman,' is the equivalent of chotā Ṣāhib; and turaisāni (corruptly doresāni) of 'Lady' or 'Madam.'

1837. "The Vakeels stand behind their masters' during all the visit, and discuss with them all that A— says. Sometimes they tell him some barefaced lie, and when they find he does not believe it, they turn to me grinning, and say, 'Ma'am, the Doory plenty cunning gentlyman.'"—Letters from Madras, 86.

Doria, s. H. ḍoriya, from dor, ḍorī, a cord or leash; a dog-keeper.

1781. "Stolen . . . The Dog was taken out of Capt. Law's Baggage Boat . . . by the Durreer that brought him to Calcutta."—India Gazette, March 17th.

Dow, s. Hind. dāo. A name much used on the Eastern frontier of Bengal as well as by Europeans in Burma, for the hewing knife, or bill, of various forms, carried by the races of those regions, and used both for cutting jungle and as a sword. Dhā is the true Burmese name for their weapon of this kind, but we do not know if there is any relation but an accidental one with the Hind. word.

Dowle, s. Hind. ḍaul, ḍaulā. The ridge of clay marking the boundary between two rice fields, and retaining the water; called commonly in S. India a bund. It is worth noting that in Sussex doole is "a small conical heap of earth, to mark the bounds of farms or parishes in the downs" (Wright, Dict. of Obs. and Prov. English). Also see the following :

1851. "In the N.W. corner of Suffolk, where the country is almost entirely open, the boundaries of the different parishes are marked by earthen mounds from 3 to 6 feet high, which are known in the neighbourhood as dools."—Notes and Queries, 1st Series, vol. iv., p. 161.

Dravidian, adj. The Sansk. term Drāviḍa seems to have been originally the name of the Conjeveram Kingdom (4th to 11th cent. A.D.), but in recent times it has been used as equivalent to 'Tamil.'

About A.D. 700 Kumārila Bhaṭṭa calls the language of the South Andhradrāviḍa-bhāṣā.*

Indeed Bishop Caldwell has shown reason for believing that Tamil and Drāviḍa, of which Dramiḍa (written Tiramiḍa), and Dramila are old forms, are really the same word. It may be suggested as possible that the Tropina of Pliny is also the same (see below).

Dr. Caldwell proposed Dravidian as a convenient name for the S. Indian languages which belong to the Tamil family, and the cultivated members of which are Tamil, Malayālam, Canarese, Tulu, Kuḍagu (or Coorg), and Telugu; the uncultivated Tuḍa, Kōṭa, Gōṇḍ, Khond, Orāon, Rājmahālī.

c. A.D. 70. "From the mouth of Ganges where he entereth into the sea unto the cape Calington, and the town Dandagula, are counted 725 miles; from thence to Tropina where standeth the chiefe mart or towne of merchandise in all India, 1225 miles. Then to the promontorie of Perimula they reckon 750 miles, from which to the towne abovesaid Patale . . . 620."—Pliny, by H. Holland, vi. chap. xx.

A.D. 404. In a south-western direction are the following tracts . . . Surashtrians, Bādaras, and Drāviḍas.—Varāha-mihira, in J. R. A. S., 2nd Ser. v. 84.

"The eastern half of the Narbadda district, . . . the Pulindas, the eastern half of the Drāviḍas . . . of all these the Sun is Lord."—Id. p. 231.

c. 1045. "Moreover, chief of the sons of Bharata, there are, the nations of the South, the Drāviḍas . . . the Karnātakas, Māhishakas . . ."—Vishnu Purāna, by H. H. Wilson, 1865, ii. 177-8.

1856. "The idioms which are included in this work under the general term 'Dravidian' constitute the vernacular speech of the great majority of the inhabitants of S. India."—Caldwell, Comp. Grammar of the Dravidian Languages, 1st ed.

1869. "The people themselves arrange their countrymen under two heads; five termed Panch-gaura, belonging to the Hindi, or as it is now generally called, the Aryan group, and the remaining five, or Panch-Dravida, to the Tamil type."—Sir W. Elliot, in J. Ethn. Soc., N. S. i. 94.

* Meaning probably, as Bishop Caldwell suggests, what we should now describe as "Telugu-Tamil-language."

Drawers, Long, s. An old-fashioned term, probably obsolete except in Madras, equivalent to pyjāmas (q. v.).

1794. "The contractor shall engage to supply . . . every patient . . . with . . . a clean gown, cap, shirt, and long drawers."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 115.

Dressing-boy, Dress-boy, s. Madras term for the servant who acts as valet, corresponding to the Bearer (q. v.) of N. India. 1837. See Letters from Madras, 106.

Druggerman, s. Neither this word for an 'interpreter,' nor the Levantine dragoman, of which it was a quaint old English corruption, is used in Anglo-Indian colloquial; nor is the Arab tarjumān, which is the correct form, a word usual in Hindustāni. But the character of the two former words seems to entitle them not to be passed over in this Glossary. The Arabic is a loan-word from Aramaic targēmān, metargēmān, 'an interpreter'; the Jewish Targums, or Chaldee paraphrases of the Scriptures, being named from the same root. The original force of the Aramaic root is seen in the Assyrian ragūmu, 'to speak,' rigmu, 'the word.' See Proc. Soc. Bibl. Arch. 1883, p. 73, and Delitsch, The Hebrew Lang. viewed in the Light of Assyrian Research, p. 50.

In old Italian we find a form somewhat nearer to the Arabic (see Pegolotti):

c. 1270. "After this my address to the assembly, I sent a message to Elx by a dragoman (trujaman) of mine."—Chron. of James of Aragon, tr. by Foster, ii. 538.

Villehardouin, early in the 13th century, uses drugement.

c. 1309. "Il avoit gens illec qui savoient le Sarrazinois et le françois que l'on appelle drugemens, qui enromancoient le Sarrazinois au Conte Perron."—Joinville, ed. de Wailly, 182.

c. 1348. "And at Tana you should furnish yourself with dragomans (turci-manni)."—Pegolotti's Handbook, in Cathay, &c. ii. 291, and App. iii.

1404. ". . . el maestro en Theologia dixo por su Truximan que dicesse al Señor q̄aquella carta que su fijo el rey lo embiara non la sabia otro leer, salvo el . . ."—Clarjio, 446.

1613. "To the Trojan Shore, where I landed Feb. 22 with fourteene English men more, and a few or Druggerman."—T. Coryat, in Purchas, ii. 1813.

1615. "E dietro, a cavallo, i dragomanni, cioè interpreti della repubblica e con loro tutti i dragomanni degli altri ambasciatori ai loro luoghi."—P. della Valle, i. 89.

1738.
"Till I cried out, you prove yourself so able,
Pity! you was not Druggerman at Babel!
For had they found a linguist half so good,
I make no question that the Tower had stood."—Pope, after Donne, Sat. iv. 81.

Other forms of the word are (from Span. trujaman) the old French truchement, Low Latin drocmandus, turchimannus, Low Greek δραγουμανος, &c.

Drumstick, s. The colloquial name in the Madras Presidency for the long slender pods of the Moringa pterygo-sperma, Gaertner, the Horse-Radish Tree (q. v.) of Bengal.

Dub, s. Telugu dabba, a small copper coin, value 20 cash; whence it comes to stand for money in general. It is curious that we have also an English provincial word, "Dubs = money, E. Sussex" (Holloway, Gen. Dict. of Provincialisms, Lewes, 1838). And the slang 'to dub up,' for to pay up, is common (see Slang Dict.).

1781. In "Table of Prison Expenses and articles of luxury only to be attained by the opulent, after a length of saving" (i.e. in captivity in Mysore), we have—

"Eight cheroots . . . 0 1 0.

"The prices are in fanams, dubs, and cash. The fanam changes for 11 dubs and 4 cash."—In Lives of the Lindsays, iii.

Dubash, Dobash, Debash, s. Hind. dubhūshiya, dobūshī (lit. 'man of two languages'). An Interpreter; obsolete except at Madras, and perhaps there also now. The Dubash was at that Presidency formerly a usual servant in every household; and there is still one attached to each mercantile house, as the broker transacting business with natives, and corresponding to the Calcutta banyan (q. v.).

According to Drummond the word has a peculiar meaning in Guzerat: "A Doobasheeo in Guzerat is viewed as an evil spirit, who by telling lies, sets people by the ears." This illustrates the original meaning of dubash, which might be rendered in Bunyan's fashion as Mr. Two-Tongues.

1673. "The Moors are very grave and haughty in their Demeanor, not vouchsafing to return an Answer by a slave, but by a Deubash."—Fryer, 30.

1693. "The chief Dubash was ordered to treat . . . for putting a stop to their proceedings."—Wheeler, i. 279.

1780. "He ordered his Dubash to give the messenger two pagodas (sixteen shillings);—it was poor reward for having received two wounds, and risked his life in bringing him intelligence."—Letter of T. Munro, in Life, i. 26.

1800. "The Dubash there ought to be hanged for having made difficulties in collecting the rice."—Letter of Sir A. Wellesley, in do. 259.

c. 1804. "I could neither understand them nor they me; but they would not give me up until a Debash, whom Mrs. Sherwood had hired . . . came to my relief with a palanquin."—Autobiog. of Mrs. Sherwood, 272.

1809. "He (Mr. North) drove at once from the coast the tribe of Aumils and Debashes."—Ld. Valentia, i. 315.

1810. "In this first boat a number of debashes are sure to arrive."—Williamson, V.M., i. 133.

"The Dubashes, then all powerful at Madras, threatened loss of caste, and absolute destruction to any Bramin who should dare to unveil the mysteries of their sacred language."—Morton's Life of Leyden, 30.

1860. "The moodilars and native officers . . . were superseded by Malabar Dubashes, men aptly described as enemies to the religion of the Singalese, strangers to their habits, and animated by no impulse but extortion."—Tennent, Ceylon, ii. 72.

Dubbeer, s. Pers. Hind. dabīr, 'a writer or secretary.' It occurs in Pehlevi as debr, connected with the old Pers. dipt, 'writing.' The word is quite obsolete in Indian use.

1760. "The King . . . referred the adjustment to his Dubbeer, or minister, which, amongst the Indians, is equivalent to the Duan of the Mahomedan Princes."—Orme, ii. sect. ii. 601.

Dubber, s. Hind. (from Pers.) dabbah; also, according to Wilson, Guzerāti dabaro; Mahr. dabara. A large oval vessel, made of green buffalo-hide, which, after drying and stiffening, is used for holding and transporting ghee or oil. The word is used in North and South alike.

1554. "Butter (a mameiga, i.e. ghee) sells by the maund, and comes hither (to Ormuz) from Bacoraa and from Reyxel;*

* Richel is the name of one of the Delta branches of the Indus, which was at one time the most frequented by trade, but is now choked. Ghee was a great export from the Delta, as the quotation from A. Hamilton shows; and see for Richel, Burnes, Travels, i. 212, 2nd ed.

the most (however) that comes to Ormuz is from Diul and from Mamgalor, and comes in certain great jars of hide, dabaas."—A. Nunes, 23.

1673. "Did they not boil their Butter it would be rank, but after it has passed the Fire they kept it in Duppers the year round."—Fryer, 118.

1727. (From the Indus Delta.) "They export great Quantities of Butter, which they gently melt and put up in Jars called Dup-pas, made of the Hides of Cattle, almost in the Figure of a Glob, with a Neck and Mouth on one Side."—A. Ham. i. 126.

1808. "Purbhoodas Shet of Broach, in whose books a certain Maharrata Sirdar is said to stand debtor for a Crore of Rupees . . . in early life brought . . . ghee in dubbers upon his own head hither from Baroda, and retailed it . . . in open Bazar."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

1810. ". . . dubbahs or bottles made of green hide."—Williamson, V.M., ii. 139.

1845. "I find no account made out by the prisoner of what became of these dubbahs of ghee."—G. O. by Sir C. Napier in Sind, 35.

Ducks, s. The slang distinctive name for gentlemen belonging to the Bombay service; the correlative of the Mulls of Madras and of the Qui-His of Bengal. It seems to have been taken from the term next following.

1860. "Then came Sire Jhone by Waye of Baldagh and Hormuz to yē Costys of Ynde . . . And atte what Place yē Knyghte came to Londe, theyre yē fōlke clepen Duckys (quasi DUCES INDIAE)."—Extract from a MS. of the Travels of Sir John Maunde in the E. Indies, lately discovered (Calcutta).

Ducks, Bombay. See Bummelo.

1860. "A fish nearly related to the salmon is dried and exported in large quantities from Bombay, and has acquired the name of Bombay Ducks."—Mason, Burmah, 273.

Duffadar, s. Hind. (from Arabo-Pers.) daf'adār, the exact rationale of which name it is not easy to explain. A petty officer of native police (v. burkundaize, &c.); and in regiments of Irregular Cavalry, a non-commissioned officer corresponding in rank to a corporal or naik.

1803. "The pay . . . for the duffadars ought not to exceed 35 rupees."—Wellington, ii. 242.

Dufter, s. Ar. Hind. daftar. Colloquially 'the office,' and interchangeable with cutcherry, except that the latter generally implies an office of the nature of a Court. Daftar—

khāna is more accurate. The original Arab. daftar is from the Greek δελφύρα = membranum, 'a parchment,' and thin 'paper' (whence also diphtheria), and was applied to loose sheets filed on a string, which formed the record of accounts; hence daftar becomes 'a register,' a public record. In Arab. any account-book is still a daftar.

In S. India daftar means a bundle of connected papers tied up in a cloth.

c. 1590. "Honest experienced officers upon whose forehead the stamp of correctness shines, write the agreement upon loose pages and sheets, so that the transaction cannot be forgotten. These loose sheets, into which all sanads are entered, are called the daftar."—Ain, i. 260, and see Blochmann's note there.

Dufferdār, s. Arab. Pers. Hind. daftardār, is or was "the head native revenue officer on the Collector's and Sub-Collector's establishment of the Bombay Presidency."—Wilson.

In the provinces of the Turkish Empire the Daftardār was often a minister of great power and importance as in the case of Mahommed Bey Daftardār, in Egypt in the time of Mahommed 'Alī Pasha (see Lane's Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1860, pp. 127-128). The account of the constitution of the office of Daftardār in the time of the Mongol conqueror of Persia, Hulāgu, will be found in a document translated by Hammer-Purgstall in his Gesch. der Goldenen Horde, 497-501.

Duftery, s. Hind. daftari. A servant in an Indian office (Bengal), whose business it is to look after the condition of the records, dusting and binding them; also to pen-mending, paper-ruling, making of envelopes, &c. In Madras these offices are done by a Moochee, q. v.

1810. "The Duftoree or office-keeper attends solely to those general matters in an office which do not come within the notice of the crannies, or clerks."—Williamson, V.M., i. 275.

Duggie, s. A word used in the Pegu teak trade, for a long squared timber. Milburn (1813), says: "Duggies are timbers of teak from 27 to 30 feet long, and from 17 to 24 inches square." Sir A. Phayre believes the word to be a corruption of the Burmese htāp-gyī. The first syllable means the 'cross-beam of a house,' the second 'big'; hence 'big-beam.'

Dugong, s. The cetaceous mammal Halocore dugong. The word is Malay dāyung, also Javan. duyung; Macassar, ruyung. The etymology we do not know.

Dumbcow, v., and Dumbcowed, participle. To brow-beat, to cow; and cowed, brow-beaten, set-down. This is a capital specimen of Anglo-Indian dialect. Dam khānā, 'to eat one's breath,' is a Hind. idiom for 'to be silent.' Hobson-Jobson converts this into a transitive verb, to damkhāo, and both spelling and meaning being affected by English suggestions of sound, this comes in Anglo-Indian use to imply cowing and silencing.

Dumdum, n.p. The name of a military cantonment 4½ miles N. W. of Calcutta, which was for seventy years (1783-1853) the head-quarters of that famous corps the Bengal Artillery.

The name, which occurs at intervals in Bengal, is no doubt Pers. Hind. damdama, 'a mound or elevated battery.' At Dumdum was signed the treaty which restored the British settlements after the re-capture of Calcutta in 1757.

Dumpoke, s. A name given in the Anglo-Indian kitchen to a baked dish, consisting usually of a duck, boned and stuffed. The word is Pers. dampukht, 'air-cooked,' i.e. baked. A recipe for a dish so-called, as used in Akbar's kitchen, is in the first quotation:

c. 1590. "Dampukht. 10 sers meat; 2 s. ghi; 1 s. onions; 1 l m. fresh ginger; 10 m. pepper; 2 d. cardamoms."—Ain, i. 61.

1673. "These eat highly of all Flesh Dum-poked, which is baked with Spice in Butter."—Fryer, p. 93.

"Baked Meat they call Dumpoke which is dressed with sweet Herbs and Butter, with whose Gravy they swallow Rice dry Boiled."—Ibid. 404.

1689. "... and a dumpoked Fowl, that is boild with Butter in any small Vessel, and stuff with Raisons and Almonds is another" (Dish).—Ovington, 397.

Dumree, s. Hind. damrī, a copper coin of very low value, not now existing.—See under Dam.

1823. In Malwa "there are 4 cowries to a gunda; 3 gundas to a dumrie; 2 dumries to a chedaum; 3 dumries to a tumdumrie; and 4 dumries to an adillah or half pice."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. ii. 194.

Dungaree, s. A kind of coarse and inferior cotton cloth; (Hind. dangri? but it is not in any dictionary that we know).

1673. "Along the Coasts are Bombaim . . . Carwar for Dungarees and the weightiest pepper."—Fryer, 86.

1813. "Dungarees (pieces to a ton) 400."—Milburn, ii. 221.

1863. "Such dungaree as you now pay half a rupee a yard for, you could then buy from 20 to 40 yards per rupee."—Miss Frere's Deccan Days, p. xxiv.

Durbar, s. A Court or Levee. Pers. darbār. Also the executive Government of a Native State (Carnegie).

1609. "On the left hand, thorow another gate you enter into an inner court where the King keeps his Darbar."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 432.

1616. "The tenth of Ianuary, I went to Court at foure in the euening to the Durbar, which is the place where the Mogoll sits out daily, to entertaine strangers, to receive Petitions and Presents, to giue commands, to see and to be scene."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 541.

1633. "This place they call the Derba (or place of Councill) where Law and Justice was administered according to the Custome of the Cuntry."—W. Bruton, in Hakluyt, v. 51.

c. 1750. ". . . . il faut se rappeler ces tems d'humiliations où le Francois étoient forcés pour le bien de leur commerce, d'aller timidement porter leurs presens et leurs hommages à de petis chefs de Bourgades que nous n'admetons aujourd'hui à nos Dorbares que lorsque nos intérêts l'exigent."—Letter of M. de Bussy, in Cambridge's Account, p. xxix.

1793. "At my darbar yesterday I had proof of the affection entertained by the natives for Sir William Jones. The Professors of the Hindu Law, who were in the habit of attendance upon him, burst into unrestrained tears when they spoke to me."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 289.

1809. "It was the darbar of the native Gentoo Princes."—Ed. Valentia, i. 362.

1875. "Sitting there in the centre of the darbar, we assisted at our first nautch."—M. E. Grant Duff, in Contemp. Rev., July.

Durgah, s. Pers. dargāh. Properly a royal court. But the habitual use of the word in India is for the shrine of a (Mahommedan) Saint, a place of religious resort and prayer.

1732. "Adjoining is a durgaw or burial place, with a view of the river."—Hodges, 102.

1807. "The dhurgaw may invariably be seen to occupy those scites pre-eminent for comfort and beauty."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, 24.

1828. ". . . he was a relation of the . . . superior of the Durgah, and this is now a sufficient protection."—The Kuzzilbash, ii. 273.

Durian, Dorian, s. Malay duren, Molucca form duriyān, from duri, 'a thorn or prickle,' the great fruit of the tree (N. O. Bombaceae) called by botanists Durio zibethinus, D. C. The tree appears to be a native of the Malay Peninsula, and the nearest islands; from which it has been carried to Tenasserim on one side and to Mindanao on the other.

The earliest European mention of this fruit is that by Nicolo Conti. The passage is thus rendered by Winter Jones: "In this Island (Sumatra) there also grows a green fruit which they call duriano, of the size of a cucumber. When opened five fruits are found within, resembling oblong oranges. The taste varies like that of cheese." (In India in the XVth Cent., p. 9).

We give the original Latin of Poggio below, which must be more correctly rendered thus: "They have a green fruit which they call durian, as big as a water-melon. Inside there are five things like elongated oranges, and resembling thick butter, with a combination of flavours." (See Carletti, below.)

The dorian in Sumatra often forms a staple article of food, as the jack (q. v.) does in Malabar. By natives and old European residents of the Malay regions in which it is produced the dorian is regarded as incomparable, but novices have a difficulty in getting over the peculiar, strong, and offensive odour of the fruit, on account of which it is usual to open it away from the house, and which procured for it the inelegant Dutch nickname of stuncker. "When that aversion, however, is conquered, many fall into the taste of the natives, and become passionately fond of it." (Crawfurd, H. of Ind. Arch. i. 419.) Our forefathers had not such delicate noses, as may be gathered from some of the older notices. A governor of the Straits, some thirty years ago, used to compare the Dorian to 'carrion in custard.'

c. 1440. "Fructum viridem habent nomine durianum, magnitudine cucumeris, in quo sunt quinque veluti malarancia oblonga, varii saporis, instar butyri coagulati."—Poggii, de Varietate Fortunae, Lib. iv.

1552. "Durions, which are fashioned like artichokes" (!)—Castanheda, ii. 355.

1553. "Among these fruits was one kind now known by the name of durions, a thing greatly esteemed, and so luscious that the Malacca merchants tell how a certain trader came to that port with a ship load of great value, and he consumed the whole of it in guzzling durions and in gallantries among the Malay girls."—Barros, II. vi. 1.

1563. "A gentleman in this country (Portuguese India) tells me that he remembers to have read, in a Tuscan version of Pliny, 'nobiles durianae.' I have since asked him to find the passage in order that I might trace it in the Latin, but up to this time he says he has not found it."—Garcia, f. 85.

1588. "There is one that is called in the Malacca tongue durion, and is so good that I have heard it affirmed by manie that have gone about the world, that it doth exceede in savour all others that ever they had seene or tasted . . . . . Some do say that have seene it that it seemeth to be that wherewith Adam did transgresse, being carried away by the singular savour."—Parke's Mendoza, ii. 318.

1598. "Duryoen is a fruit yt only groweth in Malacca, and is so much comèd by those which have proued ye same, that there is no fruit in the world to bee compared with it."—Linschoten, 102.

1599. The Dorian, Carletti thought, had a smell of onions, and he did not at first much like it, but when at last he got used to this he liked the fruit greatly, and thought nothing of a simple and natural kind could be tasted which possessed a more complex and elaborate variety of odours and flavours than this did.—See Viaggi, Florence, 1701; Pt. II. p. 211.

1601. "Duryoen . . . . ad apertionem primam . . . . putridum coepe redolet, sed dotem tamen divinam illam omnem gustui profundit."—Debry, iv. 33.

1615. "There groweth a certaine fruit, prickled like a ches-nut, and as big as one's fist, the best in the world to eate, these are somewhat costly, all other fruits being at an easie rate. It must be broken with force and therein is contained a white liquor like unto creame, never the lesse it yields a very vnsauory sent like to a rotten onion, and it is called Esturion" (probably a misprint).—De Monfart, 27.

1727. "The Durean is another excellent Fruit, but offensive to some People's Noses, for it smells very like . . . . but when once tasted the smell vanishes."—A. Ham. ii. 81.

1855. "The fetid Dorian, prince of fruits to those who like it, but chief of abominations to all strangers and novices, does not grow within the present territories of Ava, but the King makes great efforts to obtain a supply in eatable condition from the Tenasserim Coast. King Tharawadi used to lay post-horses from Martaban to Ava, to bring his odoriferous delicacy."—Mission to Ava, London, 1858, 161.

1878. "The durian will grow as large as a man's head, is covered closely with terribly sharp spines, set hexagonally upon its hard skin, and when ripe it falls; if it should strike any one under the tree, severe injury or death may be the result."—M'Nair, Perak, 60.

Durwaun, s. Hind. from Pers. darwān. A doorkeeper. A domestic servant so called is usual in the larger houses of Calcutta. He is porter at the gate of the compound (q. v.).

c. 1755. "Derwan."—List of servants in Ives, 50.

1781. (After an account of an alleged attempt to seize Mr. Hicky's Darwān). "Mr. Hicky begs leave to make the following remarks. That he is clearly of opinion that these horrid Assassins wanted to dispatch him whilst he lay a sleep, as a Door-van is well known to be the alarm of the House, to prevent which the Villians wanted to carry him off,—and their precipitate flight the moment they heard Mr. Hicky's Voice puts it past a Doubt."—Reflections on the consequence of the late attempt made to Assassinate the Printer of the original Bengal Gazette (in the same, April 14th).

1784. "Yesterday at daybreak, a most extraordinary and horrid murder was committed upon the Dirwan of Thomas Martin, Esq."—In Seton-Karr, i. 12.

"In the entrance passage, often on both sides of it, is a raised floor with one or two open cells, in which the Darwans (or door-keepers) sit, lie, and sleep—in fact dwell."—Calc. Review, vol. lix. p. 207.

Dussera, Dassora, Dasehra, s. Sansk. daśaharā, Hind. dasharā, Mahr. dasrā.

The nine-nights (or ten days) festival in October, also called Durgā-pūjā (v. Doorga-p.). In the west and south of India this holiday, taking place after the close of the wet season, became a great military festival, and the period when military expeditions were entered upon. The Mahrattas were alleged to celebrate the occasion in a way characteristic of them, by destroying a village!

The popular etymology of the word is dās, 'ten (sins)' and har, 'that which removes (or expiates'). It is, perhaps, rather connected with the ten days' duration of the feast, or with its chief day being the 10th of the month (Āśvina); but the origin is decidedly obscure.

c. 1590. "The autumn harvest he shall begin to collect from the Deshereh, which is another Hindoo festival that also happens differently, from the beginning of Virgo to the commencement of Libra."—(Gladwin's Ayeen, ed. 1800, i. 307.

1785. "On the anniversary of the Dus-harah you will distribute among the Hindoos, composing your escort, a goat to every ten men."—Tippoo's Letters, 162.

1799. "On the Institution and Ceremonies of the Hindoo Festival of the Dus-rah," published (1820) in Trans. Bomb. Lit. Society, iii. 73 seqq. (By Sir John Malcolm.)

1812. "The Courts . . . are allowed to adjourn annually during the Hindoo festival called dussarah."—Fifth Report, 37.

1813. "This being the desserah, a great Hindoo festival . . . we resolved to delay our departure and see some part of the ceremonies."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 97.

Dustoor, Dustoory, s. Pers.-Hind. dastūr, 'custom,' dastūrī, 'that which is customary.' That commission or percentage on the money passing in any cash transaction which, with or without acknowledgment or permission, sticks to the fingers of the agent of payment. Such 'customary' appropriations are, we believe, very nearly as common in England as in India; a fact of which newspaper correspondence from time to time makes us aware, though Europeans in India, in condemning the natives, often forget, or are ignorant of this. In India the practice is perhaps more distinctly recognized, as the word denotes. Ibn Batuta tells us that at the Court of Dehli, in his time (c. 1340), the custom was always for the officials to deduct  $\frac{1}{10}$  of every sum which the Sultan ordered to be paid from the treasury (see I. B. iii. pp. 403, 426, etc.).

1638. "Ces vallets ne sont point nourris au logis, mais ont leurs gages, dont ils s'entretiennent, quoy qu'ils ne montent qu'à trois ou quatre Ropias par moys. . . mais ils ont leur tour du baston, qu'ils appellent Testury, qu'ils prennent du consentement du Maître de celui dont ils achètent quelque chose."—Mandelslo, Paris, 1659, 224.

1780. "It never can be in the power of a superintendent of Police to reform the numberless abuses which servants of every Denomination have introduced, and now support on the Broad Basis of Dustoor."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 29th.

1785. "The Public are hereby informed that no Commission, Brokerage, or Dustoor is charged by the Bank, or permitted to be taken by any Agent or Servant employed by them."—In Seton-Karr, i. 130.

1795. "All servants belonging to the Company's Shed have been strictly prohibited from demanding or receiving any fees or dastoors on any pretence whatever."—Ibid. ii. 16.

1824. "The profits however he made during the voyage, and by a dustoor on all the alms given or received . . . were so considerable that on his return some of his confidential disciples had a quarrel with him."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 198.

1866. ". . . of all taxes small and great the heaviest is dustoores."—Trevelyan, Dawk Bungalow, 217.

Dustuck, s. Pers. dastak. A pass or permit. The dustucks granted by the Company's covenanted servants in the early half of last century seem to have been a constant instrument of abuse, or bone of contention, with the native authorities in Bengal.

1716. "A passport or dustuck, signed by the President of Calcutta, should exempt the goods specified from being visited or stopped."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 21.

1748. "The Zemindar near Pultah having stopped several boats with English Dusticks and taken money from them, and disregarding the Phousdar's orders to clear them. . . ."—In Long, 6.

1763. "The dignity and benefit of our Dustucks are the chief badges of honour, or at least interest, we enjoy from our Phirmaund."—From the Chief and Council at Dacca in Van Sittart, i. 210.

Dwarka, n. p. More properly Dvārakā or Dvārikā, quasi ἑκατόμυλος, 'the City with many gates,' a very sacred Hindu place of pilgrimage, on the extreme N. W. point of peninsular Guzerat; the alleged royal city of Krishna. It is in the small state called Okha, which Gen. Legrand Jacob pronounces to be "barren of aught save superstition and piracy."—(Tr. Bo. Geog. Soc. vii. 161.) Dvārikā is, we apprehend, the Bapākā of Ptolemy. Indeed, in an old Persian map, published in Vol. I. of the Indian Antiquary, p. 370, the place appears, transcribed as Bharrakay.

c. 1590. "The Fifth Division is Jugget (see Jigat), which is also called Daurka, Kishen came from Mehtra, and dwelt at this place, and died here. This is considered as a very holy spot by the Brahmins."—Ayeen, by Gladwin, ed. 1800, ii. 76.

E.

Eagle-wood, s. The name of an aromatic wood from Camboja and some other Indian regions, chiefly transgangeitic. It is the "odorous wood" referred to by Camões in the quotation under Champa. We have somewhere read an explanation of the name as applied to the substance in question, because this is flecked and mottled, and so supposed to resemble the plumage of the eagle! The word is in fact due to a corrupt form of the Sanskrit name of the wood, aguru. A form, probably, of this is ayil, which Gundert gives as the Malayalam word.* From this the Portuguese must have taken their aguila, as we find it in Barbosa (below), or pao (wood) d'aguila, made into aguila, whence French bois d'aigle, and Eng. eagle-wood. The Malays call it Kayū (wood) -gahru, evidently the same name, though which way the etymology flowed it is difficult to say.

The best quality of this wood, once much valued in Europe as incense, is the result of disease in a tree of the N. O. Leguminosae, the Aloezydon agallochum, Loureiro, growing in Camboja and S. Cochin China, whilst an inferior kind, of like aromatic qualities, is produced by a tree of an entirely different order, Aquilaria agallocha, Roxb. (N. O. Aquilariaceae), which is found as far north as Silhet.†

Eagle-wood is another name for aloes-wood, or aloes (q.v.) as it is termed in the English Bible. It is curious that Bluteau, in his great Portuguese Vocabulario, under Pao d'Aguila, jumbles up this aloes-wood with Socotrine Aloes. Αγάλλοχον was known to the ancients, and is described by Dioscorides (c. A.D. 65). In Liddell and Scott the word is rendered "the bitter aloes;" which seems to involve the same confusion that is made by Bluteau.

Other trade-names of the article given by Forbes Watson are Garrow- and Garroo-wood, agla-wood, ugger-, and tugger- (!) wood.

* Boile says "Malabar ayil," but this is apparently a misprint for Malawāka.

† We do not find certain information as to which tree produces the eagle-wood sold in the Temasserin bazars.

1563. "R. And from those parts of which you speak, comes the true lign-aloes? Is it produced there?

"O. Not the genuine thing. It is indeed true that in the parts about C. Comorin and in Ceylon there is a wood with a scent (which we call aguila brava), as we have many another wood with a scent. And at one time that wood used to be exported to Bengala under this name of aguila brava; but since then the Bengalas have got more knowing, and buy it no longer. . . ."—Garcia, f. 119v.-120.

1854. (In Cachar) "the eagle-wood, a tree yielding uggur oil, is also much sought for its fragrant wood, which is carried to Silhet, where it is broken up and distilled."—Hooker, Himalayan Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 318.

The existence of the aguila tree (darakht-i-'ād) in the Silhet hills is mentioned by Abu'l Fazl (Gladwin's Ayeen, ii. 10; orig. i. 391).

Earth-oil, s. Petroleum, such as that exported from Burma . . . The term is a literal translation of that used in nearly all the Indian vernaculars. The chief sources are at Ye-nan-gyoung on the Irawadi, lat. c. 20° 22'.

1755. "Raynan-Goung . . . at this place there are about 200 Families, who are chiefly employed in getting Earth-oil out of Pitts, some five miles in the Country."—Baker, in Dalrymple's Or. Rep. i. 172.

Ecka, s. A small one-horse carriage used by natives. It is Hind. ekka from ek, 'one.' But we have seen it written 1834. "One of those native carriages called ekkas was in waiting. This vehicle resembles in shape a meat-safe, placed upon the axle-tree of two wheels, but the sides are composed of hanging curtains instead of wire pannels."—The Baboo, ii. 4.

Eed, s. Arab. 'Īd. A Mahomedan holy festival, but in common application in India restricted to two such, called there the barī and choti (or Great and Little) 'Īd. The former is the commemoration of Abraham's sacrifice, the victim of which was, according to the Mahomedans, Ishmael. This is called among other names, Bakr-'Īd, the "Bull 'Īd," but this is usually corrupted by ignorant natives as well as Europeans into Bakr-'Īd (Hind. bakrā, f. bakrī, a goat). The other is the 'Īd of the Ramazan, viz., the termination of the annual fast; the festival called in Turkey Bairam, and by old travellers sometimes the "Mahomedan Easter."

(The passage is full of errors.)

Eedgah, s. Arabo-Pers. 'Īdgāh, "Place of 'Īd." A place of assembly and prayer on occasion of Musulman festivals. It is in India usually a platform of white plastered brickwork, enclosed by a low wall on three sides, and situated outside of a town or village. It is a marked characteristic of landscape in Upper India.

1792. "The commanding nature of the ground on which the Eed-Gah stands had induced Tippoo to construct a redoubt upon that eminence."—Ld. Cornwallis, Despatch from Seringapatam, in Seton-Karr, ii. 89.

Elephant, s. See SUPPLEMENT.

Elephanta, a. n.p. An island in Bombay Harbour, the native name of which is Gharāpuri (or sometimes, it would seem, shortly, Pāri), famous for its magnificent excavated temple, considered by Burgess to date after the middle of the 8th century. The name was given by the Portuguese from the life-size figure of an elephant, hewn from an isolated mass of trap-rock, which formerly stood in the lower part of the island, not far from the usual landing-place. This figure fell down many years ago, and was often said to have disappeared. But it actually lay in situ till 1864-5, when (on the suggestion of the late Mr. W. E. Frère) it was removed by Dr. (now Sir) George Birdwood to the Victoria Gardens at Bombay, in order to save the relic from destruction. The elephant had originally a smaller figure on its back, which several of the earlier authorities speak of as a young elephant, but which Mr. Erskine and Capt. Basil Hall regarded as a tiger. The horse mentioned by Fryer remained in 1712; it had disappeared apparently before Niebuhr's visit in 1764.

c. 1321. "In quod dum sic ascendissem, in xxviii. dietis me transtuli usque ad Tanam . . . haec terra multum bene est situata . . . Haec terra antiquitus fuit valde magna. Nam ipsa fuit terra regis Pori, qui cum rege Alexandro praelium maximum commisit."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., App. p. v.

We quote this because of its relation to the passages following. It seems probable that the alleged connexion with Porus and Alexander may have grown out of the name Puri or Pori.

1548. "And the Isle of Pory, which is that of the Elephant (d'Auffante), is leased to João Pirez by arrangements of the said Governor (dom João de Crastro) for 150 pardaos."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 158.

1580. "At 3 hours of the day we found ourselves abreast of a cape called Bombain, where is to be seen an ancient Roman temple, hollowed in the living rock. And above the said temple are many tamarind-trees, and below it a living spring, in which they have never been able to find bottom. The said temple is called Alefante, and is adorned with many figures, and inhabited by a great multitude of bats; and here they say that Alexander Magnus arrived, and for memorial thereof caused this temple to be made, and further than this he advanced not."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 62r.-63.

1598. "There is yet an other Pagode, which they hold and esteem for the highest and chiefest Pagode of all the rest, which standeth in a little lland called Pory; this Pagode by the Portingalls is called the Pagode of the Elephant. In that lland standeth an high hill, and on the top thereof there is a hole, that goeth down into the hill, digged and carved out of the hard rock or stones as big as a great cloyster . . . round about the wals are cut and formed, the shapes of Elephants, Lions, tigers, & a thousand such like wilde and cruel beasts . . .”—Linschoten, ch. xliv.

1616. Diego de Couto devotes a chapter of 11 pp. to his detailed account “do muito notavel e espantoso Pagode do Elefante.” We extract a few paragraphs:

“This notable and above all others astonishing Pagoda of the Elephant stands on a small islet, less than half a league in compass, which is formed by the river of Bombain, where it is about to discharge itself southward into the sea. It is so called because of a great Elephant of stone, which one sees in entering the river. They say that it was made by the orders of a heathen king called Banasur, who ruled the whole country inland from the Ganges . . . On the left side of this chapel is a doorway 6 palms in depth and 5 in width, by which one enters a chamber which is nearly square and very dark, so that there is nothing to be seen there; and with this ends the fabric of this great pagoda. It has been in many parts demolished; and what the soldiers have left is so maltreated that it is grievous to see destroyed in such fashion one of the Wonders of the World. It is now 50 years since I went to see this marvellous Pagoda; and as I did not then visit it with such curiosity as I should now feel in doing so, I failed to remark many particulars which exist no longer. But I do remember me to have seen a certain Chapel, not to be seen now, open on the whole façade (which was more than 40 feet in length), and which along the rock formed a plinth the whole length of the edifice, fashioned like our altars both as to breadth and height; and on this plinth were many remarkable things to be seen. Among others I remember to have noticed the story of Queen Pasiphae and the bull; also the Angel with naked sword thrusting forth from below a tree two beautiful figures of a man and a woman, who were naked, as the Holy Scripture paints for us the appearance of our first parents Adam and Eve.”—Couto, Dec. VII. liv. iii. cap. xi.

1644. “. . . an islet which they call Ilheo do Ellefante . . . In the highest part of this Islet is an eminence on which there is a mast from which a flag is unfurled when there are prowls (puras) about, as often happens, to warn the small unarmed vessels to look out. . . . There is on this island a pagoda called that of the Elephant, a work of extraordinary magnitude, being cut out of the solid rock,” &c.—Bocarro, MS.

1673. “. . . We steered by the south side of the Bay, purposely to touch at Elephanto, so called from a monstrous Elephant cut out of the main Rock, bearing a young one on its Back; not far from it the Effigies of a Horse stuck up to the Belly in the Earth in the Valley; from thence we clambered up the highest Mountain on the Island, on whose summit was a miraculous Piece hewed out of solid Stone: It is supported with 42 Corinthian Pillars,” &c.—Fryer, 75

1690. “At 3 Leagues distance from Bombay is a small Island called Elephanta, from the Statue of an Elephant cut in Stone. . . . Here likewise are the just dimensions of a Horse Carved in Stone, so lively . . . that many have rather Fancied it, at a distance, a living Animal. . . . But that which adds the most Remarkable Character to this Island, is the fam’d Pagode at the top of it; so much spoke of by the Portuguese, and at present admir’d by the present Queen Dowager, that she cannot think any one has seen this part of India, who comes not Freightened home with some Account of it.”—Ovington, 158-9.

1712. “The island of Elephanta . . . takes its name from an elephant in stone, with another on its back, which stands on a small hill, and serves as a sea mark. . . . As they advanced towards the pagoda through a smooth narrow pass cut in the rock, they observed another hewn figure which was called Alexander’s horse.”—From an account written by Captain Pyke, on board the Stringer East India-man, and illd. by drawings. Read by A. Dalrymple to the Soc. of Antiquaries, 10th Feb. 1780, and pubd. in Archæologia, vii. 323 seqq. One of the plates (xxi.) shows the elephant having on its back distinctly a small elephant, whose proboscis comes down into contact with the head of the large one.

1727. “A league from thence is another larger, called Elephanto, belonging to the Portuguese, and serves only to feed some Cattle. I believe it took its name from an Elephant carved out of a great black Stone, about Seven Foot in Height.”—A. Ham. i. 240.

1760. “Le lendemain, 7 Decembre, des que le jour parut, je me transportai au bas de la seconde montagne, en face de Bombaye, dans un coin de l’Isle, où est l’Elephant qui a fait donner à Galipouri le nom d’Elephante. L’animal est de grandeur naturelle, d’une pierre noire, et detachée du sol, et paroît porter son petit sur son dos.”—Anquetil du Perron, I. ccccxliii.

1761. “. . . The work I mention is an artificial cave cut out of a solid Rock, and decorated with a number of pillars, and gigantic statues, some of which discover y<sup>e</sup> work of a skilful artist; and I am inform’d by an acquaintance who is well read in y<sup>e</sup> antient history, and has minutely considered y<sup>e</sup> figures, that it appears to be y<sup>e</sup> work of King Sesostris after his Indian Expedition.”—MS. Letter of James Rennell.

1764. “Plusieurs Voyageurs font bien mention du vieux temple Payen sur la petite Isle Elephanta près de Bombay, mais ils n'en parlent qu'en passant. Je le trouvois si curieux et si digne de l'attention des Amateurs d'Antiquités, que j'y fis trois fois le Voyage, et que j'y dessinois tout ce que s'y trouve de plus remarquable . . ."—Carsten Niebuhr, Voyage, ii. 25.

" . . . Pas loin du Rivage de la Mer, et en pleine Campagne, on voit encore un Elephant d'une pierre dure et noirâtre . . . La Statue . . . porte quelque chose sur le dos, mais que le tems a rendu entièrement méconnoissable . . . Quant au Cheval dont Ovington et Hamilton font mention je ne l'ai pas vu."—Id. 33.

1780. "That which has principally attracted the attention of travellers is the small island of Elephanta, situated in the east side of the harbour of Bombay. . . . Near the south end is the figure of an elephant rudely cut in stone, from which the island has its name. . . . On the back are the remains of something that is said to have formerly represented a young elephant, though no traces of such a resemblance are now to be found."—Account, &c. By Mr. William Hunter, Surgeon in the E. Indies, Archæologia, vii. 286.

1783. In vol. viii. of the Archæologia, p. 231, is another account in a letter from Hector Macneil, Esq. He mentions "the elephant cut out of stone," but not the small elephant, nor the horse.

Mr. Erskine says in regard to the figure on the back of the large elephant: "The remains of its paws, and also the junction of its belly with the larger animal, were perfectly distinct; and the appearance it offered is represented on the annexed drawing made by Captain Hall (Pl. II.)*, who from its appearance conjectured that it must have been a tiger rather than an elephant; an idea in which I feel disposed to agree."—Id. 208.

b. s. A name given, originally by the Portuguese, to violent storms occurring at the termination, though some travellers describe it as at the setting in, of the Monsoon.

1554. "The Damani, that is to say a violent storm arose; the kind of storm is known under the name of the Elephant; it blows from the west."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 75.

c. 1616. "The 20th day (August), the night past fell a storme of raine called the Oliphant, vsuall at going out of the raines."—Sr T. Roe in Purchas, i. 549.

1659. "The boldest among us became dismayed; and the more when the whole culminated in such a terrific storm that we were compelled to believe it must be that yearly raging tempest which is called the Elephant. This storm, annually, in September and October, makes itself heard in a frightful manner, in the Sea of Bengal."—Walter Schulze, 67.

c. 1665. "Il y fait si mauvais pour le Vaisseauux au commencement de ces mois à cause d'un Vent d'Orient qui y souffle en ce tems-là avec violence, et qui est toujours accompagnée de gros nuages qu'on appelle Elephans, parce-qu'ils en ont la figure. . . ."—Thevenot, v. 38.

1673. "Not to deviate any longer, we are now winding about the South-West part of Ceilon; where we have the Tail of the Elephant full in our mouth; a constellation by the Portugals called Rabodel Elephanto, known for the breaking up of the Monsoons, which is the last Flory this season makes."—Fryer, 48.

1756. "9th (October). We had what they call here an Elephanta, which is an excessive hard gale, with very severe thunder, lightning and rain, but it was of short continuance. In about 4 hours there fell . . . 2 (inches)."—Ives, 42.

c. 1760. "The setting in of the rains is commonly ushered in by a violent thunder-storm, generally called the Elephanta."—Grose, i. 33.

Elephant-Creeper, s. Argyreia speciosa, Sweet. (N. O. Convolvulaceae). The leaves are used in native medicine as poultices, &c.

Elk, s. The name given by sportsmen in S. India, with singular impropriety, to the great stag Rusa Aristotelis, the sāmbār and bārasīngā of Upper India.

Ell'ora (though very commonly called Ellóra), n.p. Properly Elurā, otherwise Vérulé, a village in the Nizam's territory, 7 m. from Daulatābād, which gives its name to the famous and wonderful rock-caves and temples in its vicinity, excavated in the crescent-shaped scarp of a plateau, about 1½ m. in length. These works are Buddhist (ranging from A.D. 450 to 700), Brahminical (c. 650 to 700), and Jain (c. 800-1000).

c. 1665. "On m'avoit fait a Sourat grande estime des Pagodes d'Elora . . . (and after describing them) . . . Quoiqu'il en soit, si l'on considère cette quantité de Temples spacieux, remplis de pilastres et de colonnes, et tant de milliers de figures, et le tout taillé dans le roc vif, on peut dire avec vérité que ces ouvrages surpassent la force humaine; et qu'au moins les gens du siècle dans lequel ils ont été faits, n'étoient pastout-à-fait barbares."—Thevenot, v. p. 222.

It is not easy to understand the bearing of the drawing in question.

1684. "Muhammad Sháh Malik Júná, son of Tughlik, selected the fort of Deogir as a central point whereat to establish the seat of government, and gave it the name of Daulatábád. He removed the inhabitants of Dehli thither. . . . Ellora is only a short distance from this place. At some very remote period a race of men, as if by magic, excavated caves high up among the defiles of the mountains. These rooms extended over a breadth of one kos. Carvings of various designs and of correct execution adorned all the walls and ceilings; but the outside of the mountain is perfectly level, and there is no sign of any dwelling. From the long period of time these Pagans remained masters of this territory, it is reasonable to conclude, although historians differ, that to them it is to be attributed the construction of these places."—Sáki Musta'id Khun, Ma-áin-i-Álamgiri, in Elliot, vii. 189-190.

1760. "Je descendis ensuite par un sentier frayé dans le roc, et après m'être muni de deux Brahmes que l'on me donna pour fort instruits je commençai la visite de ce que j'appelle les Pagodes d'Eloura."—Anquetil du Perron, I. ccxxiii.

1794. "Description of the Caves . . . on the Mountain, about a Mile to the Eastward of the town of Ellora, or as called on the spot, Verrool." (By Sir C. W. Malet.) In As. Researches, vi. 38 seqq.

Elu, n.p., or in older form Helu, is believed to be a transformation of Sihala (see Ceylon), and is applied especially to the language of the old Singhalese Poetry.

Emblie Myrobalans. See under Myrobalans.

English-bazar, n.p. This is a corruption of the name (Angrezábád = 'English-town') given by the natives in the 17th century to the purlieus of the factory at Malda in Bengal. Now the Zillah Station of Malda district.

1683. "I departed from Cassumbazar with designe (God willing) to visit ye factory at Englesavad."—Hedges, May 6.

1878. "These ruins (Gaur) are situated about 8 miles to the south of Angrézábád (English Bazar), the civil station of the district of Máldah . . .".—Ravenshaw's Gaur, p. 1.

Eurasian, s. A modern name for persons of mixt European and Indian blood, devised as being more euphemistic than half-caste and more precise than East-Indian.

1880. "The shovel-hats are surprised that the Eurasian does not become a missionary or a schoolmaster, or a policeman, or something of that sort. The native papers say, 'Deport him'; the white prints say, 'Make him a soldier'; and the Eurasian himself says, 'Make me a Commissioner, give me a pension.'"—Ali Baba, 123.

Europe, adj. Commonly used in India for "European," in contradistinction to "country" (q.v) as qualifying goods, viz., those imported from Europe. The phrase is probably obsolescent.

"Europe shop" is a shop where European goods of sorts are sold at an upcountry station. The first quotation applies the word to a man.

1673. "The Enemies, by the help of an Europe Engineer, had sprung a Mine to blow up the Castle."—Fryer, 87.

1711. "On the arrival of a Europe ship, the Sea-Gate is always throng'd with People."—Lockyer, 27.

c. 1817. "Now the Europe shop into which Mrs. Browne and Mary went was a very large one, and full of all sorts of things. One side was set out with Europe caps and bonnets, ribbons, feathers, sashes, and what not."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, ed. 1873, 23.

1866. "Mrs. Smart. Ah, Mr. Cholmondeley, I was called the Europe Angel."—The Dawki Bungalow, p. 219.

Eysham, Ehshâm, s. Ar. ahshâm, pl. of hashm, a train or retinue. One of the military technicalities affected by Tippoo; and according to Kirkpatrick (Tippoo's Letters, App. p. cii.) applied to garrison troops. Miles explains it as "Irregular infantry with swords and matchlocks" (See his tr. of H. of Hydur Naik, p. 398, and tr. of H. of Tipû Sultân, p. 61).

F.

Factor, s. Originally a commercial agent; the executive head of a factory. Till some 40 years ago the Factors formed the third of the four classes into which the covenanted civil servants of the Company were theoretically divided, viz., Senior Merchants, Junior Merchants, Factors, and Writers. But these terms had long ceased to have any relation to the occupation of those officials, and even to have any application at all except in the nominal lists of the service. The titles, however, continue (through vis inertiae of administration in such matters) in the classified lists of the Civil Service for years after the abolition of the last vestige of the Company's trading character, and it is not till the publication of the E. I. Register for the first half of 1842 that they disappear from that official publication. In this the whole body appears without any classification; and in that for the second half of 1842 they are divided into six classes, first class, second class, &c., an arrangement which, with the omission of the 6th class, still continues.

Possibly the expressions Factor, Factory, may have been adopted from the Portuguese Feitor, Feitoria. The formal authority for the classification of the civilians is quoted under 1675.

1501. "With which answer night came on, and there came aboard the Captain Mór that Christian of Calecut sent by the Factor (feitor) to say that Cojebequi assured him, and he knew it to be the case, that the King of Calecut was arming a great fleet."—Correa, i. 250.

1582. "The Factor and the Catuall having seen these parcels began to laugh thereat."—Castañeda, transl. by N. L., f. 46 b.

1600. "Capt. Middleton, John Havard, and Francis Barne, elected the three principal Factors. John Havard, being present, willingly accepted."—Sainsbury, i. 111.

c. 1610. "Les Portugais de Malaca ont des commis et facteurs par toutes ces Isles pour le trafic."—Pyrard de la Val, ii. 106.

1653. "Feitor est vn terme Portugais signifiant vn Consul aux Indes."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 538.

1666. "The Viceroy came to Cochin, and there received the news that Antonio de Sá, Factor (Futor) of Coulam, with all his officers, had been slain by the Moors."—Faria y Sousa, i. 35.

1675-6. "For the advancement of our Apprentices, we direct that, after they have served the first five yeares, they shall have £10 per annum, for the last two yeares; and having served these two yeares, to be entertained one year longer, as Writers, and have Writers' salary: and having served that yeare, to enter into 2<sup>d</sup> degree of Factor, which otherwise would have been ten yeares. And knowing that a distinction of titles is, in many respects necessary, we do order that when the Apprentices have served their times, they be stiled Writers; and when the Writers have served their times, they be stiled Factors, and Factors having served their times to be stiled Merchants; and Merchants having served their times to be stiled Senior Merchants."—Ext. of Court's Letter in Bruce's Annals of the E. I. Co., ii. 374-5.

1689. "These are the chief Places of Note and Trade where their Presidents and Agents reside, for the support of whom, with their Writers and Factors, large Privileges and Salaries are allowed."—Ovington, 388.

(The same writer tells us that Factors got £40 a year; junior Factors, £15; Writers, £7. Peons got 4 rupees a month. P. 392.)

1711. Lockyer gives the salaries at Madras as follows:

"The Governor, £200 and £100 gratuity; 6 Councillors, of whom the chief (2nd?) had £100, 3d. £70, 4th. £50, the others £40, which was the salary of 6 Senior Merchants. 2 Junior Merchants, £30 per annum; 5 Factors, £15; 10 Writers £5; 2 Ministers, £100; 1 Surgeon, £30.

"Attorney-General has 50 Pagodas per Annum gratuity.

"Scavenger (!) 100 do.

c. 1748. "He was appointed to be a Writer in the Company's Civil Service, becoming . . . after the first five (years) a factor."—Orme, Fragment, viii.

1781. "Why we should have a Council and Senior and Junior Merchants, factors and writers, to load one ship in the year (at Penang), and to collect a very small revenue, appears to me perfectly incomprehensible."—Corresp. of Ld. Cornwallis, i. 390.

1786. In a notification of Aug. 10th, the subsistence of civil servants out of employ is fixed thus:

A Senior Merchant—£400 sterling per ann.

A Junior Merchant—£300 " "

Factors and Writers—£200 " "

In Seton-Kurr, i. 131.

Factory, s. A trading establishment at a foreign port or mart (see preceding).

1500. "And then he sent ashore the Factor Ayles Correa with the ship's carpenters . . . and sent to ask the King for timber . . . all which the King sent in great sufficiency, and he sent orders also for him to have many carpenters and labourers to assist in making the houses; and they brought much plank and wood, and palm-trees which they cut down at the Point, so that they made a great Campo,* in which they made houses for the Captain Mór, and for each of the Captains, and houses for the people, and they made also a separate large house for the factory (feitoria)."—Correa, i. 168.

1582. " . . . he sent a Nayre . . . to the intent hee might remaine in the Factorye."—Castañeda (by N. L.), ff. 54 b.

* This use of campo is more like the sense of compound (q.v.) than in any instance that we had found when completing that article.

1606. "In which time the Portingall and Tydoryan Slaves had sacked the towne, setting fire on the factory."—Middleton's Voyage, G. (4).

1615. "The King of Acheen desiring that the Hector should leave a merchant in his country . . . it has been thought fit to settle a factory at Acheen, and leave Juxon and Nicolls in charge of it."—Sainsbury, i. 415.

1809. "The factory-house (at Cuddalore) is a chaste piece of architecture, built by my relative Diamond Pitt, when this was the chief station of the British on the Coromandel Coast."—Ld. Valentia, i. 372.

We add a list of the Factories established by the E. I. Company, as complete as we have been able to compile. We have used 'Milburn, Sainsbury, the "Charters of the E. I. Company," and "Robert Burton, The English Acquisitions in Guinea and East India, 1728," which contains (p. 184) a long list of English Factories. It has not been possible to submit our list as yet to proper criticism. The letters attached indicate the authorities, viz., M. Milburn, S. Sainsbury, C. Charters, B. Burton.

Faghfur, n.p. See SUPPLEMENT.

Failsoof, s. Ar. H. faïlsûf, from φύλοσοφος. But its popular sense is a 'crafty schemer,' an 'artful dodger.' Filosofo, in Manila, is applied to a native who has been at college, and returns to his birthplace in the provinces, with all the importance of his acquisitions, and the affectation of European habits (Blumentritt, Vocabulary).

Fakeer, s. Hind. from Arab. fuḳīr ('poor'). Properly an indigent person, but specially applied to a Mahommedan religious mendicant, and then, loosely and inaccurately, to Hindu devotees and naked ascetics. And this last is the most ordinary Anglo-Indian use.

1604. "Fokers are men of good life, which are only given to peace. Leo calls them Hermites; others call them Talbies and Saints."—Collection of things . . . of Barbarie, in Purchas, ii. 857.

1633. "Also they are called Fackeeres, which are religious names."—W. Bruton, in Hak. v. 56.

c. 1660. "I have often met in the Field, especially upon the Lands of the Rajas, whole squadrons of these Faquires, altogether naked, dreadful to behold. Some held their Arms lifted up . . . ; others had their terrible Hair hanging about them. . . ; some had a kind of Hercules's Club; others had dry and stiff Tiger-skins over their Shoulders. . . ."—Bernier, E. T. p. 102.

"There stalks a row of Hindoo devotees, Bedaubed with ashes, their foul matted hair

Down to their heels: their bleary eyes fiercely scowl

Beneath their painted brows. On this side struts

A Mussulman Fakeer, who tells his beads, By way of prayer, but cursing all the while The heathen."—The Banyan Tree.

1673. "Fakiers or Holy Men, abstracted from the World, and resigned to God."—Fryer, 95.

1690. "They are called Faquirs by the Natives, but Ashmen commonly by us, because of the abundance of Ashes with which they powder their Heads."—Ovington, 350.

1727. "Being now settled in Peace, he invited his holy Brethren the Fakires, who are very numerous in India, to come to Agra and receive a new Suit of Clothes."—A. Ham. i. 175.

1770. "Singular expedients have been tried by men jealous of superiority to share with the Bramins the veneration of the multitude; this has given rise to a race of monks known in India by the name of Fakirs."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 49.

1774. "The character of a fakir is held in great estimation in this country."—Boyle, in Markham's Tibet, 23.

1878. "Les mains abandonnées sur les genoux, dans une immobilité de fakir."—Alph. Daudet, Le Nabab, ch. vi.

Falaun, s. Ar. fulān, fulān, and H. fulāna, 'such an one,' 'a certain person.' In Elphinstone's Life we see that this was the term by which he and his friend Strachey used to indicate their master in early days, and a man whom they much respected, Sir Barry Close. And gradually, by a process of Hobson-Jobson, this was turned into Forlorn.

1803. "The General (A. Wellesley) is an excellent man to have a peace to make. . . I had a long talk with him about such a one; he said he was a very sensible man."—Op. cit. i. 81.

1824. "This is the old ghaut down which we were so glad to retreat with old Forlorn."—ii. 164. See also i. 56, 108, 345, &c.

Fanam, s. The denomination of a small coin long in use in S. India, Malayāl. and Tamil paṇam ('money'), from Sansk. paṇa. There is also a Dekhani form of the word, fulum. In Telugu it is called rāka. The form fanam was probably of Arabic origin, as we find it long prior to the Portuguese period. The fanam was anciently a gold coin, but latterly of silver, or sometimes of base gold. It bore various local values, but according to the old Madras monetary system, prevailing till 1818, 42 fanams went to one star pagoda, and a Madras fanam was therefore worth about 2d. (see Prinsep's Useful Tables, by E. Thomas, p. 18).

Fanams are still met with on the west coast, and as late as 1862 were received at the treasuries of Malabar and Calicut. As the coins were very small they used to be counted by means of a board or dish, having a large number of holes or pits. On this a pile of fanams was shaken, and then swept off, leaving the holes filled. About the time named Rs. 5,000 worth of gold fanams were sold off at those treasuries.

c. 1344. "A hundred fanām are equal to 6 golden dīnārs" (in Ceylon).—Ion Batuta, iv. 174.

c. 1348. "And these latter (Malabar Christians) are the Masters of the public steelyard, from which I derived, as a perquisite of my office as Pope's Legate, every month a hundred gold fan, and a thousand when I left."—John Mariignotti, in Cathay, 343.

1442. "In this country they have three kinds of money, made of gold mixed with alloy . . . the third, called fanom, is equivalent in value to the tenth part of the last mentioned coin" (partāb, vid. pardao).—Abdurrazak, in India in the XVth Cent. p. 26.

1498. "Fifty fanoeens, which are equal to 3 cruzados."—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 107.

1505. "Quivi spendono ducati d'auro veneziani e monete di auro et argento e metallo. chiamano vna moneta de argento fanone. XX vagliono vn ducato. Tara e vn altramoneta de metallo. XV vagliono vn Fanone."—Italian Version of Letter from Dom Manuel of Portugal (Reprint by A. Burnell, 1881), p. 12.

1510. "He also coins a silver money called tare, and others of gold, 20 of which go to a pardao, and are called fanom. And of these small coins of silver, there go sixteen to a fanom."—Varthema, Hak. Soc. 130.

1516. "Eight fine rubies of the weight of one fanão . . . are worth fanões 10."—Barbosa (Lisbon ed.), 384.

1553. "In the ceremony of dubbing a knight he is to go with all his kinsfolk and friends, in pomp and festal procession, to the House of the King . . . and make him an offering of 60 of those pieces of gold which they call Fanões, each of which may be worth 20 reis of our money."—De Barros, Dec. I. liv. ix. cap. iii.

1582. In the English transl. of 'Castañeda' is a passage identical with the preceding, in which the word is written "Fannon."—fol. 36, b.

"In this city of Negapatan aforesaid are current certain coins called fannō . . . They are of base gold, and are worth in our money 10 soldi each, and 17 are equal to a zecchin of Venetian gold."—Gasp. Balbi, f. 84 v.

1752. "N.B. 36 Fanams to a Pagoda, is the exchange, by which all the servants belonging to the Company receive their salaries. But in the Bazar the general exchange in Trade is 40 to 42."—T. Brooks, p. 8.

1785. "You are desired to lay a silver fanam, a piece worth three pence, upon the ground. This, which is the smallest of all coins, the elephant feels about till he finds."—Caraccioli, Life of Clive, i. 288.

1803. "The pay I have given the boatmen is one gold fanam for every day they do not work, and two gold fanams for every day they do."—From Sir A. Wellesley, in Life of Munro, i. 342.

Fan-palm, s. The usual application of this name is to the Borassus flabelliformis, L. (see Brab and Palmyra), which is no doubt the type on which our ladies' fans have been formed. But it is also sometimes applied to the Talipot (q.v.); and it is exceptionally (and surely erroneously) applied by Sir L. Pelly (J. R. G. S., xxxv. 232) to the "Traveller's Tree," i.e., the Madagascar Havenala (Urania speciosa).

Farāsh, Ferāsh, Frash, s. Ar. Hind. farrāsh. A menial servant whose proper business is to spread carpets, pitch tents, &c., and in fact, in a house, to do housemaid's work; employed also in Persia to administer the bastinado. The word was in more common use in India two centuries ago than now.

c. 1300. "Sa grande richesce apparut en un pavillon que li roys d'Ermenie envioia au roy de France, qui valoit bien cinq cens livres; et li manda li roy de Hermenie que uns ferrais au Soudanc dou Coyne li avoit donnei. Ferrais est cil qui tient les pavillons au Soudanc et qui li nettoie ses mesons."—Jehan, Seigneur de Joinville, ed. De Wailly, p. 78.

c. 1513. "And the gentlemen rode . . . upon horses from the king's stables, attended by his servants whom they call farazes, who groom and feed them."—Correa, Lendas, II. i. 364.

(Here it seems to be used for syce (q.v.) or groom.)

c. 1590. "Besides, there are employed 1000 Farrashes, natives of Irān, Turān, and Hindostān."—Āin, i. 47.

1648. "The Frassy for the Tents."—Van Twist, 86.

1673. "Where live the Frasses or Porters also."—Fryer, 67.

1824. "Call the ferashes . . . and let them beat the rogues on the soles of their feet till they produce the fifty ducats."—Hajji Baba (ed. 1835), 40.

Fedea, Fuddea, s. A denomination of money formerly current in Bombay and the adjoining coast; Mahr. p'hadyā (qu. Ar. fidya, ransom?). It constantly occurs in the account statements of the 16th century, e.g. of Nunez (1554) as a money of account, of which 4 went to the silver tanga, 20 to the pardao. In Milburn (1813) it is a pie or copper coin, of which 50 were = to a rupee.

Ferāzee, s. Properly Ar. farrāzī, from farrāz (pl. of farz) 'the divine ordinances.' A name applied to a body of Mahommedan Puritans in Bengal, kindred to the Wahābis of Arabia. They represent a reaction and protest against the corrupt condition and pagan practices into which Mahommedanism in Eastern India had fallen, analogous to the former decay of native Christianity in the south (see Malabar Rites). This reaction was begun by Hajji Shariyatullah, a native of the village of Daulatpūr, in the district of Faridpūr, who was killed in an agrarian riot in 1831. His son Dūdū Miyān succeeded him as head of the sect. Since his death, some 20 years ago, the influence of the body is said to have diminished, but it had spread very largely through Lower Bengal.

The Farūzī wraps his dhotī (q.v.) round his loins, without crossing it between his legs, a practice which he regards as heathenish; as a Bedouin would.

Fetish, s. A natural object, or animal, made an object of worship. From Port. fetiço, feitico, or fetisso (old Span. fechizo), apparently from fuc-titius, signifying first 'artificial,' and then 'unnatural,' 'wrought by charms,' &c. The word is not Anglo-Indian; but it was at an early date applied by the Portuguese to the magical figures, &c., used by natives in Africa and India, and has thence been adopted into French and English. The word has of late years acquired a special and technical meaning, chiefly through the writings of Comte.

Raynouard (Lex. Roman.) has fachurier, fachilador for a sorcerer, which he places under fat, i.e., fatum, and cites old Catalan fadador, old Sp. hadador, and then Port. feiticeiro, &c. But he has mixed up the derivatives of two different words, fatum and fuc-titius. Prof. Max Müller quotes, from Muratori, a work of 1311 which has: "incantationes, sacrilegia, auguria, vel maleficia, quae facturae seu praestigia vulgariter appellantur." And Raynouard himself has in a French passage of 1446—"par leurs sorceries et factureries."

c. 1539. "E que jà por duas vezes o tinhão têtado cò arroydo feytico, só a fim de elle sayr fora, e o matarem na briga . . ."—Pinto, ch. xxxiv.

1552. "They have many and various idolatries, and deal much in charms (feiticoes) and divinations."—Castanheda, ii. 51.

1553. "And as all the nation of this Ethiopia is much given to sorceries (feiticos) in which stands all their trust and faith . . . and to satisfy himself the more surely of the truth about his son, the king ordered a feitico which was used among them (in Congo). This feitico being tied in a cloth was sent by a slave to one of his women, of whom he had a suspicion."—Barros, I. iii. 10.

1600. "If they find any Fettisos in the way as they goe (which are their idolatrous gods) they give them some of their fruit."—In Purchas, ii. 940, see also 961.

1606. "They all determined to slay the Archbishop . . . they resolved to do it by another kind of death, which they hold to be not less certain than by the sword or other violence, and that is by sorceries (feyticos), making these for the places by which he had to pass."—Gouvea, f. 47.

1673. "We saw several the Holy Office had branded with the names of Fetisceroes or Charmers, or in English Wizards."—Fryer, 155.

1690. "They (the Africans) travel nowhere without their Fateish about them."—Orington, 67.

1878. "The word fetishism was never used before the year 1700. In that year appeared an anonymous book called Du Culte des Dieux Fétiches, ou Parallèle de l'Ancienne Religion de l'Egypte avec la Rel. actuelle de la Nigritie." It is known that this book was written by . . . the well known President de Brosses . . . Why did the Portuguese navigators . . . recognise at once what they saw among the Negroes of the Gold Coast as feiticos? The answer is clear. Because they themselves were perfectly familiar with a feitico, an amulet or talisman."—Max Müller, Herbert Lectures, 56-57.

Firefly, s. Called in South Indian vernaculars by names signifying the 'Lightning Insect.'

A curious question has been discussed among entomologists, &c., of late years, viz., as to the truth of the alleged rhythmical or synchronous flashing of fireflies when visible in great numbers. Both the present writers can testify to the fact of a distinct effect of this kind. One of them can never forget an instance in which he witnessed it, twenty years or more before he was aware that any one had published, or questioned, the fact. It was in descending the Chāndor Ghāt, in Nāsik District of the Bombay Presidency, in the end of May or beginning of June, 1843, during a fine night preceding the rains. There was a large amphitheatre of forest-covered hills, and every leaf of every tree seemed to bear a firefly. They flashed and intermitted throughout the whole area in apparent rhythm and sympathy. It is, we suppose, possible that this may have been a deceptive impression, though it is difficult to see how it should originate. The suggestions made at the meetings of the Entomological Society are utterly unsatisfactory to those who have observed this phenomenon. In fact it may be said that those suggested explanations only assume that the soi-disant observers did not observe what they alleged. We quote several independent testimonies to the phenomenon.

1579. "Among these trees, night by night, did show themselves an infinite swarms of fierce seeming worms flying in the air, whose bodies (no bigger than an ordinary fly) did make a shew, and give such light as every twig on every tree had been a lighted candle, or as if that place had been the starry sphere."—Drake's Voyage, by F. Fletcher, Hak. Soc., 149.

"Ere fireflies trimmed their vital lamps, and ere Dun Evening trod on rapid Twilight's heel,
His knell was rung."—Grainger, Bk. I.

1824.

"Yet mark! as fade the upper skies,
Each thicket opens ten thousand eyes.
Before, behind us, and above,
The fire-fly lights his lamp of love,
Retreating, chasing, sinking, soaring,
The darkness of the copse exploring."

Heber, ed. 1844, i. 253.

1865. "The bushes literally swarm with fireflies, which flash out their intermittent light almost contemporaneously; the effect being that for an instant the exact outline of all the bushes stands prominently forward, as if lit up with electric sparks, and next moment all is jetty dark—darker from the momentary illumination that preceded. These flashes succeed one another every 3 or 4 seconds for about 10 minutes, when an interval of similar duration takes place; as if to allow the insects to regain their electric or phosphoric vigour."—Cameron, Our Tropical Possessions in Malayan India, 80-81.

The passage quoted from Mr. Cameron's book was read at the Entom. Soc. of London in May, 1865, by the Rev. Hamlet Clarke, who added that:

"Though he was utterly unable to give an explanation of the phenomenon, he could so far corroborate Mr. Cameron as to say that he had himself witnessed this simultaneous flashing; he had a vivid recollection of a particular glen in the Organ Mountains where he had on several occasions noticed the contemporaneous exhibition of their light by numerous individuals, as if they were acting in concert."

Mr. McLachlan then suggested that this might be caused by currents of wind, which by inducing a number of the insects simultaneously to change the direction of their flight, might occasion a momentary concealment of their light.

Mr. Bates had never in his experience received the impression of any simultaneous flashing . . . he regarded the contemporaneous flashing as an illusion produced probably by the swarms of insects flying among foliage, and being continually, but only momentarily, hidden behind the leaves.—Proceedings of Entom. Soc. of London, 1865, pp. 94-95.

Fifteen years later at the same Society:

"Sir Sidney Saunders stated that in the South of Europe (Corfu and Albania) the simultaneous flashing of Luciola italica, with intervals of complete darkness for some seconds, was constantly witnessed in the dark summer nights, when swarming myriads were to be seen. . . . He did not concur in the hypothesis propounded by Mr. McLachlan . . . the flashes are certainly intermittent . . . the simultaneous character of these coruscations among vast swarms would seem to depend upon an instinctive impulse to emit their light at certain intervals as a protective influence, which intervals became assimilated to each other by imitative emulation. But whatever be the cause . . . the fact itself was incontestable."—Ibid. for 1880, Feby. 4th, p. ii., see also p. vii.

1868. "At Singapore . . . the little luminous beetle commonly known as the firefly (Lampyrus, sp. ign.) is common . . . clustered in the foliage of the trees, instead of keeping up an irregular twinkle, every individual shines simultaneously at regular intervals, as though by a common impulse; so that their light pulsates, as it were, and the tree is for one moment illuminated by a hundred brilliant points, and the next is almost in total darkness. The intervals have about the duration of a second, and during the intermission only one or two remain luminous."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, p. 255.

taneously. Each tree suddenly flashes from bottom to top. Thousands of trees presenting this appearance simultaneously, afford a spectacle beautiful, if not grand, beyond conception. This little insect, the female of its kind, only appears and displays its brilliant light immediately before the monsoon."—Deccan Herald. (From Pioneer Mail, June 17th.)

Firinghee, s. Pers. Farangī, Fi-irangi, Ar. Ifrangi, Firanji, i.e. a Frank. This term for a European is very old in Asia, but when now employed by natives in India is either applied (especially in the South) specifically to the Indian-born Portuguese, or, when used more generally, for 'European,' implies something of hostility and disparagement. (See Sonnerat and Elphinstone below.)

In South India the Tamil P'arangi, the Singhalese Parangi, mean only 'Portuguese.'

Pirangi is in Tel. = cannon (C. B. P.), just as in the mediæval Mahommedan historians we find certain mangonels for sieges called maghribi or "Westerns." And it may be added that Baber, in describing the battle of Pānipat (1526) calls his artillery Farangīha (see Autob. by Leyden and Erskine, p. 306, note. See also paper by Gen. R. MacLagan, R.E., on early Asiatic fire-arms, in J. As. Soc. Bengal, xlv., Pt. 1, pp. 66-67).

c. 930. "The Afranjah are of all those nations the most warlike . . . the best organized, the most submissive to the authority of their princes."—Mas'uli, iii. 66.

c. 1340. "They call Franchi all the Christians of these parts from Romania westward."—Pegolotti, in Cathay, &c. 292.

c. 1350. "— Franks. For so they term us, not indeed from France, but from Frank-land (non a Francis sed a Frankūid)."—Marignolli, in Cathay, 336.

In a Chinese notice of the same age the horses carried by Marignolli as a present from the Pope to the Great Khan are called "horses of the kingdom of Fulang," i.e. of Farang or Europe.

1384. "E quello nominare Franchi procede da Franceschi, che tutti ci appellano Franceschi."—Frescobaldi, Viaggio, p. 23.

1498. "And when he heard this he said that such people could be none other than Francos, for so they call us in those parts."—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 97.

1560. "Habitão aqui (Tabriz) duas nações de Christãos . . . e huns delles a qui chamão Franques, estes tem o costume e fé, como nos . . . e outros são Armenos."—A. Teuveiro, Itinerario, ch. xv.

1565. "Suddenly news came from Thatta that the Firingis had passed Lahori Bandar, and attacked the city."—Tārkh-i-Tāhiri, in Elliot, i. 276.

c. 1610. "La renommée des François a esté telle par leur conquestes en Orient, que leur nom y est demeuré pour memoire éternelle, en ce qu'encore aujourd'huy par toute l'Asie et Afrique on appelle du nom de Franghi tous ceux qui viennent d'Occident."—Mocquet, 24.

1616. ". . . alii Cafres et Cafaros eos dicunt, alii Francos, quo nomine omnes passim Christiani . . . dicuntur."—Jarric, Thesaurus, iii. 217.

1632. ". . . he shew'd two Passes from the Portugals which they call by the name of Fringes."—W. Bruton, in Hakluyt, v. 32.

1648. "Mais en ce repas-là tout fut bien accommodé, et il y a apparence qu'un cuisinier Frangui s'en estoit mêlé."—Tavernier, V. des Indes, iii. ch. 22.

c. 1660. "The same Fathers say that this King (Jehan-Guire), to begin in good earnest to countenance the Christian Religion, designed to put the whole Court into the habit of the Franqui, and that after he had . . . even dressed himself in that fashion, he called to him one of the chief Omrahs . . . this Omrah . . . having answered him very seriously, that it was a very dangerous thing, he thought himself obliged to change his mind, and turned all into raillery."—Bernier, E. T. 92.

1673. "The Artillery in which the Fringis are Listed; formerly for good Pay, now very ordinary, having not above 30 or 40 Rupees a month."—Fryer, 193.

1682. ". . . whether I had been in Turkey and Arabia (as he was informed) and could speak those languages . . . with which they were pleased, and admired to hear from a Frenge (as they call us)."—Hedges, Oct. 29.

1755. "By Feringy I mean all the black mustee (see Mustees) Portuguese Christians residing in the settlement as a people distinct from the natural and proper subjects of Portugal; and as a people who sprung originally from Hindoos or Mussulmen."—Holwell, in Long, 59.

1774. "He said it was true, but everybody was afraid of the Firingies."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 176.

1782. "Ainsi un Européen est tout ce que les Indiens connoissent de plus méprisable; ils le nomment Farangui, nom qu'ils donnoient aux Portugais, lorsque ceux-ci aborderent dans leur pays, et c'est un terme qui marque le souverain mépris qu'ils ont pour toutes les nations de l'Europe."—Sonnerat, i. 102.

1791. "... il demande à la passer (la nuit) dans un des logemens de la pagoda; mais on lui refusa d'y coucher, à cause qu'il étoit frangui."—B. de St. Pierre, Chaumière Indienne, 21.

1794. "Feringee. The name given by the natives of the Decan to Europeans in general, but generally understood by the English to be confined to the Portuguese."—Moor's Narrative, 504.

1824. "'Now Hajji,' said the ambassador . . . 'The Franks are composed of many, many nations. As fast as I hear of one hog, another begins to grunt, and then another and another, until I find that there is a whole herd of them.'"—Hajji Baba, ed. 1833, p. 432.

1825. "Europeans, too, are very little known here, and I heard the children continually calling out to us, as we passed through the villages, 'Feringhee, ue Feringhee!'"—Heber, ii. 43.

1828. "Mr. Elphinstone adds in a note that in India it is a positive affront to call an Englishman a Feringhee."—Life of E., ii. 207.

c. 1861.

"There goes my lord the Feringhee, who talks so civil and bland.

But raves like a soul in Jehannum if I don't quite understand—

He begins by calling me Sahib, and ends by calling me fool . . ."

A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

The Tibetans are said to have corrupted Firingy into Pelong (or Philin). But Jaeschke disputes this origin of Pelong.

Firmaun, s. Pers. farmān, 'an order, patent, or passport,' der. from farmādan, 'to order.' Sir T. Roe below calls it firma, as if suggestive of the Italian for 'signature.'

1606. "We made our journey having a Firman (Firmāto) of safe conduct from the same Soltan of Shiraz."—Gouvea, f. 140 b.

1616. "Then I moved him for his favour for an English Factory to be resident in the Towne, which hee willingly granted, and gave present order to the Buxy to draw a Firma . . . for their residence."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 541.

1648. "The 21st April the Bassa sent me a Firman or Letter of credentials to all his lords and Governors."—T. Van den Broecke, 32.

1673. "Our Usage by the Pharmaund (or charters) granted successively from their Emperors, is kind enough, but the better because our Naval Power curbs them."—Fryer, 115.

1683. "They (the English) complain, and not without a Cause; they having a Phirmaund, and Hodgee Sophee Caun's Pervannas thereon, in their hands, which cleared them thereof; and to pay Custome now they will not consent, but will rather withdraw their trading. Wherefore their desire is that for 3,000 rup. Piscash (as they paid formerly in Hugly) and 2,000 r. more yearly on account of Jidgea, which they are willing to pay, they may on that condition have a grant to be Custome Free."—Nabob's Letter to Vizier (MS.), in Hedges, under July 18.

1689. "... by her came Bengal Peons who brought in several letters and a firmaun from the new Nabob of Bengal."—Wheeler, i. 213.

c. 1690. "Now we may see the Mogul's Stile in his Phirmaund to be sent to Surat, as it stands translated by the Company's Interpreter."—A. Ham. i. 227.

Fiscal, s. Dutch Fiscaal; used in Ceylon for 'Sheriff;' a relic of the Dutch rule in the island.

Florican, Florikin, s. A name applied in India to two species of small bustard, the 'Bengal Florican' (Sypheotides bengalensis, Gmelin), and the Lesser Florican (S. auritus, Latham), the likh of Hind., a word which is not in dictionaries.

The origin of the word is exceedingly obscure; see Jerdon below. It looks like Dutch.

Littre has: "Florican . . . Nom à Ceylon d'un grand échassier que l'on présume être un grue." This is probably mere misapprehension in his authority.

1780. "The floriken, a most delicious bird of the buzzard [sic] kind."—Munro's Narrative, 199.

1785.

"A floriken at eve we saw
And kill'd in yonder glen,
When lo! it came to table raw,
And rouzed [sic] the rage of Ben."

In Seton-Karr, i. 98.

1807. "The floriken is a species of the bustard . . . The cock is a noble bird, but its flight is very heavy and awkward . . . if only a wing be broken . . . he will run off at such a rate as will baffle most spaniels . . . There are several kinds of the floriken . . . the bustard floriken is much smaller . . . Both kinds . . . delight in grassy plains, keeping clear of heavy cover."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, p. 104.

1813. "The florican or curmoo (Otis houbara, Lin.) exceeds all the Indian wild fowl in delicacy of flavour."—Forbes, Orient. Mem., ii. 275.

1824. "... bringing with him a brace of florikens, which he had shot the previous day. I had never seen the bird before; it is somewhat larger than a blackcock, with brown and black plumage, and evidently of the bustard species."—Heber, i. 258.

1862. "I have not been able to trace the origin of the Anglo-Indian word 'Florikin,' but was once informed that the Little Bustard of Europe was sometimes called Flander-lin. Latham gives the word 'Flercher' as an English name, and this, apparently, has the same origin as Florikin."—Jerdon's Birds, 2d ed. ii. 625.

We doubt if Jerdon has here understood Latham correctly. What Latham writes is, in describing the Passarage Bustard, which, he says, is the size of the Little Bustard: "Inhabits India. Called Passarage Plover. . . I find that it is known in India by the name of Oorail; by some of the English called Flercher" (Suppt. to Gen. Synopsis of Birds, 1787, 229). Here we understand "the English" to be the English in India, and Flercher to be a clerical error for some form of "Floriken."

1875. "In the rains it is always matter of emulation at Rajkot, who shall shoot the first purple-crested florican."—Wyllie's Essays, 358.

Flowered-Silver. A term applied by Europeans in Burma to the standard quality of silver used in the ingot currency of Independent Burma, called by the Burmese yowet-nī or 'Red-leaf.' The English term is taken from the appearance of stars and radiating lines, which forms on the surface of this particular alloy, as it cools in the crucible. The Ava standard is, or was, of about 15 per cent. alloy, the latter containing, besides copper, a small proportion of lead, which is necessary, according to the Burmese, for the production of the flowers or stars (see Mission to Ava, 259-260).

Fly, s. The sloping, or roof part of the canvas of a tent is so called in India; but we have not traced the origin of the word; nor have we found it in any English dictionary. A tent such as officers generally use has two flies, for better protection from sun and rain. The vertical canvas walls are called Kanāt (see Canaut).

1810. "The main part of the operation of pitching the tent, consisting of raising the flies, may be performed, and shelter afforded, without the walls, &c., being present."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 452.

Flying-Fox, s. Popular name of the great bat, Pteropus Edwardsi, Geoff. In the daytime these bats roost in large colonies, hundreds or thousands of them pendent from the branches of some great ficus.

Jerdon says of these bats: "If water is at hand, a tank, or a river, or the sea, they fly cautiously down and touch the water, but I could not ascertain if they took a sip, or merely dipped part of their bodies in" (Mammals of India, p. 18). The truth is, as Sir George Yule has told us from his own observation, that the bat in its skimming flight dips its breast in the water, and then imbibes the moisture from its own wet fur. Probably this is the first record of a curious fact in natural history.

1298. ". . . all over India the birds and beasts are entirely different from ours, all but . . . the Quail . . . For example, they have bats—I mean those birds that fly by night and have no feathers of any kind; well, their birds of this kind are as big as a goshawk!"—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 17.

c. 1328. "There be also bats really and truly as big as kites. These birds fly no-whither by day, but only when the sun sets. Wonderful! By day they hang themselves up on trees by the feet, with their bodies downwards, and in the daytime they look just like big fruit on the tree."—Friar Jordanus, p. 19.

1555. "On the road we occasionally saw trees whose top reached the skies, and on which one saw marvellous bats, whose wings stretched some 14 palms. But these bats were not seen on every tree."—Sūdī 'Alī, 91.

1813. "The enormous bats which darken its branches frequently exceed 6 feet in length from the tip of each wing, and from their resemblance to that animal are not improperly called flying-foxes."—Forbes, Or. Men., iii. 246.

1882. ". . . it is a common belief in some places that emigrant coolies hang with heads downward, like flying-foxes, or are ground in mills for oil."—Pioneer Mail, Dec. 13th, p. 579.

Fogass, s. A word of Port. origin used in S. India; fogaça, from fogo, 'fire,' a cake baked in embers. It is composed of minced radish with chilies, &c., used as a sort of curry, and eaten with rice.

1554. ". . . fecimus iter per amoens et non infrigiferas Bulgarorum convallis: quo fere tempore pani usum subcinericio, fugacias vocant."—Busbequii Epist., i. (p. 42).

Folium Indicum. See Mala-bathrum. The article appears under this name in Milburn (1813, i. 283), as an article of trade.

Fool's Rack. For Rack see Arrack. Fool Rack is originally, as will be seen from Garcia and Acosta, the name of the strongest distillation from toddy or sura, the 'flower' (p'hul, in Hind. and Mahratti) of the spirit. But the 'striving after meaning,' caused the English corruption of this name to be applied to a peculiarly abominable and pernicious spirit, in which, according to the statement of various old writers, the stinging sea-blubber was mixed, or even a distillation of the same, with the view of making it more ardent.

1563. "... this sura they distill like brandy (agua ardente): and the result is a liquor like brandy; and a rag steeped in this will burn as in the case of brandy; and this fine spirit they call fula, which means 'flower'; and the other quality that remains they call orraca, mixing with it a small quantity of the first kind . . ."—Garcia, f. 67.

1578. "... la qual (sura) en vasos después destilan, para hazer agua ardiente, de la qual una, a que ellos llaman Fula, que quiere dezir 'flor,' es mas fina . . . y la segunda, que llaman Orraca, no tanto."—Acosta, p. 101.

1598. "This Sura being distilled, is called Fula or Nipe (q.v.), and is as excellent agua vitae as any is made in Dort of their best renish wine, but this is of the finest kinde of distillation."—Lanschoten, 101.

1631. "DURAEUS . . . Apparet te etiam a vino adusto, nec Arac Chinensi, abhorrere? BONTIUS. Usum commendo, abusum abominor . . . at cane pejus et angue vitandum est quod Chinesens avarissimi simul et astutissimi bipedum, mixtis Holothuriis in mari fluctuantibus, parant . . . eaque tam exurentis sunt caloris ut solo affectu vesicas in cute excitent . . ."—Jac. Bontii, Hist. Nat. et Med. Ind., Dial. III.

1673. "Among the worst of these (causes of disease) Fool Rack (Brandy made of Blubber, or Curvil, by the Portugals, because it swims always in a Blubber, as if nothing else were in it; but touch it, and it stings like Nettles; the latter, because sailing on the Waves it bears up like a Portuguese Carril (see Caravel): It is, being taken, a Gelly, and distilled causes those that take it to be Fools) . . ."—Frøyer, 68-69.

Foozilow, To, v. The imperative p'hulāo of the Hind. verb p'hulānā. To flatter or cajole, used, in a common Anglo-Indian fashion (see bunnow, puckarow, luggow, &c.) as a verbal infinitive.

Foras Lands. This is a term peculiar to the Island of Bombay, and an inheritance from the Portuguese. They are lands reclaimed from the sea, by the construction of the Vellard (q.v.) at Breachcandy, and other embankments, on which account they are known also as 'Salt Batty (i.e. rice) -grounds.' The Court of Directors, to encourage reclamation, in 1703 authorised these lands to be leased rent-free to the reclaimers for a number of years, after which a small quit-rent was to be fixed. But as individuals would not undertake the maintenance of the embankments, the Government stepped in and constructed the Vellard at considerable expense. The lands were then let on terms calculated to compensate the Government. The tenure of the lands, under these circumstances, for many years gave rise to disputes and litigation as to tenant-right, the right of Government to resume, and other like subjects. The lands were known by the title Foras, from the peculiar tenure, which should perhaps be Foros, from foro, a quit-rent.

The Indian Act VI. of 1851 arranged for the termination of these differences, by extinguishing the disputed rights of Government, except in regard to lands taken up for public purposes, and by the constitution of a Foras Land Commission to settle the whole matter. This work was completed by October, 1853.

The roads from the Fort crossing the "Flats," or Foras Lands, between Malabar Hill and Parell were generally known as "the Foras Roads;" but this name seems to have passed away, and the Municipal Commissioners have superseded that general title by such names as Clerk Road, Bellasis Road, Falkland Road. One name, 'Comattee-poorā Forest Road,' perhaps preserves the old generic title under a disguise.

Forasdārs are the holders of Foras Lands. See on the whole matter Bombay Selections, No. III., New Series, 1854. The following quaint quotation is from a petition of forasdārs of Mahim and other places regarding some points in the working of the Commission:

1852. "... that the case with respect to the old and new salt batty grounds, may it please your Honble. Board to consider deeply, is totally different, because in their original state the grounds were not of the nature of other sweet waste grounds on the island, let out as foras, nor these grounds were of that state as one could saddle himself at the first undertaking thereof with leases or grants even for that smaller rent as the foras is under the denomination of foras is same other denomination to it, because the depth of these grounds at the time when sea-water was running over them was so much that they were a perfect sea-bay, admitting fishing-boats to float towards Parell."—In Selections, as above, p. 29.

Foujdar, Phousdar, &c., s. Properly a military commander (Pers. fauj, 'a military force,' fauj-dār, 'one holding such a force at his disposal'), or a military governor of a district. But in India, an officer of the Moghul Government who was invested with the charge of the police, and jurisdiction in criminal matters. Also used in Bengal, last century, for a criminal judge.

In the Āin, a Faujdar is in charge of several pergunnahs under the Sipāh-sālār, or Viceroy and C. in Chief of the Subah (Gladwin's Ayeen, i. 294).

1683. "The Fousdar received another Perwannā directed to him by the Nabob of Decca . . . forbidding any merchant whatsoever trading with any Interlopers."—Hedges, Nov. 8.

1690. "... If any Thefts or Robberies are committed in the Country, the Fousdar, another officer, is oblig'd to answer for them . . ."—Orington, 232.

1702. "... Perwannas directed to all Foudjars."—Wheeler, i. 405.

1754. "The Phousdar of Vellore . . . made overtures offering to acknowledge Mahomed Ally."—Orme, i. 372.

1757. "Phousdar . . ."—Ives, 157.

1783. "A complaint was made that Mr. Hastings had sold the office of phousdar of Hoogly to a person called Khān Jehān Khān, on a corrupt agreement."—11th Report on Affairs of India, in Burke, vi. 545.

1786. "... the said phousdar (of Hoogly) had given a receipt of bribe to the patron of the city, meaning Warren Hastings, to pay him annually 36,000 rupees a year."—Articles ag. Hastings, in Burke, vii. 76.

1809. "The Foojadar, being now in his capital, sent me an excellent dinner of fowls, and a pillau."—Ld. Valentia, i. 409.

1810.

"For ease the harass'd Foujdar prays
When crowded Courts and sultry days
Exhale the noxious fume,

While poring o'er the cause he hears
The lengthened lie, and doubts and fears
The culprit's final doom."

Lines by Warren Hastings.

1824. "A messenger came from the 'Foujdah' (chatellain) of Suronmuggur, asking why we were not content with the quarters at first assigned to us. . ."—Heber, i. 233.

The form is here plainly a misreading; for the Bishop on next page gives Foujdar.

Foujdarry, Phousdarry, s. Per. faujdarī, a district under a faujdar, or military governor; the office and jurisdiction of a faujdar; in Bengal, 'police jurisdiction.' Also 'criminal' as opposed to civil justice. Thus the chief criminal court at Madras and Bombay, up to 1863 was termed the Foujdary Adawlut, corresponding to the Nizamut Adawlut in Bengal. See Adawlut.

Fowra, s. In Upper India, a mattock or large hoe; the tool generally employed for digging in most parts of India. Properly speaking (Hind.) p'hāorā. See Mamooty.

1830. "It so fell out the other day in Cawnpore, that, when a patwari endeavoured to remonstrate with some cultivators for taking water for irrigation from a pond, they knocked him down with the handle of a phaora and cut off his head with the blade, which went an inch or more into the ground, whilst the head rolled away several feet."—Pioneer Mail, 4th March.

Fox, Flying. See Flying.

Frazala, Farasola, Frazil, Frail, s. Arab. fārsala, a weight formerly much used in trade in the Indian seas. As usual it varied much locally, but it seems to have run from 20 to 30 lbs., and occupied a place intermediate between the (smaller) maund and the bahār; the fārsala being generally equal to ten (small) maunds, the bahār equal to 10, 15, or 20 fārsalas. See Barbosa (Hak. Soc.) 224; Milburn, i. 83, 87, &c.; Prinsep's Useful Tables, by Thomas, pp. 116, 119.

1510. "They deal by farasola, which farasola weighs about twenty-five of our lire."—Varthema, p. 170.

On this Dr. Badger notes: "Farasola is the plural of fārsala . . . still in ordinary use among the Arabs of the Red Sea and Persian Gulf; but I am unable to verify (its) origin." Is the word, which is sometimes called frail, the same as a frail, or basket, of figs? And again is it possible that fārsala is the same word as 'parcel, through L. Latin particella? We see that this is Capt. Burton's opinion (Camoens, iv. 390).

1534. "The baar (see bahar) of cloves in Ormuz contains 20 faracola, and besides these 20 faracolas it contains 3 maunds (maios) more, which is called picotaa." (q.v.). — A. Nunes, p. 5.

Freguezia, s. This Portuguese word for 'a parish' appears to have been formerly familiar in the west of India.

c. 1760. "The island . . . still continues divided into three Roman-Catholic parishes, or Freguezias, as they call them; which are Bombay, Mahm, and Salvaçam." — Grose, i. 45.

Fuleeta, s. Properly (Pers.) palūta. A slow-match, as of a matchlock, but its usual colloquial Anglo-Indian application is to a cotton slow-match used to light cigars, and often furnished with a neat or decorated silver tube. This kind of cigar-light is called at Madras Ramosammy, q.v.

Fuleeta-pup, s. This, in Bengal, is a well-known dish in the repertory of the ordinary native cook. It is a corruption of 'fritter-puff!'

Furlough, s. This word for a soldier's leave has acquired a peculiar citizenship in Anglo-Indian colloquial, from the importance of the matter to those employed in Indian service. It appears to have first been made the subject of systematic regulation in 1796. The word seems to have come to England from the Dutch Verlof, 'leave of absence,' in the early part of the 17th century, through those of our countrymen who had been engaged in the wars of the Netherlands. It is used by Ben Jonson, who had himself served in those wars:

"Pennyboy, Jun. Where is the deed?
hast thou it with thee?

Picklock. No.

It is a thing of greater consequence
Than to be borne about in a black box
Like a Low-Country vorloff, or Welsh brief."

The Staple of News, Act v. sc. 1.

Furnaveese, n.p. This once familiar title of a famous Mahratta Minister (Nana Furnaveese) is really the Persian farḍ-nawīs, 'statement writer' or secretary.

Fusly, adj. Arab. Pers. faṣlī, relating to the faṣl, season or crop. This name is applied to certain solar eras established for use in revenue and other civil transactions, under the Mahomedan rule in India, to meet the inconvenience of the lunar calendar of the Hijra, in its want of correspondence with the natural seasons. Three at least of these eras were established by Akbar, applying to different parts of his dominions, intended to accommodate themselves, as far as possible, to the local calendars, and commencing in each case with the Hijra year of his accession to the throne (A.H. 963 = A.D. 1555-56), though the month of commencement varies.

The Faṣlī year of the Deccan again was introduced by Shāh Jehān when settling the revenue system of the Mahratta country in 1636; and as it starts with the Hijra date of that year, it is, in numeration, two years in advance of the others.

Two of these faṣlī years are still in use, as regards revenue matters, viz., the Faṣlī of Upper India, under which the Faṣlī year 1286 began 2nd April, 1878; and that of Madras, under which Faṣlī year 1286 began 1st July, 1877.

G.

Galee, s. H. galī, abuse; bad language.

Galleece, s. Domestic Hindustani gālīs for a pair of braces, from the old fashioned gallows, now obsolete except in Scotland, where the form is "gal-lowses."

Galle, Point de, n.p. A rocky cape, covering a small harbour and a town with old fortifications, in the S.W. of Ceylon, familiar to all Anglo-Indians for many years as a coaling-place of mail-steamers. The Portuguese gave the town for crest a cock (Gallo), a legitimate pun. The serious derivations of the name are various. Pridham says it is Galla, 'a Rock,' which is probable. But Chitty says it means 'a Pound,' and was so called according to the Malabars (i.e. Tamil people) from ". . . this part of the country having been anciently set aside by Ravana for the breeding of his cattle" (Ceylon Gazetteer, 1832, p. 92). Tennent again says it was called after a tribe, the Gallas, inhabiting the neighbouring district (see ii. 105, etc.). The writer just quoted has been entirely misled by Reinaud in supposing that Galle could be the Kala of the old Arab voyages to China; a port which certainly lay in the Malay seas; see under Calay.

1518. "He tried to make the port of Columbo, before which he arrived in 3 days, but he could not make it because the wind was contrary, so he tacked about for 4 days till he made the port of Galle, which is in the south part of the island, and entered it with his whole squadron; and then our people went ashore killing cows and plundering whatever they could find."—Correia, ii. 540.

1553. "In which Island they (the Chinese), as the natives say, left a language which they call Chingalla, and the people themselves Chingallas, particularly those who dwell from Ponta de Galle onwards, facing the south and east. For adjoining that point they founded a City called Tanabaré (see Dondera), of which a large part still stands: and from being hard by that Cape of Galle, the rest of the people, who dwelt from the middle of the Island upwards, called the inhabitants of this part Chingalla, and their language the same, as if they would say language or people of the Chins of Galle."—Barros, III. ii. cap. 1.

(This is, of course, all fanciful.)

c. 1568. "Il piottas'ingannò per ciòchè il Capo di Galli dell' Isola di Seilan butta assai in mare."—Cesare de' Federici, in Ram. iii. 396v.

1661. "Die Stadt Punto-Gale ist im Jahr 1640 vermittelst Gottes gnadigen Seegen durch die Tapferkeit des Commandanten Jacob Koster den Niederlanden zu teil geworden."—W. Schulze, 190.

1691. "We passed by Cape Comoryn, and came to Puntogale."—Valentijn, ii. 540.

Gallevat, s. The name applied to a kind of galley, or war-boat with oars, of small draught of water, which continued to be employed on the west coast of India down to the latter half of last century. The work quoted below under 1717 explains the galley-watts to be "large boats like Gravesend Tilt-boats; they carry about 6 Carvel-Guns and 60 men at small arms, and Oars; They sail with a Peak Sail like the Mizen of a Man-of-War, and row with 30 or 40 Oars. . . . They are principally used for landing Troops for a Descent. . . ." (p. 22). The word is highly interesting from its genealogical tree; it is a descendant of the great historical and numerous family of the Galley,* and it is almost certainly the immediate parent of the hardly less historical Jolly-boat which plays so important a part in British naval annals. If this be true, which we can hardly doubt, we shall have three of the boats of the British man-of-war owing their names (quod minime reris!) to Indian originals, viz., the Cutter, the Dingy, and the Jolly-boat to catur, dinghi, and gallevat. This last derivation we take from Mr. Campbell's Bombay Gazetteer (xiii. p. 417), a work that one can hardly mention without admiration. This writer, who states that a form of the same word, galbat, is now generally used by the natives in Bombay waters for large foreign vessels, such as English ships and steamers, is inclined to refer it to jalba, a word for a small boat used on the shores of the Red Sea (see Dozy and Eng., p. 276), which appears below in a quotation from Ibn Batuta, and which vessels were called by the early Portuguese geluas. Whether this word is the parent of galley and its derivatives as Mr. Campbell thinks, must be very doubtful, for galley is much older in European use than he seems to think, as the quotation from Asser shows. The word also occurs in Byzantine writers of the 9th century, such as the Continuator of Theophanes quoted below, and the Emperor Leo. We shall find below the occurrence of galley as an oriental word in the form jalia, which looks like an arabized adoption from a Mediterranean tongue. The Turkish, too, still has kalyūn for a ship of the line, which is certainly an adoption from galeone. The origin of galley is a very obscure question. Among other suggestions mentioned by Diez (Etym. Wörterb. 2nd ed., i. 198–199), is one from γαλεός, a shark, or from γαλεῶτης, a sword-fish—the latter very suggestive of a galley with its aggressive beak; another is from γαλῆν, a word in Hesychius, which is the apparent origin of 'gallery.'†

The word gallevat seems to come

Galley, galiot, galleon, galeass, galeida, galeoncino, etc.

† It is possible that galeota, galiente, may have been taken directly from the shark or the sword-fish, though in imitation of the galea already in use. For we shall see below that galiot was used for a pirate.

directly from the galeota of the Portuguese and other S. European nations, a kind of inferior galley with only one bank of oars, which appears under the form galion in Joinville, infra (not to be confounded with the galleons of a later period, which were larger vessels), and often in the 13th and 14th centuries as galeota, galiotes, &c. It is constantly mentioned as forming part of the Portuguese fleets in India. Bluteau defines galeota as "a small galley with one mast, and with 15 or 20 benches a side, and one oar to each bench."

a. Galley.

c. 865. "And then the incursion of the Russians (ῥῶν Ῥῶς) afflicted the Roman territory (these are a Scythian nation of rude and savage character), devastating Pontus . . . and investing the City itself when Michael was away engaged in war with the Ishmaelites . . . So this incursion of these people afflicted the empire on the one hand, and on the other the advance of the fleet on Crete, which with some 20 cymbaria, and 7 galleys (γαλέας), and taking with it cargo-vessels also, went about, descending sometimes on the Cyclades Islands, and sometimes on the whole coast (of the main) right up to Proconessus."—Theophrastus Continuatio, Lib. iv. 33-34.

A.D. 877. "Crescebat insuper diebus singulis perversorum numerus; adeo quidem, ut si triginta ex eis millia una die necarentur, alii succedebant numero duplicato. Tunc rex Aelfredus jussit cymbas et galeas, id est longas naves, fabricari per regnum, ut navali proelio hostibus adventantibus obviaret."—Asser, Annales Rer. Gest. Aelfredi Magni, ed. West, 1722, p. 23.

c. 1232. "En cele navie de Genevois avoit soissante et dis galeis, mout bien armées; cheuestaine en estoient dui grant home de Gene . . ."—Guillaume de Tyr, Texte Français, ed. Paulin Paris, i. 393.

1243. Under this year Matthew Paris puts into the mouth of the Archbishop of York a punning couplet which shows the difference of accent with which galea in its two senses was pronounced:

"In terris galeas, in aquis formido galeias:
Inter eas et eas consulo cautus eas."

1249. "Lors s'esmut notre galie, et alames bien une grant lieue avant que li uns ne parlast à l'autre. . . . Lors vint messires Phelippes de Monfort en un galion,* et escria au roy: 'Sires, sires, parlés à vostre frere le conte de Poitiers, qui est en cel autre vessel.' Lors escria li roys: 'Alume, alume!'"—Joinville, ed. De Wailly, i. 212.

1517. "At the Archinalte (at Venice) we saw in makynge iiiixx (i.e. 80) new galyes and galye Bastards, and galye Sotylytes, besyd they that be in viage in the haven."—Torkington's Pilgrimage, p. 8.

1542. "They said that the Turk had sent orders to certain lords at Alexandria to make him up galleys (galés) in wrought timber, to be sent on camels to Suez; and this they did with great diligence . . . inasmuch that every day a galley was put together at Suez . . . where they were making up 50 galleys, and 12 galeons, and also small rowing-vessels, such as catur, much swifter than ours."—Correa, iv. 237.

b. Jalia.

1612. ". . . and coming to Malaca and consulting with the General they made the best arrangements that they could for the enterprise, adding a flotilla . . . sufficient for any need, for it consisted of seven galeots, a calamute (?), a sanguel, five bantuns,* and one jalia."—Bocarro, 101.

1615. "You must know that in 1605 there had come from the Reino (i.e. Portugal) one Sebastian Gonçalves Tibau . . . of humble parentage, who betook himself to Bengal and commenced life as a soldier; and afterwards became a factor in cargoes of salt (which forms the chief traffic in those parts), and acquiring some capital in this business, with that he bought a jalia, a kind of vessel that is there used for fighting and trading at once."—Id. 431.

1634. "Many others (of the Firings) who were on board the ghrābs, set fire to their vessels, and turned their faces towards hell. Out of the 64 large dingas, 57 ghrābs, and 200 jaliyas, one ghrāb and two jaliyas escaped."—Capture of Hoogly in 1634, Badshāh Nāma in Elliot, vii. 34.

c. Jalba, Jeloa, etc.

c. 1330. "We embarked at this town (Jedda) on a vessel called jalba which belonged to Rashid-eddin al-alfi al-Yamani, a native of Habsh."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 158.

The Translators comment: "A large boat or gondola made of planks stitched together with coco-nut fibre."

1518. "And Meroceem, Captain of the fleet of the Grand Sultan, who was in Cambaya . . . no sooner learned that Goa was taken . . . than he gave up all hopes of bringing his mission to a fortunate termination, and obtained permission from the King of Cambaya to go to Judā . . . and from that port set out for Suez in a shallow (gelua).—Alboquerque, Hak. Soc. iii. 19.

1690. "In this is a Creek very convenient for building Grabbs or Geloas."—Orvington, 467.

* Galeon is here the galliot of later days. See above.

* "A kind of boat," is all that Crawford tells.—Malay Diet. s. v.

d. Galliot.

In the first quotation we have galiot in the sense of "pirate."

c. 1232. "L'en leur demanda de quel terre; il respondirent de Flandres, de Hollande et de Frise; et ce estoit voirs que il avoient esté galiot et ulague de mer, bien huit anz; or s'estoient repentit et pour penitence venoient en pelerinage en Jerusalem."—Guill. de Tyr, as above, p. 117.

1337. "... que elles doivent partir pour venir au service du roy le jér J. de may l'an 337 au plus tart e doivent couster les d. 40 galées pour quatre mois 144000 florins d'or, payez en partie par la compagnie des Barden . . . et 2000 autres florins pour viretons et 2 galientes."—Contract with Genoese for Service of Philip of Valois, quoted by Jal, ii. 337.

1518. "The Governor put on great pressure to embark the force, and started from Cochin the 20th September, 518, with 17 sail, besides the Goa foists, taking 3 galleyes (galies) and one galeota, two brigantines (bargantys), four caravels, and the rest round ships of small size."—Correa, ii. 539.

1548. "... pera a gualveta em que ha d'andar o alcaide do maar."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 239.

1552. "As soon as this news reached the Sublime Porte the Sandjak of Katif was ordered to send Murad-Beg to take command of the fleet, enjoining him to leave in the port of Bassora one or two ships, five galleyes, and a galiot."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 48.

"They (the Portuguese) had 4 ships as big as carracks, 3 ghurabs or great (rowing) vessels, 6 Portuguese caravels, and 12 smaller ghurabs, i.e. galiotics with oars."—Ib. 67-68.

Unfortunately the translator does not give the original Turkish word for galiot.

c. 1610. "Es grandes Galeres il y peut deux et trois cens hommes de guerre, et en d'autres grandes Galiotes, qu'ils nomment Freyates, il y en peut cent . . ."—Pyrard, ii. 72.

1689. "He embarked about the middle of October in the year 1542, in a galiot, which carried the new Captain of Comorin."—Dryden, Life of Xavier. (In Works, ed. 1821, xvi. 87.)

e. Gallevat.

1613. "Assoone as I anchored I sent Master Molineux in his Pinnasse, and Master Spooner, and Samuell Squire in my Gellywatte to sound the depths within the sands."—Capt. N. Downton in Purchas, i. 501.

This illustrates the origin of Jolly-boat.

1717. "Besides the Salamander Fire-ship, Terrible Bomb, six Galleywatts of 8 guns, and 60 men each, and 4 of 6 guns and 50 men each."—Authentic and Faithful History of that Arch-Pyrate Tulajee Angrua (1756), p. 47.

c. 1760. "Of these armed boats called Gallevats, the Company maintains also a competent number, for the service of their marine."—Grose, ii. 62.

1763. "The Gallevats are larger row-boats, built like the grab, but of smaller dimensions, the largest rarely exceeding 70 tons; they have two masts . . . they have 40 or 50 stout oars, and may be rowed four miles an hour."—Orme, i. 409.

Gambier, s. The extract of a climbing shrub (Uncaria Gambier, Roxb., <sup>2</sup> Naucllea Gambier, Hunter; N.O. Rubiaceae) which is a native of the regions about the Straits of Malacca, and is much grown in plantations in Singapore and the neighbouring islands. The substance, in chemical composition and qualities strongly resembles Cutch (q.v.), and the names Catechu and Terra Japonica are applied to both. The plant is mentioned in Debray, 1601 (iii. 99), and by Rumphius, c. 1690 (v. 63), who describes its use in mastication with betel-nut; but there is no account of the catechu made from it, known to the authors of the Pharmacographia, before 1780. Crawford gives the name as Jayanese, but Hanbury and Flückiger point out the resemblance to the Tamil name for catechu, Katta Kambu (Pharmacographia, 298 seq.).

Ganda, s. This is the Hind. name for a rhinoceros, gairda and genda, for Skt. ganḍa (giving also ganḍaka and ganḍāṅga). The note on the passage in Barbosa by his Hak. Soc. editor is a marvel in the way of error.

1516. "This King (of Guzerat) sent a Ganda to the King of Portugal, because they told him that he would be pleased to see her."—Barbosa, 58.

1553. "And in return for many rich presents which this Diogo Fernandez carried to the King, and besides others which the King sent to Afonso Albuquerque, there was an animal, the biggest which Nature has created after the elephant, and the great enemy of the latter . . . which the natives of the land of Cambaya, whence this one came, call Ganda, and the Greeks and Latins Rhinoceros. And Afonso d'Albuquerque sent this to the King Don Manuel, and it came to this Kingdom, and it was afterwards lost on board ship on its way to Rome, when the King sent it as a present to the Pope."—Barros, Dec. II. liv. x. cap. 1.

Ganton, s. This is mentioned by some old voyagers as a weight or measure by which pepper was sold in the Malay Archipelago. It is presumably gantang, defined by Crawford as "a dry measure, equal to about a gallon."

1554. "Also a candy of Goa, answers to 140 gantas, equivalent to 15 paraas, 30 medidas at 42 medidas to the paraa."—A. Nunes, 39.

1615. "I sent to borrow 4 or 5 gantas of oyle of Yasemon Dono. . . . But he returned answer he had non, when I know, to the contrary, he bought a parcell out of my handes the other day."—Cocks, i. 6.

Ganza, s. The name given by old travellers to the metal which in former days constituted the inferior currency in Pegu. According to some it was lead; others call it a mixt metal. Lead in rude lumps is still used in the bazars of Burna for small purchases (see Mission to Ava, 259).

The word is evidently Skt. kaṣa, 'bell-metal,' whence Malay gangsa, (the same), which last is probably the word which travellers picked up.

1554. "In this Kingdom of Pegu there is no coined money, and what they use commonly consists of dishes, pans, and other utensils of service, made of a metal like frosylegra (?), broken in pieces; and this is called gamça . . ."—A. Nunes, 38.

" . . . vn altra statua cosi fatta di Ganza; che è vn metallo di che fanno le lor monete, fatte di rame e di piombo mescolati insieme."—Cesare Federici, Ram. iii. 394v.

c. 1567. "The current money that is in this Citie, and throughout all this kingdom, is called Gansa or Ganza, which is made of copper and lead. It is not the money of the king, but every man may stampe it that will . . ."—Caesar Frederick, E.T., in Purchas, iii. 1717-18.

1726. "Rough Peguan Gans (a brass mixt with lead) . . ."—Valentijn, Chor. 34.

1727. "Plenty of Gansa or Lead, which passeth all over the Pegu Dominions, for Money."—A. Ham, ii. 41.

Garce, s. A cubic measure for rice, &c., in use on the Madras coast, as usual varying much in value. Buchanan (infra) treats it as a weight. The word is Telugu, gārisa.

1752. "Grain Measures.

1 Measure weighs about 26 lb. 1 oz. avd.

8 Do. is 1 Mercal 21 " "

3200 Do. is 400 do., or

1 Garce 8400
Brooks, Weights and Measures, &c., p. 6.

1759. " . . . a garce of rice . . ."—In Datrymple, Or. Report. i. 120.

1784. "The day that advice was received . . . (of peace with Tippoo) at Madras, the price of rice fell there from 115 to 80 pagodas the garce."—In Seton-Karr, i. 13.

1807. "The proper native weights used in the Company's Jaghire are as follows: 10 Vara hun (Pagodas)=1 Polam, 40 Polams=1 Visay, 8 Visay (Vees)=1 Manungu, 20 Manungus (Maunds)=1 Baruays, 20 Baruays (Candies)=1 Gursay, called by the English Garce. The Varahun or Star Pagoda weighs 52½ grains, therefore the Visay is nearly three pounds avoirdupois (see Viss); and the Garce is nearly 1265 lbs."—F. Buchanan, Mysore, &c., i. 6.

By the calculation, the Garce should be 9600 lbs. instead of 1265 as printed.

Gardee, s. A name sometimes given, in last century, to native soldiers disciplined in European fashion, i.e. sepoys (q.v.). The "Indian Vocabulary" (1788) gives: "GARDEE—a tribe inhabiting the provinces of Bijapore, &c., esteemed good foot soldiers." The word may be only a corruption of 'guard,' but probably the origin assigned in the second quotation may be well founded; "Guard" may have shaped the corruption of Gharbi. The old Bengal sepoys were commonly known in the N.W. as Purbias or Easterns.

1762. "A coffre who commanded the Telingas and Gardees . . . asked the horseman whom the horse belonged to?"—Native Letter in Van Sittart, i. 141.

1786. " . . . originally they (Sipahis) were commanded by Arabians, or those of their descendants born in the Canara and Concan or Western parts of India, where those foreigners style themselves Gharbies or Western. Moreover these corps were composed mostly of Arabs, Negroes, and Habissinians, all which bear upon that coast the same name of Gharbi . . . In time the word Gharbi was corrupted by both the French and Indians into that of Gardi, which is now the general name of Sipahies all over India save Bengal . . . where they are stiled Talingas."—Note by Transl. of Sair Mutagherin, ii. 93.

Gardens, and Garden-house, s. In the last century suburban villas at Madras and Calcutta were so called. 'Garden Reach' below Fort William took its name from these.

1683. "Early in the morning I was met by Mr. Littleton and most of the Factory, near Hugly, and about 9 or 10 o'clock by Mr. Vincent near the Dutch Garden, who came attended by several Boats and Budge-rows guarded by 35 Firelocks, and about 50 Rashpoots and Peons well armed."—Hedges, Journal, July 24.

1685. "The whole Council . . . came to attend the President at the garden-house."—In Wheeler, i. 139.

1758. "The guard of the redoubt re-treated before them to the garden-house."—Orme, ii. 303.

"Mahomed Isoof . . . rode with a party of horse as far as Maskelyne's garden."—Id. iii. 425.

1772. "The place of my residence at present is a garden-house of the Nabob, about 4 miles distant from Moorshedabad."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 34.

1782. "A body of Hyder's horse were at St. Thomas's Mount on the 29th ult. and Gen. Munro and Mr. Brodie with great difficulty escaped from the General's Gardens. They were pursued by Hyder's horse within a mile of the Black Town."—India Gazette, May 11.

1809. "The gentlemen of the settlement live entirely in their garden-houses, as they very properly call them."—Ld. Valentia, i. 389.

1810. ". . . Rural retreats called Garden-houses."—Williamson, V. M. i. 137.

1873. "To let, or for sale, Serle's Gardens at Adyar.—For particulars apply, &c."—Madras Mail, July 3.

Garry, Gharry, s. Hind. gāri, a cart or carriage. The word is used by Anglo-Indians, at least on the Bengal side, in both senses. Frequently the species is discriminated by a distinctive prefix, as palkee-garry (palankin carriage), sej-garry (chaise) rel-garry (railway carriage), &c.

1810. "The common g'horry . . . is rarely, if ever, kept by any European, but may be seen plying for hire in various parts of Calcutta."—Williamson, V. M. i. 329.

1811. The Gary is represented in Solvyns's engravings as a two-wheeled rath (i.e. the primitive native carriage, built like a light hackery) with two ponies.

1866. "My husband was to have met us with the two-horse gharee."—Trevelyan, Dawk Bungalow, 384.

Gaum and Gong, s. A village, Hind. gāon, from Sansk. grāma.

1519. "In every one of the said villages, which they call guācos."—Goa Proclam. in Arch. Port. Orient., Fascic. 5, 38.

Gāonuār occurs in the same vol. (p. 75), under the forms gancare and guancare, for the village heads in Port. India.

Gautama, n.p. The surname, according to Buddhist legend, of the Sakya tribe from which the Buddha Sakya Muni sprang. It is a derivative from Gotama, a name of "one of the ancient Vedic bard-families" (Ol- denberg). It is one of the most common names for Buddha among the Indo-Chinese nations. The Sommona-codom of many old narratives regarding those countries represents the Pali form of S'rāmaṇa Gautama, "The Ascetic Gautama."

c. 1590. See under Godavery passage from Ain, where Kotam occurs.

1686. "J'ai cru devoir expliquer toutes ces choses avant que de parler de Sommonokhodom (c'est ainsi que les Siamois appellent le Dieu qu'ils adorent à present)."—Voy. de Siam, Des Pères Jesuites, Paris, 1686, p. 397.

1687-88. "Now tho' they say that several have attained to this Felicity (Nireupan, i.e. Nirvana) . . . yet they honour only one alone, whom they esteem to have surpassed all the rest in Vertue. They call him Sommona-Codom; and they say that Codom was his Name, and that Sommona signifies in the Balie Tongue a Talapoin of the Woods."—Hist. Rel. of Siam, by De La Loubere, E. T., i. 130.

1782. "Les Pegouins et les Bahmans . . . Quant à leurs Dieux, ils en comptent sept principaux . . . Cependant ils n'en adorent qu'un seul, qu'ils appellent Godeman . . ."—Sonnerat, ii. 299.

1800. "Gotma, or Goutum, according to the Hindoos of India, or Gaudma among the inhabitants of the more eastern parts, is said to have been a philosopher . . . he taught in the Indian schools, the heterodox religion and philosophy of Boodh. The image that represents Boodh is called Gautama, or Goutum . . ."—Symes, Embassy, 299.

1823. "The titles or synonymes of Buddha, as they were given to me, are as follow: "Kotamo (Gautama) . . . Somana-kotamo, agreeably to the interpretation given to me, means in the Pali language, the priest Gautama."—Crawford, Emb. to Siam, p. 367.

Gavee, s. Topsail. Nautical jargon from Port. gavea, the top (Roebuck).

Gecko, s. A kind of house lizard. The word is not now in Anglo-Indian use; it is a naturalist's word; and also is French. It was no doubt originally an onomatopoeia from the creature's reiterated utterance. Marcel Devic says the word is adopted from Malay gekoh. This we do not find in Crawford, who has tūkē, tūkēk, and gokē, all evidently attempts to represent the utterance. In Burma the same, or a kindred lizard, is called toktē, in like imitation.

1631. Bontius seems to identify this lizard with the Guana (q.v.), and says its bite is so venomous as to be fatal unless the part be immediately cut out, or cauterized. This is no doubt a fable. "Nostri ipsi animal apposito vocabulo gecco vocant; quippe non secus ac Coccyx apud nos suum cantum iterat, etiam gecko assiduo sonat, prius edito capidore qualem Picus emittit."—Lib. V. cap. 5, p. 57.

1711. "Chaccos, as Cuckoos receive their Names from the Noise they make. . . . They are much like Lizards but larger. 'Tis said their Dung is so venomous," &c. —Lockyer, 84.

1727. "They have one dangerous little Animal called a Jackoa, in shape almost like a Lizard. It is very malicious . . . and wherever the Liquor lights on an Animal Body, it presently cankers the Flesh."—A. Ham, ii. 131.

This is still a common belief. See in Suppt. Biscobra.

1883. "This was one of those little house lizards called geckos, which have pellets at the ends of their toes. They are not repulsive brutes like the garden lizard, and I am always on good terms with them. They have full liberty to make use of my house, for which they seem grateful, and say chuck, chuck, chuck."—Tribes on My Frontier, 38.

Gentoo, s. and adj. This word is a corruption of the Portuguese Gentio, 'a gentile' or heathen, which they applied to the Hindoos in contradistinction from the Moros or 'Moors,' i.e. Mahommedans. Both terms are now obsolete among English people, except perhaps that Gentoo still lingers at Madras in the sense b.

For the terms Gentio and Gentoo were applied in two senses:

a. To the Hindus generally,

b. To the Telugu-speaking Hindus of the Peninsula specially, and to their language.

The reason why the term became thus specifically applied to the Telugu people is probably because, when the Portuguese arrived, the Telugu monarchy of Vijayanagara (Bijanagar, Bisnagar or Narsinga, qq.v.) was dominant over great part of the Peninsula. The officials were chiefly of Telugu race, and thus the people of this race, as the most important section of Hindus, were par excellence the Gentiles, and their language the Gentile language. Besides those two specific senses Gentio was sometimes used for heathen in general. Thus in F. M. Pinto:

"A very famous Corsair who was called Himimilau, a Chinese by nation, and who from a Gentio as he was, had a little time since turned Moor . . ."—Ch. L.

1548. The Religiosos of this territory spend so largely, and give such great alms at the cost of your Highness's administration that it disposes of a good part of the funds . . . I believe indeed they do all this in real zeal and sincerity . . . but I think it might be reduced a half, and all for the better; for there are some of them who often try to make Christians by force, and worry the Gentios (gentios) to such a degree that it drives the population away."—Simao Botelho, Cartas, 35.

1563. " . . . Among the Gentiles (Gentios) Rão is as much as to say 'King.'"—Garcia, f. 35 b.

"This ambergris is not so highly valued among the Moors, but it is very highly prized among the Gentiles."—Id., f. 14.

1582. "A gentile . . . whose name was Canaca."—Castañeda, trans. by N. L., f. 31.

1588. In a letter of this year to the Viceroy, the King (Philip II.) says he "understands the Gentios are much the best persons to whom to farm the alfandegas (customs, &c.), paying well and regularly, and it does not seem contrary to canon-law to farm to them, but on this he will consult the learned."—In Arch. Port. Orient., fasc. 3, 135.

c. 1610. "Ils (les Portugais) exercent ordinairement de semblables cruautés lors qu'ils sortent en troupe le long des costes, bruslans et saccageans ces pauvres Gentils qui ne desirent que leur bonne grace, et leur amitié, mais ils n'en ont pas plus de pitié pour cela."—Mocquet, 349.

1630. " . . . which Gentiles are of two sorts . . . first the purer Gentiles . . . or else the impure or vile neane Gentiles . . . such are the husbandmen or inferior sort of people, called the Coulees."—H. Lord, Display, &c., 85.

1683. "This morning a Gentoo sent by Bulchund, Governour of Hugly and Cassumbazar, made complaint to me that Mr. Charnock did shamefully—to y<sup>e</sup> great scandall of our Nation—keep a Gentoo woman of his kindred, which he has had these 19 years."—Hedges, Dec. 1.

"The ceremony used by these Gentu's in their sicknesses is very strange; they bring y<sup>e</sup> sick person . . . to y<sup>e</sup> brink of y<sup>e</sup> River Ganges, on a Cott . . ."—Hedges, May 10.

In Stevens's Trans. of Faria y Sousa (1695) the Hindus are still called Gentiles. And it would seem that the English form Gentoo did not come into general use till late in the 17th century.

1767. "In order to transact Business of any kind in this Country you must at least have a Smattering of the Language . . . Ghaut, s. Hind. ghāt.

b. A path of descent from a mountain; a mountain pass; and hence c, n.p. The mountain ranges parallel to the western and eastern coasts of the Peninsula, through which the ghāts or passes lead from the table-lands above, down to the coast and lowlands. It is probable that foreigners hearing those tracts spoken of respectively as the country above and the country below the Ghāts (see Balaghaut) were led to regard the word Ghāts as a proper name of the mountain range itself, or (like De Barros below) as a word signifying range. And this is in analogy with many other cases of mountain nomenclature, where the name of a pass has been transferred to the mountain chain, or where the word for 'a pass' has been mistaken for a word for 'mountain range.' The proper sense of the word is well illustrated from Sir A. Wellesley, under b.

This passage illustrates how the transition from b to c occurred. The Ghâts here meant are not a range of mountains so called, but, as the context shows, the passes among the Vindhya and Sâtpûra hills.

Compare the two following, in which 'down the ghauts' and 'down the passes' mean exactly the same thing, though to many people the former expression will suggest 'down through a range of mountains called the Ghauts.'

Ghilzai, n.p. One of the most famous of the tribes of Afghanistan, and probably the strongest, occupying the high plateau north of Kandahar, and extending (roundly speaking) eastward to the Sulimāni mountains, and north to the Kabul River. They were supreme in Afghanistan at the beginning of last century, and for a time possessed the throne of Ispahan. The following paragraph occurs in the article AFGHANISTAN, in the 9th ed. of the Encyc. Britan., 1874 (i. 235), written by one of the authors of this book:

"It is remarkable that the old Arab geographers of the 10th and 11th centuries place in the Ghilzai country" (i.e. the country now occupied by the Ghilzais, or nearly so) "a people called Khilijis, whom they call a tribe of Turks, to which belonged a famous family of Delhi Kings. The probability of the identity of the Khilijis and Ghilzais is obvious, and the question touches others regarding the origin of the Afghans; but it does not seem to have been gone into."

Nor has the writer since ever been able to go into it. But whilst he has never regarded the suggestion as more than a probable one, he has seen no reason to reject it. He may add that on starting the idea to Sir Henry Rawlinson (to whom it seemed new), a high authority on such a question, though he would not accept it, he made a candid remark to the effect that the Ghilzais had undoubtedly a very Turk-like aspect.

A belief in this identity was, as we have recently noticed, entertained by the traveller Charles Masson, as is shown in a passage extracted below. And it has also been maintained by Surgeon-Major Bellew, in his Races of Afghanistan (1880).

All the accounts of the Ghilzais indicate great differences between them and the other tribes of Afghanistan; whilst there seems nothing impossible, or even unlikely, in the partial assimilation of a Turki tribe in the course of centuries to the Afghans who surround them, and the consequent assumption of a quasi-Afghan genealogy. We do not find that Mr. Elphinstone makes any explicit reference to the question now before us. But two of the notes to his History (5th ed., p. 322 and 384) seem to indicate that it was in his mind. In the latter of these he says: "The Khiljis . . . though Turks by descent . . . had been so long settled among the Afghans that they had almost become identified with that people; but they probably mixed more with others, or at least with their Turki brethren, and would be more civilized than the generality of Afghan mountaineers." The learned and eminently judicious William Erskine was also inclined to accept the identity of the two tribes, doubting (but perhaps needlessly,) whether the Khilji had been really of Turki race. We have not been able to meet with any translated author who mentions both Khiliji and Ghilzai. In the following quotations all the earlier refer to Khiliji, and the later to Ghilzai. Attention may be called to the expressions in the quotation from Ziauddin Barni, as indicating some great difference between the Turk proper and the Khiliji even then. The language of Baber again, so far as it goes, seems to indicate that by his time the Ghilzais were regarded as an Afghan clan.

c. 940. "Hajjaj had delegated 'Abdarrahman ibn Mahommed ibn al-Ash'ath to Sijistan, Bost, and Rukhāj (Arachosia) to make war on the Turk tribes diffused in those regions, and who are known as Ghūz and Khulj. . ."—Mas'ūdī, v. 302.

c. 950. "The Khalaj is a Turki tribe, which in ancient times migrated into the country that lies between India and the parts of Sijistan beyond the Ghūr. They are a pastoral people and resemble the Turks in their natural characteristics, their dress and their language."—Istakhri, from De Goeje's Text, p. 245.

c. 1030. "The Afghāns and Khiljis having submitted to him (Sabaktigin), he admitted thousands of them . . . into the ranks of his armies."—Al-'Uthbi, in Elliot, ii. 24.

c. 1150. "The Khilks (read Khilij) are people of Turk race, who, from an early date invaded this country (Dāwar—on the banks of the Helmand), and whose dwellings are spread abroad to the north of India and on the borders of Ghaur and of Western Sijistan. They possess cattle, wealth, and the various products of husbandry; they all have the aspect of Turks, whether as regards features, dress, and customs, or as regards their arms and manner of making war. They are pacific people, doing and thinking no evil.”—Edrisi, i. 457.

1289. “At the same time Jalālu-d dīn (Khilji), who was ‘Ariz-i mamalik (Muster-master-general), had gone to Bahārpūr, attended by a body of his relations and friends. Here he held a muster and inspection of the forces. He came of a race different from that of the Turks, so he had no confidence in them, nor would the Turks own him as belonging to the number of their friends. . . . The people high and low . . . were all troubled by the ambition of the Khiljis, and were strongly opposed to Jalālu-d dīn’s obtaining the crown . . . . Sultān Jalālu-d dīn Firōz Khilji ascended the throne in the . . . year 688 H. . . . The people of the city (of Delhi) had for 80 years been governed by sovereigns of Turk extraction, and were averse to the succession of the Khiljis . . . they were struck with admiration and amazement at seeing the Khiljis occupying the throne of the Turks, and wondered how the throne had passed from the one to the other.” . . . —Ziūn-d-din Burni, in Elliot, iii. 134-136.

14th cent. The continuator of Rashiduddīn enumerates among the tribes occupying the country which we now call Afghanistan, Ghūris, Heratis, Nigudarīs, Sejis, Khilji, Baluch and Afghāns. See Notices et Extraits, xiv. 494.

c. 1507. “I set out from Kābul for the purpose of plundering and beating up the quarters of the Ghiljis . . . a good farsang from the Ghilji camp, we observed a blackness, which was either owing to the Ghiljis being in motion, or to smoke. The young and inexperienced men of the army all set forward full speed; I followed them for two kos, shooting arrows at their horses, and at length checked their speed. When five or six thousand men set out on a pillaging party, it is extremely difficult to maintain discipline. . . . A minaret of skulls was erected of the heads of these Afghans.”—Baber, pp. 220, 221; see also p. 225.

1842. “The Ghilji tribes occupy the principal portion of the country between Kāndahār and Ghazni. They are, moreover, the most numerous of the Afghān tribes, and if united under a capable chief might . . . become the most powerful . . . They are brave and warlike, but have a sternness of disposition amounting to ferocity. . . . Some of the inferior Ghiljis are so violent in their intercourse with strangers that they can scarcely be considered in the light of human beings, while no language can describe the terrors of a transit through their country, or the indignities which have to be endured . . . .

“The Ghiljis, although considered, and calling themselves, Afghāns, and moreover employing the Pashto, or Afghān dialect, are undoubtedly a mixed race.

“The name is evidently a modification or corruption of Khalji or Khilaji, that of a great Turkī tribe mentioned by Sherifudīn in his history of Taimūr. . . .”—Ch. Masson, Narr. of various Journeys, &c. ii. 204, 206, 207.

1854. “The Ghūri was succeeded by the Khilji dynasty; also said to be of Turkī extraction, but which seems rather to have been of Afghān race; and it may be doubted if they are not of the Ghilji Afghāns.”—Erskine, Bāber and Humāyūn, i. 404.

1880. “As a race the Ghilji mix little with their neighbours, and indeed differ in many respects, both as to internal government and domestic customs, from the other races of Afghanistan . . . the great majority of the tribe are pastoral in their habits of life, and migrate with the seasons from the lowlands to the highlands with their families and flocks, and easily portable black hair tents. They never settle in the cities, nor do they engage in the ordinary handicraft trades, but they manufacture carpets, felts, &c., for domestic use, from the wool and hair of their cattle. . . . Physically they are a remarkably fine race . . . but they are a very barbarous people, the pastoral class especially, and in their wars excessively savage and vindictive.

“Several of the Ghilji or Ghilzai-clans are almost wholly engaged in the carrying trade between India and Afghanistan, and the northern States of Central Asia, and have been so for many centuries.”—Races of Afghanistan, by Beller, p. 103.

Ghurry, Gurree, s. Hind. gharī. A clepsydra or water-instrument for measuring time, consisting of a floating cup with a small hole in it, adjusted so that it fills and sinks in a fixed time; also the gong on which the time so indicated is struck. This latter is properly ghariyāl. Hence also a clock or watch; also the 60th part of a day and night, equal therefore to 24 minutes, was in old Hindu custom the space of time indicated by the clepsydra just mentioned, and was called a gharī. But in Anglo-Indian usage, the word is employed for 'an hour.'

Gindy, s. The original of this word belongs to the Dravidian tongues; Malayālim, kindi; Telugu, gindi, Tamil, kinṇi, from v. kinu, 'to be hollow;' and the original meaning is a basin or pot, as opposed to a flat dish. In Malabar the word is applied to a vessel resembling a coffee-pot without a handle, used to drink from. But in the Bombay dialect of Hind. and in Anglo-Indian usage gindi means a wash-hand basin of tinned copper, such as is in common use there (see under Chillumchee).

Report on Supply of Drugs to India*, by Dr. Paul, India Office, March, 1876.

Ginger, s. The root of Zingiber officinale, Roxb. We get this word from the Arabic zānjabīl, Sp. agengibre (al- zānjabīl), Port. gingibre, Latin zingiber Ital. zenzero, gengiovo, and many other old forms.

The Sanskrit name is śrīṅgavera, professedly connected with śrīṅga, 'a horn,' from the antler-like form of the root. But this is probably an introduced word shaped by this imaginary etymology. Though ginger is cultivated all over India, from the Himalaya to the extreme south,* the best is grown in Malabar, and in the language of that province (Malayālam) green ginger is called inchi and inchi-ver, from inchi, 'root.' Inchi was probably in an earlier form of the language siñchi or chīñchi, as we find it in Canarese still sānti, which is perhaps the true origin of the Hind. sonth for 'dry ginger.'

It would appear that the Arabs, misled by the form of the name, attributed zanjabīl or zinjabīl, or ginger, to the coast of Zinj or Zanzibar; for it would seem to be ginger which some Arabic writers speak of as 'the plant of Zinj.' Thus a poet quoted by Kazwīnī enumerates among the products of India the shajr al-Zānj or Arbor Zingitana, along with shisham-wood, pepper, steel, &c. (see Gilde-meister, 218). And Abulfeda says also: "At Melinda is found the plant of Zinj" (Geog. by Reinaud, i. 257). In Marino Sanudo's map of the world also (c. 1320) we find a rubric connecting Zinziiber with Zinj. We do not indeed find ginger spoken of as a product of eastern continental Africa, though Barbosa says a large quantity was produced in Madagascar, and Varthema says the like of the Comoro Islands.

c. A.D. 65. "Ginger (ζινγίβερ) is a special kind of plant, produced for the most part in Troglodytic Arabia, where they use the green plant in many ways, as we do rue (ῥιγανον), boiling it and mixing it with drinks and stews. The roots are small, like those of cyperus, whitish, and peppery to the taste and smell . . ."—Dioscorides, ii. cap. 189.

c. A.D. 70. "This pepper of all kinds is most biting and sharpe . . . The blacke is more kindly and pleasant . . . Many have taken Ginger (which some call Zimbiperi and others Zingiberi) for the root of that tree; but it is not so, although in tast it somewhat resembleth pepper . . . A Gingerly, s. A coin mentioned as passing in Arabian ports by Milburn, i. 87, 91. We cannot trace its country or proper name.

Gingham, s. A kind of stuff, defined in the Draper's Dictionary as made from cotton yarn dyed before being woven. The Indian ginghams were apparently sometimes of cotton mixt with some other material. The origin of this word is obscure, and has been the subject of many suggestions. Though it has long passed into the English language, it is on the whole most probable that, like chintz and calico, the term was one originating in the Indian trade.

We find it hardly possible to accept the derivation, given by Littré, from "Guingamp, ville de Bretagne, où il y a des fabriques de tissus." This is also alleged, indeed, in the Encyc. Britannica, 8th edn., which states, under the name of Guingamp, that there are in that town manufactures of ginghams, to which the town gives its name. We may observe that the productions of Guingamp, and of the Côtes-du-Nord generally, are of linen, a manufacture dating from the 15th century. If it could be shown that gingham was either originally applied to linen fabrics, or that the word occurs before the Indian trade began, we should be more willing to admit the French etymology as possible.

The Penny Cyclopaedia suggests a derivation from gingois, 'awry,' "The variegated, striped, and crossed patterns may have suggested the name."

"Civilis," a correspondent of Notes and Queries, assigns the word to an Indian term, gingham, a stuff which he alleges to be in universal use by Hindu women, and a name which he constantly found, when in judicial employment in Upper India, to be used in inventories of stolen property and the like (N. and Q., ser. v., vol. ii. 366, and vol. iii. 30). He mentions also that in Sir G. Wilkinson's Egypt, the word is ascribed to an Egyptian origin.

The alleged Hind. word is unknown to us and to the dictionaries; if used as Civilis believes, it was almost certainly borrowed from the English term.

It is likely enough that the word came from the Archipelago. Jansz's Javanese Dict. gives "ginggang, a sort of striped or chequered East Indian lijnwand," the last word being applied to cotton as well as linen stuffs, equivalent to French toile. The verb ginggang in Javanese is given as meaning 'to separate, to go away,' but this seems to throw no light on the matter; nor can we connect the name with that of a place on the northern coast of Sumatra, a little E. of Acheen, which we have seen written Gingham (see Bennett's Wanderings, ii. 5, 6, also Elmore, Directory to India and China Seas, 1802, pp. 63-64). This place appears prominently as Gingion in a chart by W. Herbert, 1752. Finally Bluteau gives the following:

* Gebeli, Ar. "of the hills" Neli is also read d'ely, probably for d'Ely, see Dely, Mount. The Ely ginger is mentioned by Barbosa (p. 220).

† Elecampane.

"Guingam. So in some parts of the Kingdom (Portugal) they call the excrement of the Silkworm, Bombicis excrementum. Guingão. A certain stuff which is made in the territories of the Mogol. Beirumes, guingoens, Canequis, &c. (Godinho, Viagem da India, 44)." Wilson gives kindan as the Tamil equivalent of gingham, and perhaps intends to suggest that it is the original of this word. The Tamil Dict. gives "kindan, a kind of coarse cotton cloth, striped or chequered."

1796. "Guingani are cotton stuffs of Bengal and the Coromandel coast, in which the cotton is interwoven with thread made from certain barks of trees."—Fra Paolino, Viaggio, p. 35.

Ginseng, s. A medical root which has an extraordinary reputation in China as a restorative, and sells there at prices ranging from six to 400 dollars an ounce. The plant is Aralia Ginseng, Benth. (N. O. Araliaceae). The second word represents the Chinese name Jên-Shên. In the literary style the drug is called simply Shên. And possibly Jên (or 'Man') has been prefixed on account of the forked radish, man-like aspect of the root. European practitioners do not recognize its alleged virtues. That which is most valued comes from Corea, but it grows also in Mongolia and Manchuria. A kind much less esteemed, the root of Panax quinquefolium, L., is imported into China from America. A very closely-allied plant occurs in the Himalaya, A. Pseudo-Ginseng, Benth. Ginseng is first mentioned by Alv. Semedo (Madrid, 1642).

Giraffe, s. English, not Anglo-Indian. Fr. girafe, It. giraffa, Sp. and Port. girafa, old Sp. azorafa, and these from Ar. al-zarāfa, a camelopard. The Pers. surnāpā, zurnāpā seems to be a form curiously divergent, of the same word, perhaps nearer the original. The older Italians sometimes make giraffa into seraph. It is not impossible that the latter word, in its biblical use, may be radically connected with giraffe.

The oldest mention of the animal is in the Septuagint version of Deut. xiv. 5, where the word zāmār, rendered in the English Bible 'chamois,' is translated καμηλοπαρδαλις; and so also in the Vulgate camelopardalis. We quote some other ancient notices of the animal, before the introduction of the word before us:

c. B.C. 20. "The animals called camelopards (καμηλοπαρδαλις) present a mixture of both the animals comprehended in this appellation. In size they are smaller than camels, and shorter in the neck; but in the distinctive form of the head and eyes. In the curvature of the back again they have some resemblance to a camel, but in colour and hair, and in the length of tail, they are like panthers."—Diodorus, ii. 51.

c. A.D. 20. "Camelleopardis (καμηλοπαρδαλις) are bred in these parts, but they do not in any respect resemble leopards, for their variegated skin is more like the streaked and spotted skin of fallow deer. The hinder quarters are so very much lower than the fore quarters, that it seems as if the animal sat upon its rump . . . It is not, however, a wild animal, but rather like a domesticated beast; for it show no signs of a savage disposition."—Strabo, Bk. XVI. iv. § 18. E. T. by Hamilton and Falconer.

C. A.D. 210. Athenaeus, in the description which he quotes of the wonderful procession of Ptolemy Philadelphus at Alexandria, besides many other strange creatures, details 130 Ethiopic sheep, 20 of Eubœa, 12 white koloi, 26 Indian oxen, 8 Aethiopic, a huge white bear, 14 pardales and 16 panthers, 4 lynxes, 3 arkeloi, one camelopárdalis, 1 Ethiopic Rhinoceros.—Book v. cap. xxxii.

C. A.D. 220.

"Ἐννεπέ μοι κάκεινα, πολὺθροε Μούσα λιγυία, μικτὰ φύσιν θηρῶν, διχόθεν κεκρασμένα, φύλα, πόρδαλιν αἰολόωντον ὁμοῦ ξυνῆν τε κάμηλον.

Oppiani Cynegetica, iii. 461 seqq.

c. 380. "These also presented gifts, among which besides other things a certain species of animal, of nature both extraordinary and wonderful. In size it was equal to a camel, but the surface of its skin marked with flower-like spots. Its hinder parts and the flanks were low, and like those of a lion, but the shoulders and fore-legs and chest were much higher in proportion than the other limbs. The neck was slender, and in regard to the bulk of the rest of the body was like a swan's throat in its elongation. The head was in form like that of a camel, but in size more than twice that of a Libyan ostrich. . . . Its legs were not moved alternately, but by pairs, those on the right side being moved together, and those on the left together, first one side and then the other. . . . When this creature appeared the whole multitude was struck with astonishment, and its form suggesting a name, it got from the populace, from the most prominent features of its body, the improvised name of camelopardalis."—Heliodorus, Aethiopica, x. 27.

c. 940. "The most common animal in those countries is the giraffe (zarāfa). . . . some consider its origin to be a variety of the camel; others say it is owing to a union of the camel with the panther; others in short that it is a particular and distinct species, like the horse, the ass, or the ox, and not the result of any cross-breed. . . . In Persian the giraffe is called Usturyāo ('camel-cow'). It used to be sent as a present from Nubia to the Kings of Persia, as in later days it was sent to the Arab princes, to the first khālfis of the House of Abbās, and to the Walis of Misr. . . . The origin of the giraffe has given rise to numerous discussions. It has been noticed that the panther of Nubia attains a great size, whilst the camel of that country is of low stature, with short legs," &c., &c.—Mas'ūdi, iii. 3-5.

1271. "In the month of Jumada II. a female giraffe in the Castle of the Hill (at Cairo) gave birth to a young one, which was nursed by a cow."—Makrizi (by Quatremère), i. pt. 2, 106.

1298. "Mais bien ont giraffes assez qui naissent en leur pays."—Marco Polo, Panthier's ed., p. 701.

1336. "Vidi in Kadro (Cairo) animal geraffan nomine, in anteriori parte multum elevatum, longissimum collum habens, ita ut de tecto domus communis altitudinis comedere possit. Retro ita demissum est ut dorsum ejus manu hominis tangi possit. Non est ferox animal, sed ad modum jumentum pacificum, colore albo et rubeo pellem habens ordinatissime decoratam."—Gul. de Boldensele, 248-249.

1384. "Ora racconteremo della giraffa che bestia ella è. La giraffa è fatta quasi come lo struzzolo, salvo che l'imbusto suo non ha penne ("just like an ostrich, except that it has no feathers on its body")! anzi ha lana branchissima. . . . ella è veramente a vedere una cosa molto contraffatta."—Simone Sigoli, V. al Monte Sinai, 182.

1404. "When the ambassadors arrived in the city of Khoi, they found in it an ambassador, whom the Sultan of Babylon had sent to Timour Bey. . . . He had also with him 6 rare birds and a beast called jornufa. . . ." (then follows a very good description).—Clavijo, by Markham, pp. 86-87.

c. 1430. "Item, I have also been in Lesser India, which is a fine Kingdom. The capital is called Dily. In this country are many elephants, and animals called surnasa (for surnafa), which is like a stag, but is a tall animal and has a long neck, 4 fathoms in length or longer."—Schultberger, Hak. Soc. 47.

1471. "After this was brought forth a giraffa, which they call Girnaffa, a beast as long legged as a great horse, or rather more: but the hinder legges are halfe a foote shorter than the former," &c. (The Italian in Ramusio, ii. f. 102, has "vna Zirapha, la quale essi chiamano Zirapha ouer Giraffa").—Josafa Barbaro in Venetians in Persia, Hak. Soc. 54.

1554. "Il ne fut onc que les grands seigneurs quelques barbares qu'ilz aient esté, n'aïmassent qu'on leurs presentast les bestes d'estranges pais. Aussi en auons veu plusieurs au chasteau du Caire . . . entre lesquelles est celle qu'ilz nomment vulgairement Zurnapa."—P. Belon, f. 118.

It is remarkable to find Belon adopting this Persian form in Egypt.

Girja, s. This is the word for a Christian church, commonly used on the Bengal side of India, from Port. igreja, itself a corruption of ecclesia. Khāfi Khān (c. 1720) speaking of the Portuguese at Hoogly, says they called their places of worship Kaṭsā (Elliot, vii. 211). No doubt Kaṭsā, as well as igreja, is a form of ecclesia, but the superficial resemblance is small, so it may be suspected that the Musulman writer was speaking from book-knowledge only.

Goa, n.p. Properly Gowa, and (Mahr.) Goven. The famous capital of the Portuguese dominion in India since its capture by Albuquerque in 1510. In earlier Eastern history and geography the place appears under the name of Sandābūr (Sundāpūr?), q.v.

Govā or Kuva was an ancient name of the southern Konkan (see in H. H. Wilson's Works, Vishnu Purana, ii. 164, note 20). We find the place called by the Turkish Admiral Sidi 'Ali Gowai-Sandābūr, which may mean "Sandābūr of Gova."

1391. In a copper grant of this date (S. 1313) we have mention of a chief city of Kankan (see Concan) called Gowa and Gowāpūra. See the grant as published by Major Legrand Jacob in J. Bo. Br. E. As. Soc. iv. 107. The translation is too loose to make it worth while to transcribe a quotation; but it is interesting as mentioning the reconquest of Goa from Turushkas, i.e., Turks or foreign Mahomedans. We know from Ibn Batuta that Mahomedan settlers at Hunāwar had taken the place about 1344.

1510 (but referring to some years earlier). "I departed from the city of Dabuli aforesaid, and went to another island which is about a mile distant from the mainland and is called Goga. . . . In this island there is a fortress near the sea, walled round after our manner, in which there is sometimes a captain who is called Savaiu, who has 400 mamelukes, he himself being also a mameluke."—Varthema, 115-116.

c. 1520. "In the Island of Tissoury, in which is situated the city of Goa, there are 31 aldeas, and these are as follows. . . ."—In Archiv. Port. Orient., fascic. 5.

c. 1534. "At these words (addressed by the Vizir of Guzerat to a Portuguese Envoy) my wrath broke out, and I said: 'Male-diction! You have found me with my fleet gone to wreck, but please God in his mercy, before long, under favour of the Padshāh, you shall be driven not only from Hormuz, but from Diū and Gowa too!'—Sidi 'Ali Kapudān, in J. Asiat., Ser. I., tom ix. 70.

1602. "This island of Goa is so old a place that one finds nothing in the writings of the Canaras (to whom it always belonged) about the beginning of its population. But we find that it was always so frequented by strangers that they used to have a proverbial saying: 'Let us go and take our ease among the cool shades of Goe moat,' which in the old language of the country means 'the cool fertile land.'—Couto, IV. x., cap. 4.

1648. "All those that have seen Europe and Asia agree with me that the Port of Goa, the Port of Constantinople, and the Port of Toulon, are three of the fairest Ports of all our vast continent."—Tavernier, E.T., ii. 74.

Goa Plum. The fruit of Parinarium excelsum, introduced at Goa from Mozambique, called by the Portuguese Matomba. "The fruit is almost pure brown sugar in a paste" (Birdwood, MS.).

Goa Potato. Dioscorea aculeata (Birdwood, MS.).

Goa Powder. This medicine, which in India is procured from Goa only, is invaluable in the virulent eczema of Bombay, and other skin diseases. In eczema it sometimes acts like magic, but smarts like the cutting of a knife. It is obtained from Andira Araroba (N. O. Leguminosae), a native (we believe) of S. America. The active principle is Chrysophanic acid (Commn. from Sir G. Birdwood).

Goa Stone. A factitious article which was in great repute for medical virtues in the 17th century. See quotation below from Mr. King. Sir G. Birdwood tells us it is still sold in the Bombay Bazar.

1673. "The Paulistines enjoy the biggest of all the Monasteries at St. Roch; in it is a Library, an Hospital, and an Apothecary's Shop well furnished with Medicines, where Gasper Antonio, a Florentine, a Lay-Brother of the Order, the Author of the Goa-Stones, brings them in 50,000 Xerephins, by that invention Annually; he is an Old Man, and almost Blind."—Fryer, 149-150.

1711. "Goa Stones or Pedra de Gasper Antonio, are made by the Jesuits here: They are from  $\frac{1}{2}$  to 8 Ounces each; but the Sise makes no Difference in the Price: We bought 11 Ounces for 20 Rupees. They are often counterfeited, but 'tis an easie Matter for one who has seen the right Sort, to discover it . . . Manooch's Stones at Fort St. George come the nearest to them . . . both Sorts are deservedly cried up for their Virtues."—Lockyer, 268.

1867. "The Goa-Stone was in the 16th (?) and 17th centuries as much in repute as the Bezoar, and for similar virtues; . . . It is of the shape and size of a duck's egg, has a greyish metallic lustre, and though hard, is friable. The mode of employing it was to take a minute dose of the powder scraped from it in one's drink every morning . . . So precious was it esteemed that the great usually carried it about with them in a casket of gold filigree."—Nat. Hist. of Gems, by C. W. King, M.A., p. 256.

Godavery, n.p. Skt. Godāvarī, 'giving kine.' Whether this name of northern etymology was a corruption of some indigenous name we know not. It is remarkable how the Godavery is ignored by writers and map-makers till a comparatively late period, with the notable exception of D. João de Castro, in a work, however, not published till 1843. Barros, in his trace of the coasts of the Indies (Dec. I. ix. cap. 1) mentions Gudavarij as a place adjoining a Cape of the same name (which appears in some much later charts as C. Gordewar), but takes no notice of the great river, so far as we are aware, in any part of his history. Linschoten also speaks of the Punto de Guadovaryn, but not of the river. Nor does his map show the latter, though showing the Kistna distinctly. The small general map of India in "Cambridge's Acc. of the War in India," 1761, confounds the sources of the Godavery with those of the Mahanadi (of Orissa) and carries the latter on to combine with the western rivers of the Ganges Delta. This was evidently the prevailing view until Rennell published the first edition of his Memoir (1783), in which he writes:

"The Godavery river, or Gonga Godowry, commonly called Ganga in European maps, and sometimes Gang in Indian histories, has generally been represented as the same river with that of Cattack.

"As we have no authority that I can find for supposing it, the opinion must have been taken up, on a supposition that there was no opening between the mouths of the Kistna and Mahanadee (or Cattack river) of magnitude sufficient for such a river as the Ganga." (pp. 74-75).

In the neat map of "Regionum Choromandel, Golconda, et Orixa," which is in Baldaeus (1672), there is no indication of it whatever except as a short inlet from the sea called Gondewary.

1538. "The noblest rivers of this province (Daquem or Deccan) are six in number, to wit: Crusna (Krishna), in many places known as Hinapor, because it passes by a city of this name (Hindapūr ?); Bivra (read Bina ?); these two rivers join on the borders of the Deccan and the land of Canara (q.v.), and after traversing great distances enter the sea in the Oria territory; Malaprare (Malprabha ?); Guodavam (read Guodavari) otherwise called Gangua; Purnadi; Tapi. Of these the Malaprare enters the sea in the Oria territory, and so does the Guodavam; but Purnadi and Tapi enter the Gulf of Cambay at different points."—Jodo de Castro, Primeiro Roteiro da Costa da India, pp. 6, 7.

c. 1590. "Here (in Berār) are rivers in abundance; especially the Ganga of Gotam, which they also call Godovārī. The Ganga of Hindustan they dedicate to Mahādeo, but this Ganga to Gotam. And they tell wonderful legends of it, and pay it great adoration. It has its springs in the Sahyā Hills near Trimbak, and passing through the Wilāyat of Ahmādnagar, enters Berār and thence flows on to Tilingāna."—Āin-i-Akbarī (orig.) i. 476.

We may observe that the most easterly of the Delta branches of the Godavery is still called Gautami.

Goddess, s. An absurd corruption which used to be applied by our countrymen in the old settlements in the Malay countries to the young women of the land. It is Malay gadis, 'a virgin.'

c. 1772.
"And then how strange, at night oppress
By toils, with songs you're lulled to rest;
Of rural goddesses the guest,
Delightful!"

W. Marsden, in Memoirs, 14.

1784. "A lad at one of these entertainments, asked another his opinion of a gaddees who was then dancing. 'If she were plated with gold,' replied he, 'I would not take her for my concubine, much less for my wife.'"—Marsden's H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed., 230.

Godown, s. A warehouse for goods and stores; an outbuilding used for stores; a store-room. The word is in constant use in the Chinese ports as well as in India.

The Bengali gudām is apparently an adoption of the Anglo-Indian word, not its original. The word appears to have passed to the continent of India by diffusion from the eastern settlements, where the Malay word gadong is used in the same sense of 'store-room,' but also in that of 'a house built of brick or stone.' Still the word appears to have come primarily from the South of India, where in Telugu gidāngi, in Tamil kidaṅgu, signify 'a place where goods lie,' from kidu, 'to lie.' It appears also in Singhalese as gudāma. It is a fact that many common Malay and Javanese words are Tamil, or only to be explained by Tamil. Free intercourse between the Coromandel Coast and the Archipelago is very ancient, and when the Portuguese first appeared at Malacca they found there numerous settlers from S. India (see s.v. Kling).

Bluteau gives the word as palavra da Índia, and explains it as a "logea quasi debaixo de chão" ("almost under ground"), but this is seldom the case.

1552. "... and ordered them to plunder many godowns (gudoes) in which there was such abundance of clove, nutmeg, mace, and sandal wood, that our people could not transport it all till they had called in the people of Malacca to complete its removal."—Castanheda, iii. 276-7.

1561. "... Godowns (Gudões), which are strong houses of stone, having the lower part built with lime."—Correa, II. i. 236. (These two quotations both refer to events in 1511.)

1570. "... but the merchants have all one house or Maqazon, which house they call Godon, which is made of brickets."—Cæsar Frederike, in Hak.

1585. "In the Palace of the King (at Pegu) are many magazines both of gold and of silver. . . . Sandalwood, and lign-aloes, and all such things, have their gottons (gottoni), which is as much as to say separate chambers."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 111.

1613. "As fortalezas e fortificações de Malayos ordinariamente erão aedificios de matte entappado, de que havia muytas casas e armenyas ou godoens que são aedificios sotterraneos, em que os mercadores recolhem as roupas de Choromandel per il perigo de fogo."—Godinho de Eredia, 22.

1615. "We paid Jno. Dono 70 taies or plate of bars in full payment of the fee symple of the gadonge over the way, to westward of English howse, whereof 100 taies was paid before."—Cocks, i. 39.

"Virão das ruas as secretas minas

* * * * *

Das abrazadas casas as ruínas,
E das riquezas os gudões desertos."

Malacca Conquistada, x. 61.

1680. "Rent Rowle of Dwelling Houses, Goodowns, etc., within the Garrison in Christian Town."—In Wheeler, i. 253-4.

1683. "I went to ye Bankshall to mark out and appoint a Plat of ground to build a Godown for ye Honble. Company's Salt Petre."—Hedges (MS.), March 5.

1696. "Monday, 3rd August. The Choultry Justices having produced examinations taken by them concerning the murder of a child in the Black town, and the robbing of a godown within the walls: it is ordered that the Judge-Advocate do cause a session to be held on Tuesday the 11th for the trial of the criminals."—Official Memorandum in Wheeler, i. 303.

1809. "The Black Hole is now part of a godown or warehouse: it was filled with goods, and I could not see it."—Ld. Valentia, i. 237.

1880. "These 'Godowns' . . . are one of the most marked features of a Japanese town, both because they are white where all else is gray, and because they are solid where all else is perishable."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 264.

Goglet, Guglet, s. A water-bottle; usually earthenware, of globular body with a long neck, the same as what is called in Bengal more commonly a Sur-āhi (see Serai, b). This is the usual form now; the article described by Linschoten and Pyard, with a sort of cullender mouth and pebbles shut inside, was somewhat different. Corrupted from the Port. gorgoleta, the name of such a vessel. The French have also in this sense gargoulette, and a word gargouille, our medieval gurgoyle; i. derivations from gorga, garga, gorge, 'the throat,' found in all the Romance tongues.

Tom Cringle shows that the word is used in the W. Indies.

1598. "These cruses are called Gorgoleta."—Linschoten, 60.

1599. In Debry, vii. 28, the word is written Gorgolane.

c. 1610. "Il y a une pièce de terre fort delicate, et toute percée de petits trous faconnez, et au dedans y a de petites pierres qui ne peuvent sortir, c'est pour nettoyer le vase. Ils appellent cela gargoulette: l'eau n'en sorte que peu à la fois."—Pyard de la Val, ii. 43.

1648. "They all drink out of Gorgelanes, that is out of a Pot with a Spout, without setting the Mouth thereto."—T. Van Spilbergen's Voyage, 37.

c. 1670. "Quand on est à la maison on a des Gourgoulettes ou aiguieres d'une certaine pierre poreuse."—Bernier (ed. Amst.) ii. 214.

1688. "L'on donne à chacun de ceux que leur malheur conduit dans ces saintes prisons, un pot de terre plein d'eau pour se laver, un autre plus propre de ceux qu'on appelle Gurguleta, aussi plein d'eau pour boire."—Dillon, Rel. de l'Inquisition de Goa, 135.

c. 1690. "The Siamese, Malays, and Macassar people have the art of making from the larger coco-nut shells most elegant drinking vessels, cups, and those other receptacles for water to drink called Gorgelette, which they set with silver, and which no doubt by the ignorant are supposed to be made of the precious Maldivé cocons."—Rumphius, I. iii.

1698. "The same way they have of cooling their Liquors, by a wet cloth wrapped about their Gurgulets and Jars, which are vessels made of a porous Kind of Earth."—Fryer, 47.

1726. "However, they were much astonished that the water in the Gorgolets in that tremendous heat, especially out of doors, was found quite cold."—Valentijn, Choro. 59.

1829. "Dressing in a hurry, find the drunken bheesty . . . has mistaken your boot for the goglet in which you carry your water on the line of march."—Shipp's Memoirs, ii. 149.

c. 1830. "I was not long in finding a bottle of very tolerable rum, some salt junk, some biscuit, and a goglet, or porous earthen jar of water, with some capital cigars."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 152.

1832. "Murwan sent for a woman named Joadā, and handing her some virulent poison folded up in a piece of paper, said, 'If you can throw this into Hussun's gugglet, he on drinking a mouthful or two of water will instantly bring up his liver piece-meal.'"—Qanoon-e-Islam, 156.

1855. "To do it (gild the Rangoon Pagoda) they have enveloped the whole in an extraordinary scaffolding of bamboos, which looks as if they had been enclosing the pagoda in basketwork to keep it from breaking, as you would do with a water goglet for a dāk journey."—In Blackwood's Mag., May, 1856.

Gogo, and Goga, n.p. Gogā, a town on the inner or eastern shore of Kattywar Peninsula, formerly a seaport of some importance, with an anchorage sheltered by the Isle of Peram (the Beiram of the quotation from Ibn Batuta). Gogo appears in the Catalan map of 1375. Two of the extracts will show how this unhappy city used to suffer at the hands of the Portuguese.

Gogo is now superseded to a great extent by Bhaunagar, 8 m. distant.

1321. "Dated from Goga the 12th day of October, in the year of the Lord 1321."—Letter of Fr. Jordanus in Cathay, &c. i. 228.

c. 1343. "We departed from Beiram and arrived next day at the city of Kūka, which is large, and possesses extensive bazars. We anchored 4 miles off because of the ebb tide."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 60.

1531. "The Governor (Nuno da Cunha) . . . took counsel to order a fleet to remain behind to make war upon Cambaya, leaving Antonio de Saldanha with 50 sail, to wit: 4 galleons, and the rest galleys and galeots, and rowing-vessels of the King's, with some private ones eager to remain, in the greed for prize. And in this fleet there stayed 1000 men with good will for the plunder before them, and many honoured gentlemen and captains. And running up the Gulf they came to a city called Goga, peopled by rich merchants: and the fleet entering by a river ravaged it by fire and sword, slaying much people . . ."—Correa, iii. 418.

1602. " . . . the city of Gogā, which was one of the largest and most opulent in traffic, wealth and power of all those of Cambaya. . . . This city lies almost at the head of the Gulf, on the western side, spreading over a level plain, and from certain ruins of buildings still visible, seems to have been in old times a very great place, and under the dominion of certain foreigners."—Couto, IV., vii., cap. 5.

1614. "The passage across from Surraie to Goga is very short, and so the three fleets, starting at 4 in the morning, arrived there at nightfall . . . The next day the Portuguese returned ashore to burn the city . . . and entering the city they set fire to it in all quarters, and it began to blaze with such fury that there was burnt a great quantity of merchandize (fazendas de porte), which was a huge loss to the Moors . . . After the burning of the city they abode there 3 days, both captains and soldiers content with the abundance of their booty, and the fleet stood for Dio, taking, besides the goods that were on board, many boats in tow laden with the same."—Bo-carro, Decada, 333.

1727. "Goga is a pretty large Town. . . has some Trade. . . It has the Conveniences of a Harbour for the largest Ships, though they lie dry on soft Mud at low Water."—A. Ham., i. 143.

Gogolla, or Gogala, n.p. This is still the name of a village on a peninsular sandy spit of the mainland, opposite to the island and fortress of Diu, and formerly itself a fort. It was known in the 16th century as the Villa dos Rumes, because Melique Az (Malik Ayāz, the Mahom. Governor), not much trusting the Rumes (i.e. the Turkish mercenaries), or willing that they should be within the Fortress, sent them to dwell there." (Barros, II. iii. cap. 5).

1525. "Paga dyo e gogolla a el Rey de Cambaya treze layques em tangas. . . . xiiij laiques."—Lembrança, 34.

1538. In Botelho, Tombo, 230 and 239, we find "Alfandegua de Guogualaa."

1539. " . . . terminating in a long and narrow tongue of sand, on which stands a fort which they call Gogala, and the Portuguese the Villa dos Rumes. On the point of this tongue the Portuguese made a beautiful round bulwark."—João de Castro, Primeiro Roteiro, p. 218.

Golah, s. Hind. golā (from gol, 'round'). A store-house for grain or salt; so called from the typical form of such store-houses in many parts of India, viz., a circular wall of mud with a conical roof.

1810. "The golah, or warehouse."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 343.

1878. "The villagers, who were really in want of food, and maddened by the sight of those golahs stored with grain, could not resist the temptation to help themselves."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 77.

Gold Mohur Flower. Caesalpinia

pulcherrima, Sw. The name is a corruption of H. Gulmor, 'Peacock-Flower.'

Gole, s. The main body of an army in array; a clustered body of troops; an irregular squadron of horsemen. H. ghūl; perhaps a confusion with the Arab. jaul (or gaul), 'a troop.'

1507. "As the right and left are called Berānghār and Sewānghār . . . and are not included in the centre which they call ghūl, the right and left do not belong to the ghūl."—Baker, 227.

1803. "When within reach, he fired a few rounds, on which I formed my men into two gholes. . . . Both gholes attempted to turn his flanks, but the men behaved ill, and we were repulsed."—Skinner, Mil. Mem. i. 298.

1849. "About this time a large gole of horsemen came on towards me, and I proposed to charge; but as they turned at once from the fire of the guns, and as there was a nillah in front, I refrained from advancing after them."—Brigadier Lockwood, Report of 2nd Cavalry Division at Battle of Goojerat.

Gomasta, Gomashtah, s. Hind. from Pers. gumāshṭah, part. 'appointed, delegated.' A native agent or factor. In Madras the modern application is to a clerk for vernacular correspondence.

1762. "You will direct the gentlemen, Gomastahs, Muttasuddies, and Moonshies, and other officers of the English Company to relinquish their farms, taalucs, gunjes, and golahs."—The Nabob to the Governor, in Van Sittart, i. 229.

1776. "The Magistrate shall appoint some one person his gomastah or Agent in each Town."—Halhed's Code, 55.

1778. "The Company determining if possible to restore their investment to the former condition . . . sent gomastahs, or Gentoo factors in their own pay."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 57.

c. 1785. "I wrote an order to my gomastah in the factory of Hughly."—Carraccioli's Life of Clive, iii. 448.

1817. "The banyan hires a species of broker, called a Gomastah, at so much a month."—Mill's Hist. iii. 13.

1837. . . . (The Rajah) "sent us a very good breakfast; when we had eaten it, his Gomashta (a sort of secretary, at least more like that than anything else) came to say. . . ."—Letters from Madras, 128.

Gombroon, n.p. The old name in European documents of the place on the Persian Gulf now known as Bandar 'Abbās, or 'Abbāsī. The latter name was given to it when Shāh 'Abbās, after the capture and destruction of the island city of Hormuz, established a port there. The site which he selected was the little town of Gamrūn. This had been occupied by the Portuguese, who took it from the 'King of Lar' in 1612, but two years later it was taken by the Shāh.

The name is said (in the Geog. Magazine, i. 17) to be Turkish, meaning 'a Custom House.' The word alluded to is probably gumruk, which has that meaning, and which is again, through Low Greek, from the Latin commercium. But this etymology of the name seems hardly probable. That indicated in the extract from A. Hamilton below is from Pers. ḡamrūn, 'a shrimp,' or Port. camarão, meaning the same.

The first mention of Gombroon in the E. I. Papers seems to be in 1616, when Edmund Connok, the Company's chief agent in the Gulf, calls it "the best port in all Persia," and "that hopeful and glorious port of Gombroon" (Sainsbury, i. 484-5). There was an English factory here soon after the capture of Hormuz, and it continued to be maintained in 1759, when it was taken by the Comte d'Estaing. The factory was re-established, but ceased to exist a year or two later.

1614. (The Captain-major) "under orders of Dom Luis da Gama returned to succour Comorão, but found the enemy's fleet already there and the fort surrendered. . . . News which was heard by Dom Luis da Gama and most of the people of Ormuz in such way as might be expected, some of the old folks of Ormuz prognosticating at once that in losing Comorão Ormuz itself would be lost before long, seeing that the former was like a barbicane outwork on which the rage of the Persian enemy spent itself, giving time to Ormuz to prepare against their coming thither."—Bocarro, Decada, 349.

1622. "That evening, at two hours of the night, we started from below that fine tree, and after travelling about a league and a half . . . we arrived here in Combrū, a place of decent size and population on the sea-shore, which the Persians now-a-days, laying aside as it were the old name, call the 'Port of Abbas' because it was wrested from the Portuguese, who formerly possessed it, in the time of the present King Abbas."—P. della Valle, ii. 413.

c. 1630. "Gumbrown (or Gomroon, as some pronounce it) is by most Persians Kar 'ēsoḡh cald Bander or the Port Towne . . . some (but I commend them not) write it Gamrou, others Gomrou, and other-some Cummeroon. . . . A Towne it is of no Antiquity, rising daily out of the ruines of late glorious (now most wretched) Ormuz."—Sir T. Herbert, 121.

1673. "The Sailors had stigmatized this place of its Excessive Heat, with this sarcastical Saying, That there was but an Inch-Deal betwixt Gombroon and Hell."—Fryer, 224.

Fryer in another place (marginal rubric, p. 331) says: "Gombroon Ware, made of Earth, the best next China." Was this one of the sites of manufacture of the Persian porcelain now so highly prized?

1727. "This Gombroon was formerly a Fishing Town, and when Shaw Abass began to build it, had its Appellation from the Portuguezes, in Derision, because it was a good place for catching Prawns and Shrimps, which they call Camerong."—A. Ham., i. 92.

1762. "As this officer (Comte d'Estaing) . . . broke his parole by taking and destroying our settlements at Gombroon, and upon the west Coast of Sumatra, at a time when he was still a prisoner of war, we have laid before his Majesty a true state of the case."—In Long, 288.

Gomutí, s. Malay, gumuti. A substance resembling horsehair, and forming excellent cordage (the cabos negros of the Portuguese),* sometimes improperly called coir (q.v.), which is produced by a palm growing in the Archipelago, Arenga saccharifera, Labill. (Borassus Gomutus, Lour.). The tree also furnishes kalams or reed-pens for writing, and the material for the poisoned arrows used with the blow-tube. The name of the palm itself in Malay is anau.* See Sagwire. There is a very interesting account of this palm in Rumphius, Herb. Amb., i. pl. xiii. Dampier speaks of the fibre thus:

1686. "... There is another sort of Coire cables . . . that are black, and more strong and lasting, and are made of Strings that grow like Horse-hair at the Heads of certain Trees, almost like the Coco-trees. This sort comes mostly from the Island of Timor."—i. 295.

Gong, s. This word appears to be Malay (or, according to Crawford, originally Javanese), Gong or Agong. Its well-known application is to a disk of thin bell-metal, which, when struck with a mallet, yields musical notes, and is used in the further east as a substitute for a bell.

Marcel Devic says that the word exists in all the languages of the Archipelago. He defines it as meaning "instrument de musique aussi appelé tam-tam;" but see under tom-tom. The great drum, to which Dampier applies the name, was used like the metallic gong for striking the hour.

Systems of gongs variously arranged form harmonious musical instruments among the Burmese, and still more elaborately among the Javanese.

The word is commonly applied by Anglo-Indians also to the Hind. ghanṭā (organṭa, Dec.) or gharī, a thicker metal disc, not musical, used in India for striking the hour (see Gurry). The gong being used to strike the hour we find the word applied by Fryer (like gurry) to the hour itself, or interval denoted.

c. 1590. "In the morning before day the General did strike his Gongo, which is an Instrument of War that soundeth like a Bell." (This was in Africa, near Benguela). Advent. of Andrew Battel, in Purchas, ii. 970.

1673. "They have no Watches nor Hour-Glasses, but measure Time by the dropping of Water out of a Brass Bason, which holds a Ghong, or less than half an Hour; when they strike once distinctly, to tell them it's the First Ghong, which is renewed at the Second Ghong for Two, and so Three at the End of it till they come to Eight; when they strike on the Brass Vessel at their liberty to give notice the Pore [i.e., Pahr or Watch] is out, and at last strike One leisurely to tell them it is the First Pore."—Fryer, 186.

1686. "In the Sultan's Mosque (at Mindanao) there is a great Drum with but one Head, called a Gong; which is instead of a Clock. This Gong is beaten at 12 a Clock, at 3, 6, and 9."—Dampier, i. 333.

1750-52. "Besides these (in China) they have little drums, great and small kettle drums, gungungs or round brass basons like frying pans."—Olof Toreen, 248.

1817. "War music bursting out from time to time With gong and tymbalon's tremendous chime."—Lalla Rookh, Mokanna. Tremendous sham poetry!

1878. "... le nom plébéen . . . sonna dans les salons. . . . Comme un coup de cymbale, un de ces gongs qui sur les théâtres de féerie annoncent les apparitions fantastiques."—Alph. Daudet, Le Nabab, ch. 4.

Goodry, s. A quilt. Hind. gudrī.

1598. "They make also faire couerlits, which they call Godoriins [or] Colchas, which are very faire and pleasant to the eye, stitched with silke; and also of cotton of all colours and stitchings."—Linschoten, ch. 9.

c. 1610. "Les matelats et les couvertures sont de soye ou de toile de coton façonnée à toutes sortes de figures et couleur

Itsappellent cela Gouldrins."—Pyrard de La-val, ii. 3.

Googul, s. Hind. gugal (Sansk. guggula and guggulu). The aromatic gum-resin of the Balsamodendron Mukul, Hooker (Amyris agallocha, Roxb.), the mukl of the Arabs, and generally supposed to be the bdellium of the ancients. It is imported from the Beyla territory, west of Sind (see Bo. Govt. Selections (N.S.), No. xvii., p. 326). See Bdellium.

1525. (Prices at Cambay). "Gugall d'orumuz (the maund), 16 fedcas."—Lembrança, 43.

1813. "Gogul is a species of bitumen much used at Bombay and other parts of India, for painting the bottom of ships."—Milburn, i. 137.

Goojur, n.p. H. Gujar (Skt. Gurj-jara). The name of a great Hindu clan, very numerous in tribes and in population over nearly the whole of Northern India, from the Indus to Rohilkhand. In the Dehli territory and the Doab they were formerly notorious for thieving propensities; and they are never such steady and industrious cultivators as the Jats, among whose villages they are so largely interspersed. In the Punjab they are Mahommedans. Their extensive diffusion is illustrated by their having given name to Gujarāt (see Goozerat) as well as to Gujrāt and Gujrānvālā in the Punjab. And during the last century a great part of Sahārunpūr District in the Northern Doab was also called Gujrāt (see Elliot's Races, by Beames, i. 99, seqq.).

Goolail, s. A pellet-bow; P. Hind. ghulel.

In Shakspeare we have Sir Toby exclaiming: "O for a stone-bow to hit him in the eye!" and in Beaumont and Fletcher:

1611.

"Children will shortly take him for a wall, And set their stone-bows in his forehead." A King and No King, V.

Goolmaul, and sometimes Goolmool, s. A muddle, confusion. Hind. gul-māl karnā, to make a mixture or mess.

Goont, s. Hind. gūnth and gūth. A kind of pony of the N. Himālayas, strong but clumsy.

c. 1590. "In the northern mountainous districts of Hindustan, a kind of small but strong horses is bred, which is called gūt; and in the confines of Bengal, near Kūch, another kind of horses occurs, which rank between the gūt and Turkish horses, and are called Tanghan (see Tangan); they are strong and powerful."—Āin, i. 183.

1609. "On the further side of Ganges lyeth a very mighty Prince, called Raiwan Rodorou, holding a mountainous Countrey . . . thence commeth much Muske, and heere is the great breed of a small kind of Horse, called Gunts, a true travelling scale-cliffe beast."—W. Finch in Purchas, i. 438.

1831. "In Cashmere I shall buy, without regard to price, the best ghounte in Tibet."—Jacquemont's Letters, E. T., ii. 12.

Gooroo, s. Hind. gurū, from Sansk. guru; a spiritual teacher, a (Hindu) priest.

(Ancient.) "That brahman is called guru who performs according to rule the rites on conception and the like, and feeds (the child) with rice (for the first time)."—Manu, ii. 142.

c. 1550. "You should do as you are told by your parents and your Guru."—Rāmāyana of Tulsi Dās, by Grouse (1878), 43.

1626. "There was a famous Prophet of the Ethnikes, named Goru."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 520.

1700. ". . . je suis fort surpris de voir à la porte . . . le Pénitent au collier qui demandoit à parler au Gourou."—Lettres Edif., x. 95.

1810. "Persons of this class often keep little schools . . . and then are designated gooroos; a term implying that kind of respect we entertain for pastors in general."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 317.

1822. "The Adventures of the Gooroo Paramartan: a tale in the Tamul Language" (translated by B. Babington from the original of Padre Beschi, written about 1720-1730), London.

1867. "Except the guru of Bombay, no priest on earth has so large a power of acting on every weakness of the female heart as a Mormon bishop at Salt Lake."—Dixon's New America, 330.

Goorul, s. H. gural; the Himalayan chamois; Nemorhoedus Goral of Jerdon.

Goozerat, Guzerat, n.p. The name of a famous province in Western India, Skt. Gurjjara and Gurjjara-rāshtra, Prakrit forms Gujarāt or Gujrāt, taking its name from the Gujar tribe (see Goojur). The name covers the British districts of Surat, Broach, Kaira, Pānch Mahals, and Ahmedābād, besides the territories of the Gaekwar of Baroda (see Guicowar) and a multitude of native States. It is also often used as including the peninsula of Kathiawār or Surāshtra, which alone embraces 180 petty States.

1300. "The Sultan despatched Ulugh Khān to Ma'bar and Gujārāt for the destruction of the idol-temple of Somnāt, on the 20th of Jumādī'l awwal, 698 H. . . ."—Amir Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 74.

1554. "At last we made the land of Guchrāt in Hindustan."—Sidi 'Alī, p. 79.

The name is sometimes used by the old writers for the people, and especially for the Hindu merchants or Banyans (q.v.) of Guzerat. See Sainsbury, i. 445 and passim.

Goozul-Khana, s. A bath room; Hind., from Arabo-Pers. ghusl-khāna, of corresponding sense. The apartment so called was used by some of the Great Moghuls as a place of private audience.

1616. "At eight, after supper he comes down to the Guzelian, a faire Court wherein in the midst is a Throne erected of free-stone."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, ii.

c. 1660. "From the great Hall of the Am-kus one enters into a more retired Place called the Goselkana, that is, the place to wash in. But few are suffered to enter there. . . . There it is where the king is seated in a chair . . . and giveth a more particular Audience to his officers."—Bernier, E. T., p. 85.

Gopura, s. The meaning of this word in Sansk. is a 'city-gate.' But in S. India the gopuram is that remarkable feature of architecture, peculiar to the Peninsula, the great pyramidal tower over the entrance-gate to the precinct of a temple. See Fergusson's Indian and Eastern Architecture, 325 &c.

This feature is not, in any of the S. Indian temples, older than the 15th or 16th cent., and was no doubt adopted for purposes of defence, as indeed the Silpa-sūtra ('Books of Mechanical Arts') treatises imply. This fact may sufficiently dispose of the idea that the feature indicates an adoption of architecture from ancient Egypt.

1862. "The gopurams or towers of the great pagoda."—Markham, Peru and India, 408.

Gora, s. Hind. gorā, 'fair complexioned.' A white man; a European soldier; any European who is not a sahib (q.v.). Plural gorā-lōg, 'white people.'

Gorawallah, s. Hind. ghorā-wālā (ghorā, 'a horse'). A groom or horse-keeper; used at Bombay. On the Bengal side syce (q.v.) is always used, on the Madras side horsekeeper (q.v.).

c. 1848. "On approaching the different points, one knows Mrs. — is at hand, for her Gorahwallahs wear green and gold pug-gries."—Chow-Chow, i. 151.

Gorayt, s. Hind. gorēṭ; a village watchman and messenger, one of the municipal establishment, employed under the patwāri in Upper India.

Gordower, Goordore, s. A kind of boat in Bengal, described by Ives as "a vessel pushed on by paddles." Etym. obscure. Ghurdaur is a horse-race, a race-course. Was it originally a racing boat?

Gosain, Gossyne, s. Hind. and Mahr. Gosāin, Gosāl, Gosānī, &c., from Sansk. Goswāmī, 'Lord of passions' (lit. 'Lord of cows'), i.e. one who is supposed to have subdued his passions and renounced the world. Applied in various parts of India to different kinds of persons not necessarily celibates, but professing a life of religious mendicancy, and including some who dwell together in convents under a superior.

1774. "My hopes of seeing Teshu Lama were chiefly founded on the Gosain."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 46.

c. 1781. "It was at this time in the hands of a Gosine, or Hindoo Religious."*—Hodges, 112.

* The use of this barbarism by Hodges is remarkable, common as it has become of late years.

1826. "I found a lonely cottage with a light in the window, and being attired in the habit of a gossein, I did not hesitate to request a lodging for the night."—Pandurang Hari, 399.

Gosbeck, Cosbeague, s. Besides what the quotations indicate we can say nothing. The word suggests some form like Ghāzi-Beg; but we cannot trace it. It is spoken of in Persia (at Gombroon and elsewhere).

c. 1630. "The Abbasee is in our money sixteen pence; Lavree ten pence; Mamood eight pence; Shahce four pence; Saddee two pence; Bistee two pence; double Cozbe one penny; single Cozbe one half-penny; Fluces are ten to a Cozbe."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 231.

Gosha, adj. Used in some parts, as an Anglo-Indian technicality, to indicate that a woman is secluded, and cannot appear in public. It is short for gosha-nishin (Pers.), 'sitting in a corner;' and is much the same as parda-nishin (v. purdani-shen).

a. Gour, s. Hind. gaur and gauri gāz (but not in the dictionaries). The great wild ox Gavaeus Gaurus, Jerd., the same as Bison (q. v.).

1806. "They erect strong fences, but the buffaloes generally break them down. . . . They are far larger than common buffaloes. There is an account of a similar kind called the Gore; one distinction between it and the buffalo is the length of the hoof."—Elphinstone in Life, i. 156.

b. Gour, s. Properly Can. gaud, gaur, or gauda. The head man of a village in the Canarese-speaking country; either as corresponding to patel (see potail) or to the Zemindar of Bengal.

c. 1800. "Every Tehsildary is farmed out in villages to the Gours or head-farmers."—In Munro's Life, iii. 92.

c. Gour, n.p. Gaur, the name of a medieval capital of Bengal, which lay immediately south of the modern civil station of Malda, and the traces of which, with occasional Mahomedan buildings, extend over an immense area, chiefly covered with jungle. The name is a form of the ancient Gauda, meaning (it is believed) 'the country of sugar,' a name applied to a large part of Bengal, and specifically to the portion where these remains lie. It was the residence of a Hindu dynasty, the Senas, at the time of the early Mahomedan invasions, and was popularly known as Lakṣnādoti; but the reigning king had transferred his seat to Nadiya (70 m. above Calcutta) before the actual conquest of Bengal in the last years of the 12th century. Gaur was afterwards the residence of several Mussalman dynasties.

1536. "But Xercansor* after his success advanced along the river till he came before the city of Gouro to besiege it, and ordered a lodgment to be made in front of certain varandas of the King's Palace which looked upon the river; and as he was making his trenches certain Rumis who were resident in the city, desiring that the King should prize them highly (delles jizesse cabedal) as he did the Portuguese, offered their service to the King to go and prevent the enemy's lodgment, saying that he should also send the Portuguese with them."—Correa, iii. 720.

1553. "The chief city of the Kingdom (of Bengala) is called Gouro. It is situated on the banks of the Ganges, and is said to be 3 of our leagues in length, and to contain 200,000 inhabitants. On the one side it has the river for its defence, and on the landward faces a wall of great height . . . the streets are so thronged with the concourse and traffic of people . . . that they cannot force their way past . . . a great part of the houses of this city are stately and well-wrought buildings."—Barros, IV. ix. cap. 1.

1683. "I went to see ye famous Ruins of a great City and Pallace called GOWREE. . . we spent 3½ hours in seeing ye ruins especially of the Pallace which has been . . in my judgment considerably bigger and more beautifull than the Grand Seignor's Seraglio [at Constantinople or any other

* i.e. Sher Khān Sur, afterwards King of Humdostan as Sher Shāh.

Pallace that I have seen in Europe."—Hedges, May 16.

Governor's Straits, n.p. This was the name applied by the Portuguese (Estreito do Governador) to the Straits of Singapore, i.e. the straits south of that island (or New Strait). The reason of the name is given in our first quotation. The Governor in question was the Spaniard Dom João da Silva.

1615. "The Governor sailed from Manilha in March of this year with 10 galleons and 2 galleys. . . . Arriving at the Straits of Sincapur, * * * and passing by a new strait which since has taken the name of Estreito do Governador, there his galleon grounded on the reef at the point of the strait, and was a little grazed by the top of it."—Bocarro, 428.

1727. "Between the small Carimon and Tanjong-bellong on the Continent, is the entrance of the Straights of Sincapure before mentioned, and also into the Straights of Governadore, the largest and easiest Passage into the China Seas."—A. Ham. ii. 122.

Gow, Gaou, s. Dakh. H. gau. An ancient measure of distance preserved in S. India and Ceylon. In the latter island, where the term still is in use, the garuva is a measure of about four English miles. It is Pali gāvuta, one quarter of a yojana, and that again is the Sansk. gavyūti with the same meaning.

There is in Molesworth's Marāṭhī Dictionary, and in Wilson, a term gaukos, 'a land measure' (for which read 'distance measure'), the distance at which the lowing of a cow may be heard. This is doubtless a form of the same term as that under consideration, but the explanation is probably modern and incorrect. The yojana with which the gau is correlated, appears etymologically to be 'a yoking,' viz., 'the stage, or distance gone in one harnessing without unyoking' (Williams); and the lengths attributed to it are very various, oscillating from 2½ to 9 miles, and even to 8 krośas or cośs. The last valuation of the yojana would correspond with that of the gau at ¼.

c. 545. "The great Island (Taprobane), according to what the natives say, has a length of 300 gaudia, and a breadth of the same, i.e. 900 miles."—Cosmas Indicopleustes, (in Cathay, clxxvii).

1623. "From Garicota to Tumbre may be about a league and a half, for in that country distances are measured by gaū, and each gaū is about two leagues, and from Garicota to Tumbre they said was not so much as a gaū of road."—P. della Valle, ii. 638.

1676. "They measure the distances of places in India by Gos and Costes. A Gos is about 4 of our common leagues, and a Coste is one league."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 30.

1860. "A gaou in Ceylon expresses a somewhat indeterminate length, according to the nature of the ground to be traversed, a gaou across a mountainous country being less than one measured on level ground, and a gaou for a loaded coolie is also permitted to be shorter than for one unburdened, but on the whole the average may be taken under four miles."—Tennent's Ceylon, 4th ed., i. 467.

Grab, s. This name, now almost obsolete, was applied to a kind of vessel which is constantly mentioned in the sea- and river-fights of India, from the arrival of the Portuguese down to near the end of the last century. That kind of etymology which works from inner consciousness would probably say: "This term has always been a puzzle to the English in India. The fact is that it was a kind of vessel much used by corsairs, who were said to grab all that passed the sea. Hence, &c." But the real derivation is different.

The Rev. Howard Malcom, in a glossary attached to his Travels, defines it as "a square-rigged Arab vessel, having a projecting stern (stem?) and no bowsprit; it has two masts." Probably the application of the term may have deviated variously in recent days. For thus again in Solvyns (Les Hindous, vol. i.) a grab is drawn and described as a ship with three masts, a sharp prow, and a bowsprit. But originally the word seems, beyond question, to have been an Arab name for a galley. The proper word is Arab. ghorāb, 'a raven,' though adopted into Mahratti and Konkani as gurāb. Jal says, quoting Reinaud, that ghorāb was the name given by the Moors to the true galley, and cites Hyde for the rationale of the name. We give Hyde's words below. Amari, in the work quoted below (p. 397), points out the analogous corvetta as perhaps a transfer of ghurāb:

1181. "A vessel of our merchants . . . making sail for the city of Tripoli (which God protect) was driven by the winds on the shore of that country, and the crew being in want of water, landed to procure it, but the people of the place refused it unless some corn were sold to them. Meanwhile there came a ghurāb from Tripoli . . . which took and plundered the crew, and seized all the goods on board the vessel."*—Arabic letter from Ubaldo, Archbishop and other authorities of Pisa, to the Almohad Caliph Abu Yak'ub Yusuf in Amari, Diplomi Arabi, p. 8.

The Latin contemporary version runs thus:

"Cum quidam nostri cari cives de Sicilia cum carico frumenti ad Tripolim venirent, tempestate maris et vi ventorum compulsi, ad portum dictum Macri devenerunt; ibique aqua deficiente, et cum pro ea auriendā irent, Barbarosi non permiserunt eos . . . nisi prius eis de frumento venderent. Cumque inviti eis de frumento venderent galea vestra de Tripoli armata," &c.—(Ibid., p. 269.)

c. 1200. Ghurāb, Cornix, Corvus, galea.

1343. "Jalansi . . . sent us off in company with his son, on board a vessel called al-'Ukari, which is like a ghorāb, only more roomy. It has 80 oars, and when it engages is covered with a roof to protect the rowers from the darts and stone-shot."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 59.

1554. In the narrative of Sidi 'Ali Kapudān, in describing an action that he fought with the Portuguese near the Persian Gulf, he says the enemy's fleet consisted of 4 barques as big as carracks (q. v.), 3 great ghurābs, 6 Karāwals (see Caravel) and 12 smaller ghurābs or *galliot*s (see Gallevat) with oars.—In J. Asiat., Ser. I., tom. ix., 67-68.

1600. "Jani Beg might attack us from the hills, the ghrābs from the river, and the men of Siḥwān from the rear, so that we should be in a critical position."—Mohammed M'asum, in Elliot, i. 250.
The word occurs in many pages of the same history.

1690. "Galera . . . ab Arabibus tam Asiaticis quam Africanis vocatur. . . Ghorāb, i. e. Corvus, quasi picea nigredine, rostro extenso, et velis remisque sicut alis volans galera: unde et Vlachus Græce dicitur Méaiva,"—Hyde, Note on Persiöl, in Synt. Dissert. i. 97.

1673. "Our Factors, having concerns in the cargo of the ships in this Road, loaded two Grobs and departed."—Fryer, 153.

1727. "The Muskat War . . . obliges them (the Portuguese) to keep an Armada of five or six Ships, besides small Frigates and Grabs of War."—A. Ham., i. 250.

* From Anani's Italian version.

1750-52. "The ships which they make use of against their enemies are called goerabbs by the Dutch, and grabbs by the English, have 2 or 3 masts, and are built like our ships, with the same sort of rigging, only their prows are low and sharp as in galleys, that they may not only place some cannons in them, but likewise in case of emergency for a couple of oars, to push the grab on in a calm."—Olof Toreen, Voyage, 205.

c. 1754. "Our E. I. Company had here (Bombay) one ship of 40 guns, one of 20, one Grab of 18 guns, and several other vessels."—Ives, 43.

Ives explains "Ketches, which they call grabs." This shows the meaning already changed, as no galley could carry 18 guns.

c. 1760. "When the Derby, Captain Ansell, was so scandalously taken by a few of Angria's grabs."—Grose, i. 81.

1763. "The grabs have rarely more than two masts, though some have three; those of three are about 300 tons burthen; but the others are not more than 150: they are built to draw very little water, being very broad in proportion to their length, narrowing, however, from the middle to the end, where instead [of bows they have a prow, projecting like that of a Mediterranean galley."—Orme (reprint), i. 408-9.

1810. "Here a fine English East India-man, there a grab, or a dow from Arabia."—Maria Graham, 142.

"This Glab (sic) belongs to an Arab merchant of Muscat. The Nakhodah, an Abyssinian slave."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 232.

1872. "Moored in its centre you saw some 20 or 30 ghurābs (grabs) from Maskat, Baghlahs from the Persian Gulf, Kotiyahs from Kach'h, and Pattimars or Batelias from the Konkan and Bombay."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 83.

Gram, s. This word is properly the Portuguese grão, i. e. 'grain,' but it has been specially appropriated to that kind of vetch (Cicer arietinum, L.) which is the most general grain- (rather pulse-) food of horses all over India, called in Hind. chana. It is the Ital. cece, Fr. pois chiche, Eng. chick-pea or Egypt. pea, much used in France and S. Europe. This specific application of grão is also Portuguese, as appears from Bluteau. The word gram is in some parts of India applied to other kinds of pulse, and then this application of it is recognized by qualifying it as Bengal gram. See remarks under Calavance. The plant exudes oxalate of potash, and to walk through a gram-field in a wet morning is destructive to shoe-leather. The natives collect the acid.

1702. ". . . he confessing before us that their allowance three times a week is but a quart of rice and gram together for five men a day, but promises that for the future it shall be rectified."—In Wheeler, ii. 10.

1776. "... Lentils, gram . . . mustard seed."—Halhed's Code, p. 8 (pt. ii.).

1789. "... Gram, a small kind of pulse, universally used instead of oats."—Munro's Narrative, 85.

1793. "... gram, which it is not customary to give to bullocks in the Carnatic."—Dirom's Narrative, 97.

1804. "The gram alone, for the 4 regiments with me, has in some months cost 50,000 pagodas."—Wellington, iii. 71.

1855. "But they had come at a wrong season, gram was dear, and prices low, and the sale concluded in a dead loss."—Palgrave's Arabia, 290.

Gram-fed, adj. Properly the distinctive description of mutton and beef fattened upon gram, which used to be the pride of Bengal. But applied figuratively to any 'pampered creature.'

c. 1849. "By an old Indian I mean a man full of curry and of bad Hindustani, with a fat liver and no brains, but with a self-sufficient idea that no one can know India except through long experience of brandy, champagne, gram-fed mutton, cheroots, and hookahs."—Sir C. Napier, quoted in Bos. Smith's Life of Ld. Lawrence, i. 338.

1880. "I missed two people at the Delhi assemblage in 1877. All the gram-fed secretaries and most of the alcoholic chiefs were there; but the famine-haunted villagers and the delirium-shattered opium-eating Chinaman, who had to pay the bill, were not present."—Ali Baba, 127.

Grandonic. V. Grunthum and Sanskrit.

Grass-cloth, s. This name is now generally applied to a kind of cambric from China made from the Chuma of the Chinese (Boehmeria nivea, Hooker, the Rhea, so much talked of now), and called by the Chinese sia-pu, or 'summer-cloth.'

We find grass-cloths often spoken of by the 16th century travellers, and even later, as an export from Orissa and Bengal. These were probably made of Rhea or some kindred species, but we have not been able to determine this. Cloth and nets are made in the south from the Neilgherry nettle (Girardinia heterophylla, D. C.).

c. 1567. "Cloth of herbes (panni d'erba), which is a kind of silke, which groweth among the woodes without any labour of man."—Cæsar Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 353.

1585. "Great store of the cloth which is made from Grasse, which they call Yerua" (in Orissa).—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 387.

1727. "Their manufactories (about Bala-sore) are of Cotton . . . Silk, and Silk and Cotton Romals . . . ; and of Herba (a Sort of tough Grass) they make Ginghams, Pinascos, and several other Goods for Exportation."—A. Ham. i. 397.

1813. Milburn, in his List of Bengal Piece-Goods, has Herba Taffaties (ii. 221).

Grasscutter, s. This is probably a corruption representing the Hind. ghāṣkṣodā or ghāṣkāṭā, 'the digger, or cutter, of grass'; the title of a servant employed to collect grass for horses, one such being usually attached to each horse besides the syce or horse-keeper. In the north the grasscutter is a man; in the south the office is filled by the horsekeeper's wife. Ghāṣkaṭ is the form commonly used by Englishmen in Upper India speaking Hindustani; but ghāṣiyārā by those aspiring to purer language. The former term appears in Williamson's V. M. (1810) as gauskot (i. 186), the latter in Jacquemont's Correspondence as grassyara.

No grasscutters are mentioned as attached to the stables of Akbar; only a money allowance for grass.

The antiquity of the Madras arrangement is shown by a passage in Castanheda (1552): "... gave him a horse, and a boy to attend to it, and a female slave to see to its fodder."—ii. 58.

1789. "... an Horsekeeper and Grasscutter at two pagodas."—Munro's Narr. 28.

1793. "Every horse . . . has two attendants, one who cleans and takes care of him, called the horse-keeper, and the other the grasscutter, who provides for his forage."—Dirom's Narr. 242.

1836. "Every horse has a man and a maid to himself—the maid cuts grass for him; and every dog has a boy. I inquired whether the cat had any servants, but I found he was allowed to wait upon himself."—Letters from Madras, 37.

1875. "I suppose if you were to pick up . . . a grasscutter's pony to replace the one you lost, you wouldn't feel that you had done the rest of the army out of their rights."—The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

Grass-Widow, s. This slang phrase is applied in India, with a shade of malignity, to ladies living apart from their husbands, especially as recreating at the Hill stations, whilst the husbands are at their duties in the plains.

We do not know the origin of the phrase. In the Slang Dictionary it is explained: "An unmarried mother; a deserted mistress." But no such opprobrious meanings attach to the Indian use.

Since the preceding sentences were written we have seen in Notes and Queries, ser. vi., vol. viii., Nov. 24th, 1883, several communications on this phrase. We learn from these that in Moor's Suffolk Words and Phrases, Grace-Widow occurs with the meaning of an unmarried mother. Corresponding to this also it is stated, is the N. S. (?) or Low German gras-wedewe. The Swedish Gräsiinka or -enka also is used for 'a low dissolute married woman living by herself.' In Belgium a woman of this description is called haecke-wedewe, from haecken, 'to feel strong desire' (to 'hanker'). And so it is suggested gräsenka is contracted from grädesenka, from gradiq, 'esuriens' (greedy in fact). In Danish Dict. grassenska is interpreted as a woman whose betrothed lover is dead. But the German Stroh-Wittwe, 'straw-widow' (which Flügel interprets as 'mock widow'), seems rather inconsistent with the suggestion that grass-widow is a corruption of the kind suggested. A friend mentions that the masc. Stroh-Wittwer is used in Germany for a man whose wife is absent, and who therefore dines at the eating-house with the young fellows.

1878. "In the evening my wife and I went out house-hunting; and we pitched upon one which the newly incorporated body of Municipal Commissioners and the Clergyman (who was a Grass-widower, his wife being at home) had taken between them."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 99-100.

1879. The Indian newspaper's "typical official rises to a late breakfast—probably on herrings and soda-water—and dresses tastefully for his round of morning calls, the last on a grass-widow, with whom he has a tête-à-tête tiffin, where 'pegs' alternate with champagne."—Simla Letter in Times, Aug. 16th.

1880. "The Grass-widow in Nephelococcygia."—Sir Ali Baba, 169.

"Pleasant times have these Indian grass-widows!"—The World, Jan. 21st, 13.

Grassia, s. Grās (said to mean 'a mouthful') is stated by Mr. Forbes in the Rās Mālā to have been in old times usually applied to alienations for religious objects; but its prevalent sense came to be the portion of land given for subsistence to cadets of chieftains' families. Afterwards the term grās was also used for the black-mail paid by a village to a turbulent neighbour as the price of his protection and forbearance, and in other like meanings. "Thus the title of grassia, originally an honourable one, and indicating its possessor to be a cadet of the ruling tribe, became at last as frequently a term of opprobrium, conveying the idea of a professional robber" (Op. cit., Bk. iv., ch. 3).

c. 1665. "Nous nous trouvâmes au Village de Bilpar, dont les Habitans qu'on nomme Gratiates, sont presque tous Voleurs."—Thevenot, v. 42.

1808. "The Grasias have been shewn to be of different Sects, Casts, or families, viz., 1st, Colees and their Collaterals; 2nd, Rajpoots; 3rd, Syed Mussulmans; 4th, Mole-Islands or modern Mahomedans. There are besides many others who enjoy the free usufruct of lands, and permanent emolument from villages, but those only who are of the four aforesaid warlike tribes seem entitled by prescriptive custom . . . to be called Grassias."—Drummond, Illustrations.

1813. "I confess I cannot now contemplate my extraordinary deliverance from the Gracia machinations without feelings more appropriate to solemn silence, than expression."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 393.

1819. "Grassia, from Grass, a word signifying 'a mouthful.' This word is understood in some parts of Mekran, Sind, and Kutch; but I believe not further into Hindostan than Jaypore."—Mackmurdo, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo., i. 270.

Grave-digger. See Beejoo.

Green Pigeon. A variety of species belonging to the sub-fam. Treroninae, and to genera Treron, Cricopus, Osmotreron, and Sphenocercus, bear this name.

The three first following quotations show that these birds had attracted the attention of the ancients.

c. 180. "Daimachus, in his History of India, says that pigeons of an apple-green colour are found in India."—Athenæus, ix. 51.

c. A.D. 250. "They bring also greenish (ὀχρὰς) pigeons which they say can never be tamed or domesticated."—Ælian, De Nat. Anim., xv. 14.

"There are produced among the Indians . . . pigeons of a pale green colour (χλωρόπτεροι); any one seeing them for the first time, and not having a knowledge of ornithology, would say the bird was a parrot and not a pigeon. They have legs and bill in colour like the partridges of the Greeks."—Ibid., xvi. 2.

1673. "Our usual diet was (besides Plenty of Fish) Water-Fowl, Peacocks, Green Pidgeons, Spotted Deer, Sabre, Wild Hogs, and sometimes Wild Cows."—Fryer, 176.

1825. "I saw a great number of pea-fowl, and of the beautiful greenish pigeon common in this country . . ."—Heber, ii. 19.

Grey Partridge. The common Anglo-Indian name of the Hind. titar, common over a great part of India, Ortygornis Ponticerrana, Gmelin. "Its call is a peculiar loud shrill cry, and has, not unaptly, been compared to the word Pateela-pateela-pateela, quickly repeated but preceded by a single note, uttered two or three times, each time with a higher intonation, till it gets, as it were, the key-note of its call."—Jerdon, ii. 566.

Griblee, s. A graplin or grapnel. Lascar's language (Roebuck).

Griffin, Griff, s. (also Griffish, adj.). One newly arrived in India, and unaccustomed to Indian ways and peculiarities; a Johnny Newcome.

The origin of the phrase is unknown to us. There was an Admiral Griffin who commanded in the Indian seas from Nov., 1746, to June, 1748, and was not very fortunate. Had his name to do with the origin of the term? The word seems to have been first used at Madras (see Boyd, below).

Two references below indicate the parallel terms formerly used by the Portuguese at Goa, and by the Dutch in the Archipelago.

1794. "As I am little better than an unfledged Griffin, according to the fashionable phrase here" (Madras).—Hugh Boyd, 177.

1807. "It seems really strange to a griffin—the cant word for a European just arrived."—Ld. Minto in India, 17.

1808. "At the Inn I was tormented to death by the impertinent persevering of the black people; for every one is a beggar, as long as you are reckoned a griffin, or a new-comer."—Life of Leyden, 107.

1836. "I often tire myself . . . rather than wait for their dawdling; but Mrs. Staunton laughs at me and calls me a 'Griffin,' and says I must learn to have patience and save my strength."—Letters from Madras, 38.

" . . . he was living with bad men, and saw that they thought him no better than themselves, but only more griffish . . ."—Ibid., 53.

1853. "There were three more cadets on the same steamer, going up to that great griff depot, Oudapoor."—Oakfield, i. 38.

The griffin at Goa also in the old days was called by a peculiar name. See Reinol.

1631. "Haec exanthemata (prickly heat-spots) magis afficiunt recentior advenientes ut et Mosquitarum puncturae . . . ita ut deridiculum ergo hic inter nostrates dicitur enatum sit, eum qui hoc modo affectus sit, esse Orang Barou, quod novitium hominem significat."—Jac. Bontii, Hist. Nat., &c., ii. cap. 18, p. 33.

Ground, s. A measure of land used in the neighbourhood of Madras. See under Cawny.

Gruff, adj. Applied to bulky goods. Probably the Dutch grof, 'coarse.'

1759. "Which by causing a great export of rice enhances the price of labour, and consequently of all other gruff, piece-goods and raw silk."—In Long, 171.

1765. " . . . also foole sugar, lump jaggr, ginger, long pepper, and piply-mol . . . articles that usually compose the gruff cargoes of our outward-bound shipping."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 194.

1783. "What in India is called a gruff (bulky) cargo."—Forrest, Voyage to Mergui, 42.

Grunth, s. Panjābī Granth, from Sansk. grantha, 'a book.' 'The Book,' i.e. the Scripture of the Sikhs, containing the hymns composed or compiled by their leaders from Nanak (1469—1539) onwards. The Granth has been translated by Dr. Trumpp, and published, at the expense of the Indian Government.

1798. "A book entitled the Grunth . . . is the only typical object which the Sikques have admitted into their places of worship."—G. Forster's Travels, i. 255.

1817. "The fame of Nannak's book was diffused. He gave it a new name, Kirunt."—Mill's Hist., ii. 377.

c. 1831. " . . . Au centre du quel est le temple d'or où est gardé le Grant ou livre sacré des Sikes."—Jacquemont, Correspondance, ii. 166.

Grunthee, s. Panj. granthi from granth (vide Grunth). A sort of native chaplain attached to Sikh regiments.

Grunthum. This (grantham) is a name, from the same Sansk. word as the last, given in various odd forms to the Sanskrit language by various Europeans writing in S. India during the 16th and 17th centuries. The term properly applied to the character in which the Sanskrit books were written.

1600. "In these verses is written, in a particular language, called Gerodam, their Philosophy and Theology, which the Bramens study and read in Universities all over India."—Lucena, Vida do Padre F. Xavier, 95.

1646. "Cette langue correspond à la nostre Latine, parceque les seules Lettrés l'apprennent; il se nomment Guirindans."—Barretto, Rel. de la Prov. de Malabar, 257.

1727. "... their four law-books, Sama Vedom, Urukku Vedom, Edirvarna Vedom, and Adir Vedom, which are all written in the Girandams, and are held in high esteem by the Bramins."—Valentijn, v. (Ceylon), 399.

"Girandam (by others called Kerendum, and also Sanskrits) is the language of the Bramins and the learned."—Ibid., 386.

Guana, s. Or Iguana. This is not properly an Indian term, nor the name of an Indian species, but, as in many other cases, it has been applied by transfer from superficially resembling genera in the new Indies, to the old. The great lizards, sometimes called guanas in India, are apparently monitors. It must be observed, however, that approximating Indian names of lizards have helped the confusion. Thus the large monitor to which the name guana is often applied in India is really called in Hindi goh (Skt. godhā), Singhalese goyā. The true iguana of America is described by Ovidio in the first quotation under the name of iuana.

c. 1535. "There is in this island an animal called Iuana, which is here held to be amphibious (neutrale), i.e. doubtful whether fish or flesh, for it frequents the rivers and climbs the trees as well . . . It is a Serpent, bearing to one who knows it not a horrid and frightful aspect. It has the hands and feet like those of a great lizard, the head much larger, but almost of the same fashion, with a tail 4 or 5 palms in length . . . And the animal, formed as I have described, is much better to eat than to look at," etc.—Ovidio, in Ramusio, iii. f. 156v, 157.

c. 1550. "We also used to catch some four-footed animals called iguane, resembling our lizards in shape . . . the females are most delicate food."—Girolami Benzoni, p. 140.

1634. "De Lacertae quādam specie, Incolis Ligan. Est . . . genus venenosissimum," etc.—Jac. Bontii, Lib. v. cap. 5, p. 57. (See Gecko.)

1673. "Guiana, a Creature like a Crocodile, which Robbers use to lay hold on by their Tails, when they clamber Houses."—Fryer, 116.

1681. Knox, in his Ceylon, speaks of two creatures resembling the Alligator—one called Kobbera guion, 5 or 6 feet long, and not eatable; the other, called tollaguion, very like the former, but "which is eaten, and reckoned excellent meat . . . and I suppose is the same with that which in the W. Indies is called the guiana." (pp. 30, 31). The names are possibly Portuguese, and Kobberaguion may be Cobra-guana.

1704. "The Guano is a sort of Creature, some of which are found on the land, some in the water . . . stewed with a little Spice they make good Broth."—Funnel in Dampier, iv. 51.

1711. "Here are Monkeys, Gaunas, Lissards, large Snakes, and Alligators."—Lockyer, 47.

1780. "They have here an amphibious animal called the guana, a species of the crocodile or alligator, of which soup is made equal to that of turtle. This I take upon hearsay, for it is to me of all others the most loathsome of animals, not less so than the toad."—Munro's Narrative, 36.

c. 1830. "Had I known that I was dining upon a guana, or large wood-lizard, I scarcely think I would have made so hearty a meal."—Tom Cringle (ed. 1863), 178.

1879. "Captain Shaw asked the Imaum of one of the mosques of Malacca about alligator's eggs, a few days ago, and his reply was, that the young that went down to the sea became alligators, and those which came up the river became iguanas."—Bird, Golden Chersonese, 200.

1881. "The chief of Mudhol State belongs to the Bhonslá family . . . The name, however, has been entirely superseded by the second designation of Ghorpade, which is said to have been acquired by one of the family who managed to scale a fort previously deemed impregnable, by fastening a cord around the body of a ghorpad or iguana."—Imperial Gazetteer, vi. 437.

1883. "Who can look on that anachronism, an iguana (I mean the large monitor which Europeans in India generally call an iguana, sometimes a guano!) basking, four feet long, on a sunny bank . . ."—Tribes on My Frontier, 36.

Guardafui, Cape, n.p. The eastern horn of Africa, pointing towards India. We have the name from the Portuguese, and it has been alleged to have been so-called by them as meaning 'Take you heed!' (Gardez-vous, in fact). But this is etymology of the species that so confidently derives 'Bombay' from Boa Bahia. Bruce again (see below) gives dogmatically an interpretation which is equally unfounded.

We must look to history, and not to the 'moral consciousness' of anybody. The country adjoining this horn of Africa, the Regio Aromatum of the ancients, seems to have been called by the Arabs Hafūn, a name which we find in the Periplus in the shape of Opōnē. This name Hafūn was applied to a town, no doubt the true Opōnē, which Barbosa (1516) mentions under the name of Afuni, and it still survives in those of two remarkable promontories, viz. the Peninsula of Rās Hafūn (the Chersonnesus of the Periplus, the Zingis of Ptolemy, the Cape d'Afui and d'Orfui of old maps and nautical directories), and the cape of Jard-Hafūn (or according to the Egyptian pronunciation, Gurd-Hafūn), i.e. Guardafui. The nearest possible meaning of jard that we find is 'a wide or spacious tract of land without herbage.'*

An attempt has been made to connect the name Hafūn with the Arabic af'a, 'pleasant odours.' It would then be the equivalent of the ancient Reg. Aromatum. This is tempting, but very questionable. We should have mentioned that Guardafui is the site of the mart and Promontory of the Spices described by the author of the Periplus as the furthest point and abrupt termination of the continent of Barbarice (or Eastern Africa), towards the Orient (τὸ τῶν Ἀρωμάτων ἐμπορίον καὶ ἀκρωτήριον τελευταῖον τῆς βαρβαρικῆς ἡπείρου πρὸς ἀνατολὴν ἀπόκοπον).

According to C. Müller our Guardafui is called by the natives Rās Aser; their Rās Jardafūn being a point some 12 m. to the south, which on some charts is called Rās Shenarif, and which is also the Tábau of the Periplus (Geog. Gr. Minores, i. 263).

1516. "And that the said ships from his ports (K. of Coulam's) shall not go inwards from the Strait and Cape of Guoardaffuy, nor go to Adem, except when employed in our obedience and service . . . and if any vessel or Zambique is found inward of the Cape of Guoardaffuy it shall be taken as good prize of war."—Treaty between Lopo Soares and the K. of Caulam in Botelho, Tombo, 33.

"After passing this place (Afuni) the next after it is Cape Guardafun, where the coast ends, and trends so as to double towards the Red Sea."—Barbosa, 16.

c. 1530. "This province, called of late

* Since the above was written we see that Capt. Burton (Commentary on Cumœns, iv. 489) interprets jard as = Bay, "from a break in the dreadful granite wall, lately provided by Egypt with a lighthouse." The last statement is unfortunately an error. The intended light seems as far off as ever. We cannot judge of the ground of his interpretation of jard.

Arabia, but which the ancients called Troyloditica, begins at the Red Sea and the country of the Abissines, and finishes at Magadasso . . . others say it extends only to the Cape of Guardafuni."—Sommario de' Regni, in Ramusio, i. f. 325.

1553. "Vicente Sodre, being despatched by the King, touched at the Island of Cocotora, where he took in water, and thence passed to the Cape of Guardafu, which is the most easterly land of Africa."—De Barros, I. vii. cap. 2.

1554. "If you leave Dabul at the end of the season, you direct yourselves W.S.W. till the pole is four inches and an eighth, from thence true west to Kardafūn."—Sidi' Ali Kapudān, The Mohit, in J. As. Soc. Ben., v. 464.

"You find such whirlpools on the coasts of Kardafūn. . . ."—The same, in his narrative, Jour. As., Ser. I. tom. ix. p. 77.

"O Cabo vê já Aromata chamado,
E agora Guardafū, dos moradores,
Onde começa a boca do affamado
Mar Roxo, que do fundo toma as cores."
Camões, x. 97.

Englished by Burton:
"The Cape which Antients 'Aromatic clepe behold, cylept by Moderns Guardafū; where opes the Red Sea mouth, so wide and deep,
the Sea whose ruddy bed lends blushing hue."

1602. "Eitor da Silveira set out, and without any mishap arrived at the Cape of Gardefui."—Couto, IV. i. 4.

1727. "And now having travell'd along the Shore of the Continent, from the Cape of Good Hope to Cape Guardafoy, I'll survey the Islands that lie in the Ethiopian Sea."—A. Ham., i. 15.

1790. "The Portuguese, or Venetians, the first Christian traders in these parts, have called it Gardefui, which has no signification in any language. But in that part of the country where it is situated, it is called Gardefan and means the Straits of Burial, the reason of which will be seen afterwards."—Bruce's Travels, i. 315.

Guava, s. This fruit (Psidium Guayava, L., Ord. Myrtaceae; Span. guayava, Fr. goyavier). Guayabo pomifera Indica of Caspar Bauhin, Guayava of Joh. Bauhin, strangely appears by name in Elliot's translation from Amir Khosrū, who flourished in the 13th century:

"He who has placed only guavas and quinces in his throat, and has never eaten a plantain, will say it is like so much jujube." (iii. 556).

This must be due to some ambiguous word carelessly rendered. The fruit and its name are alike American. It appears to be the guaiabo of Oviedo in his History of the Indies (we use the Italian version in Ramusio, iii. f. 141v).

There is no mention of the guava in either De Orta or Acosta. Āmrūd, which is the commonest Hindustani (Pers.) name for the guava, means properly 'a pear;' but the fruit is often called safurī am, 'journey mango' (respecting which see under Ananas). And this last term is sometimes vulgarly corrupted into supārī am (areca-mango!). In the Deccan the fruit is called (according to Moo-deen Sherif) jām, which is in Bengal the name of the Syzgium jambolanum (see Jamoon), and in Guzerāti jāmrūd, which seems to be a factitious word in imitation of āmrūd.

The guava, though its claims are so inferior to those of the pine-apple (indeed except to stew, or make jelly, it is, nobis judicibus, an utter impostor),* must have spread like that fruit with great rapidity. Both appear in Blochmann's transl. of the Āin (p. 65) as served at Akbar's table; though when the guava is named among the fruits of Tūrān, doubts again arise as to the fruit intended, for the word used, āmrūd, is ambiguous. In 1688 Dampier mentions guavas at Achin, and in Cochin China. The tree, like the custard-apple, has become wild in some parts of India. See Davidson, below.

c. 1550. "The guaiava is like a peach-tree, with a leaf resembling the laurel . . . the red are better than the white, and are well-flavoured."—Girol. Benzoni, p. 88.

1658. There is a good cut of the guava, as guaiaba, in Piso, pp. 152-3.

1673. ". . . Flourish pleasant Tops of Plantains, Coccoes, Guavas, a kind of Pear."—Fryer, 40.

1676. "The N.W. part is full of Guaver Trees of the greatest variety, and their Fruit the largest and best tasted I have met with."—Dampier, ii. 107.

1685. "The Guava . . . when the Fruit is ripe, it is yellow, soft, and very pleasant. It bakes well as a Pear."—Dampier, i. 222.

c. 1750-60. "Our guides too made us distinguish a number of goyava, and especially plumb-trees."—Grose, i. 20.

1764.

"A wholesome fruit the ripened guava yields, Boast of the housewife."

Grainger, Bk. i.

1843. "On some of these extensive plains

* Sir Joseph Hooker annotates: "You never ate good ones!"

(on the Mohur R. in Oudh) we found large orchards of the wild Guava . . . strongly resembling in their rough appearance the pear-trees in the hedges of Worcestershire."—Col. C. J. Davidson, Diary of Travels, ii. 271.

Gubber, s. This is some kind of gold ducat or sequin; Milburn says 'a Dutch ducat.' It may have adopted this special meaning, but could hardly have held it at the date of our first quotation. The name is probably gabr (dīnār-i-gabr), implying its being of infidel origin.

c. 1590. "Mirza Jani Beg Sultān made this agreement with his soldiers, that every one who should bring in an enemy's head should receive 500 gabars, every one of them worth 12 miris . . . of which 72 went to one tanka."—Tārīkh-i-Tāhīrī in Elliot, i. 287.

1711. "Rupees are the most current Coin; they have Venetians, Gubbers, Muggerbees, and Pagodas."—Lockyer, 201.

"When a Parcel of Venetian Ducats are mixt with others the whole goes by the name of Chequeens at Surat, but when they are separated, one sort is called Venetians, and all the others Gubbers indifferently."—Id. 242.

1752. "Gold and Silver Weights :

100 Venetian Ducats	...	11	0	5
10 (100 ?) Gubbers	...	10	17	12 <sup>1</sup>

Brooks, Weights and Measures.

Gubbrow, v. To bully, to dumb-found, and perturb a person. Made from ghabrāo, the imperative of ghabrūnā. The latter, though sometimes used transitively, is more usually neuter, 'to be dumbfounded and perturbed.'

Gudda, s. A donkey, literal and metaphorical. H. gadāhā. The coincidence of the Scotch cuddy has been attributed to a loan from Hindi through the gypsies, who were the chief owners of the animal in Scotland, where it is not common. On the other hand, this is ascribed to a nickname Cuddy (for Cuthbert), like the English Neddy, similarly applied. A Punjab proverbial phrase is gadōh khurkī, "Donkeys' rubbing" their sides together, a sort of 'claw me and I'll claw thee.'

Guddy, Guddee, s. Hind. gaddī, Mahr. gādī. 'The Throne.' Properly it is a cushion, a throne in the Oriental sense, i.e. the seat of royalty, "a simple sheet, or mat, or carpet on the floor, with a large cushion or pillow at the head, against which the great man reclines" (Wilson). "To be placed on the guddee" is to succeed to the kingdom. The word is also used for the pad placed on an elephant's back.

Gudge, s. Pers. H. gaz, and corr. gaj; a Persian yard measure or thereabouts; but in India applied to measures of very varying lengths, from the hāt, or natural cubit, to the English yard.

In the Āin, Abu'l Fazl details numerous gaz which had been in use under the Caliphs or in India, varying from 18 inches English (as calculated by J. Prinsep) to 52½. The Ilāhī gaz of Akbar was intended to supersede all these as a standard; and as it was the basis of all records of land-measurements and rents in Upper India, the determination of its value was a subject of much importance when the revenue surveys were undertaken about 1824. The results of inquiry were very discrepant, however, and finally an arbitrary value of 33 inches was assumed. The bighā (see Beegah) based on this, and containing 3600 square gaz =  $\frac{2}{3}$  of an acre, is the standard in the N.W.P., but statistics are always now rendered in acres. See Gladwin's Ayeen (1800) i. 302, seqq., and Prinsep's Useful Tables, Thomas's ed., 122.

1814. They have no measures but the gudge, which is from their elbow to the end of the middle finger, for measuring length."—Pearce, Acc. of the Ways of the Abyssinians, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo., ii. 56.

Guicowar, n.p. Gāekwār, the title of the Mahratta kings of Guzerat, descended from Dāmāji and Pilāji Gaekwār, who rose to distinction among Mahratta warriors in the second quarter of last century. The word means 'Cowherd.'

Guinea-fowl, s. There seems to have been in the 16th century some confusion between turkeys and Guinea-fowl. See however under Turkey.

Guinea-cloths, Guinea-stuffs. Apparently these were piece-goods bought in India to be used in the West African trade.

1726. We find in a list of cloths purchased by the Dutch Factory at Por.o Novo, Guinees Lywaat, and Negros Kleederen ('Guinea linens and Negro's clothing').—See Valentijn, Chorum. 9.

1813. "The demand for Surat piece-goods has been much decreased in Europe . . . and from the abolition of the slave trade, the demand for the African market has been much reduced . . . Guinea stuffs, 4½ yards each (per ton) 1200 (pieces).—Milburn, i. 289.

Guinea-pig, s. This was a nickname given to midshipmen or apprentices on board Indianmen in the last century, when the command of such a vessel was a sure fortune, and large fees were paid to the captain with whom the youngsters embarked. Admiral Smyth, in his Sailor's Handbook, 1867, defines: 'The younger midshipmen of an Indianman.'

Guinea-worm, s. A parasitic worm (Filaria Medinensis) inhabiting the subcutaneous cellular tissue of man, frequently in the leg, varying from 6 inches to 12 feet in length; and common on the Pers. Gulf, in Upper Egypt, Guinea, &c.

The reason of the name is shown by the quotation from Purchas, respecting its prevalence in Guinea.

The disease is graphically described by Agatharchides in the first quotation.

B.C. c. 113. "Those about the Red Sea who are stricken with a certain malady, as Agatharchides relates, besides being afflicted with other novel and unheard-of symptoms, of which one is that small snake-like worms (δρακόντια μικρά) eat through the legs and arms, and peep out, but when touched instantly shrink back again, and winding among the muscles produce intolerable burning pains."—In Dubner's ed. of Plutarch, iv. 872, viz. Table Discussions, Bk. VIII. Quest. ix. 3.

1600. "The wormes in the legges and bodies trouble not every one that goeth to those Countreys, but some are troubled with them and some are not" (a full account of the disease follows).—Descn. of Guinea, in Purchas, ii. 963.

c. 1630. "But for their water . . . I may call it Aqua Mortis . . . it ingenders small long worms in the legges of such as use to drink it . . . by no potion, no unguent to be remedied: they have no other way to destroy them, save by rowling them about a pin or peg, not unlike the treble of Theorbo.—Sir T. Herbert. p. 128.

1664. ". . . nor obliged to drink of those naughty waters . . . full of nastiness of so many people and beasts . . . that do cause such fevers, which are very hard to cure, and which breed also certain very dangerous worms in the legs . . . they are commonly of the bigness and length of a small Vial-string . . . and they must be drawn out little by little, from day to day, gently winding them about a little twig about the bigness of a needle, for fear of breaking them."—Bernier, E. T. 114.

1676. "Guinea Worms are very frequent in some Places of the West Indies . . . I rather judge that they are generated by drinking bad water."—Dampier, ii. 89, 90.

1768. "The less dangerous diseases which attack Europeans in Guinea are, the dry belly-ache, and a worm which breeds in the flesh . . . Dr. Rouppé observes that the disease of the Guinea-worm is infectious."—Lind on Diseases of Hot Climates, pp. 53, 54.

Gupputty, n.p. See Cospetir.

Gum-gum, s. We had supposed this word to be an invention of the late Charles Dickens, but it seems to be a real Indian, or Anglo-Indian word. The nearest approximation in Shakespear's Dict. is gamak, 'sound of the kettledrum.' But the word is perhaps a Malay plural of gong originally; see the quotation from Osebeck.

c. 1750-60. "A music far from delightful, consisting of little drums they call Gum-gums, cymbals, and a sort of fife."—Grose, i. 139.

1771. "At night we heard a sort of music, partly made by insects, and partly by the noise of the Gungung."—Osebeck, i. 185.

1836. "'Did you ever hear a tom-tom, Sir?' sternly enquired the Captain . . . 'A what?' asked Hardy, rather taken aback.

'A tom-tom.'

'Never!'

'Nor a gum-gum?'

'Never!'

'What is a gum-gum?' eagerly enquired several young ladies."—Sketches by Boz, The Steam Excursion.

Gunjā, s. Hind. gānjhā. The flowering or fruiting shoots of the female plant of Indian hemp (Cannabis sativa, L., formerly distinguished as C. indica), used as an intoxicant. See Bhang.

1874. "In odour and the absence of taste, ganjā resembles bhang. It is said that after the leaves which constitute bhang have been gathered, little shoots sprout from the stem, and that these, picked off and dried, form what is called ganjā."—Hambury & Flückiger, 493.

Gunny, Gunny-bag, s. From Sansk. goni, 'a sack;' Hind. and Mahr. gon, goni, 'a sack, sacking.' The popular and trading name of the coarse sacking and sacks made from the fibre of jute (q.v.), much used in all Indian trade. Tāt is a common Hindī name for the stuff.

c. 1590. "Sircar Ghoraghat produces raw silk, gunneys, and plenty of Tanghion horses."—Gladwin's Ayeen (ed. 1800) ii. 9.

But here, in the original, the term is pārchañ-i-tāṭband.

1693. "Besides the aforementioned articles Goeny-sacks are collected at Palicol."—Havart (3), 14.

1711. "When Sugar is pack'd in double Goneys, the outer Bag is always valued in Contract at 1 or  $1\frac{1}{2}$  Shahes."—Lockyer, 244.

1726. In a list of goods procurable at Daatzerom :

"Goeni-zakken (Gunny bags)."—Valentijn, Chor. 40.

1727. "Shildon . . . put on board some rotten long Pepper, that he could dispose of no other Way, and some damaged Gunnies, which are much used in Persia for embalming Goods, when they are good in their kind."—A. Ham. ii. 15.

1764. "Baskets, Gunny bags, and dubbers . . . Rs. 24."—In Long, 384.

1785. "We enclose two parwanehs . . . directing them each to despatch 1000 goomies of grain to that person of mighty degree."—Tippoo's Letters, 171.

Gup, s. Idle gossip. Pers. Hind. gap, 'prattle, tattle.' The word is perhaps an importation from Tūran. Vámbéry gives Orient. Turki gep, geb, 'word, saying, talk;' which, however, Pavet de Courteille suggests to be a corruption from the Pers. guftan, 'to say;' of which, indeed, there is a form guptan. See quotation from Schuyler showing the use in Turkestan. The word is perhaps best known in England through an unamiable account of society in S. India, published under the name of "Gup," in 1868.

1809-10. "They (native ladies) sit on their cushions from day to day, with no other . . . amusement than hearing the 'gup-gup,' or gossip of the place."—Mrs. Sherwood's Autobiog. 357.

1876. "The first day of mourning goes by the name of gup, i.e. commemorative talk."—Schuyler's Turkestan, i. 151.

Gureebpurwur, and Gurreebnuwauz, ss. Arabo-Pers. Gharīḇparwar and Gharīḇnawāz, used in H. as respectful terms of address, meaning respectively 'Provider of the Poor!' 'Cherisher of the Poor!'

1726. "Those who are of equal condition bend the body somewhat towards each other, and some lay hold of each other by the beard, saying Grab-anemoas, i.e. I wish you the prayers of the poor."—Valentijn, Choro. 109.

1824. "I was appealed to loudly by both parties; the soldiers calling on me as 'Ghureeb purwat,' the Goomashta, not to be outdone, exclaiming, 'Donai, Lord Sahib! Donai! Rajah!'" (Read Dohāi and see Doai).—Heber, i. 266. See also p. 279.

Gurjaut, n.p. The popular and official name of certain forest tracts at the back of Orissa. The word is a hybrid, being the Hind. garh, 'a fort,' Persianised into a plural garhjāt, in ignorance of which we have seen, in quasi-official documents, the use of a further English plural, Gurjauts or garhjats, which is like 'fortresses.'

This manner of denominating such tracts from the isolated occupation by fortified posts appears to be very ancient in that part of India. We have in Ptolemy and the Periplus Dosarēnē or Ḍosarēnē, apparently representing Sansk. Daśārṇa, quasi daśan ṛiṇa, 'having Ten Forts,' which the lists of the Bṛhat Samhitā shew us in this part of India (J. R. As. Soc., N.S., v. 83). The forest tract behind Orissa is called in the grant of an Orissa king, Nava Koti, 'the Nine Forts' (J. A. S. B., xxxiii., 84); and we have, in this region, further in the interior, the province of Chattisgarh = 36 Forts.

Gurry.

a. A little fort; Hind. garhī. Also Gurr, i.e. garh, 'a fort.'

b. See Ghurry.

1693. "... many of his Heathen Nobles, only such as were befriended by strong Gurrs, or Fastnesses upon the Mountains ..."—Fryer, 165.

1786. "... The Zemindars in 4 pergunnahs are so refractory as to have forfeited (read fortified) themselves in their gurries, and to refuse all payments of revenue."—Articles against W. Hastings in Burke, vii. 59.

Gutta Percha, s. This is the Malay name Gatuk Pertja, i.e. 'Sap of the Percha,' Dichopsis Gutta, Benth. (Isonandra Gutta, Hooker; N.O. Sapotaceae). Dr. Oxley writes (in the J. Ind. Archip., i. p. 22) that percha is properly the name of a tree which produces a spurious article; the real gutta p. is produced by the tābau. The product was first brought to notice in 1843 by Dr. Montgomery. It is collected by first ringing the tree and then felling it, and no doubt by this process the article will speedily become extinct.

The history of G. P. is however far from well known. Several trees are known to contribute to the exported article; their juices being mixt together.

Guzzy, s. Pers. and Hind. gazī; perhaps from its having been woven of a gaz in breadth (see Gudge). A very poor kind of cotton cloth.

1701. In a price list for Persia we find: "Gesjes Bengaals."—Valentijn, v. 303.

1784. "It is suggested that the following Articles may be proper to compose the first adventure (to Tibet): . . . Guzzie, or coarse Cotton Cloths, and Otterskins . . ."—In Seton-Karr, i. 4.

Gyaul (properly Gayāl), s. A large animal (Gavaeus frontalis, Jerd.) of the ox tribe, found wild in various forest tracts to the east of India. It is domesticated by the Mishmis of the Assam valley, and other tribes as far south as Chittagong. In Assam it is called Mithan.

1824. "In the park several uncommon animals are kept. Among them the Ghyal, an animal of which I had not, to my recollection, read any account, though the name was not unknown to me. It is a very noble creature, of the ox or buffalo kind, with immensely large horns. . ."—Heber, i. 34.

Gyelong, s. A Buddhist priest in Tibet. Tib. dGe-sLong, i.e. 'beggar of virtue,' i.e. a bhikṣu or mendicant friar (see under Buxee); but latterly a priest who has received the highest orders. See Jaescheke, p. 86.

1784. "He was dressed in the festival habit of a gylong or priest, being covered with a scarlet satin cloak, and a gilded mitre on his head."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 25.

Gym-Khana, s. This word is quite modern, and was unknown 25 years ago. The first use of it that we can trace is (on the authority of Major John Trotter) at Rürki in 1861, when a gym-khana was instituted there. It is a factitious word, invented, we believe, in the Bombay Presidency, and probably based upon gend-khāna ('ball-house'), the name usually given in Hind. to an English racket-court. It is applied to a place of public resort at a station, where the needful facilities for athletics and games of sorts are provided, including (when that was in fashion) a skating-rink, a lawn-tennis ground, and so forth. The gym may have been simply a corruption of gend shaped by gymnastics. The word is also applied to a meeting for such sports; and in this sense it has travelled already as far as Malta.

1877. "Their proposals are that the Cricket Club should include in their programme the games, &c., proposed by the promoters of a gymkhana Club, so far as not to interfere with cricket, and should join in making a rink and lawn-tennis, and badminton courts, within the cricket-ground enclosure."—Pioneer Mail, Nov. 3.

1879. "Mr. A— F— can always be depended on for epigram, but not for accuracy. In his letters from Burma he talks of the Gymkhana at Rangoon as a sort of établissement [sic] where people have pleasant little dinners. In the 'Oriental Arcadia,' which Mr. F— tells us is flavoured with naughtiness, people may do strange things, but they do not dine at *Gym khana*s."—Do., Do., July 2nd.

1881. "R. E. Gymkhana at Malta, for Polo and other Ponies, 20th June, 1881."—Heading in Royal Engineer Journal, Aug. 1st, p. 159.

1883. "I am not speaking of Bombay people with their clubs and gymkhanas and other devices for oiling the wheels of existence. . . ."—Tribes on My Frontier, 9.

Gyne, s. H. Gainā. A very diminutive kind of ox bred in Bengal. It is, when well cared for, a beautiful creature, is not more than 3 feet high, and affords excellent meat. It is mentioned by Aelian :

c. 250. "There are other bullocks in India, which to look at are no bigger than the largest goats; these also are yoked, and run very swiftly."—De Nat. Anim., xv. 24.

c. 1590. "There is also a species of oxen called gaini, small like gūt horses (see Goont), but very beautiful."—Ain, i. 149.

H.

Hackery, s. In the Bengal Presidency this word is now applied only to the common native bullock-cart used in the slow draught of goods and materials. But formerly in Bengal, as still in Western India and Ceylon, the word was applied to lighter carriages (drawn by bullocks) for personal transport.

Though the word is used by Englishmen almost universally in India, it is unknown to natives, or if known is regarded as an English term; and its origin is exceedingly obscure. The word seems to have originated on the west side of India, where we find it in our earliest quotations. It is probably one of those numerous words which were long in use, and undergoing corruption by illiterate soldiers and sailors, before they appeared in any kind of literature.

Wilson suggests a probable Portuguese origin, e.g. from acarretar, to convey in a cart. And the word may have been shaped by the existence of the Hind. words hānā, 'to drive,' hakānā, 'to drive (oxen),' &c. But these are mere suggestions, for we have found no evidence.*

In Broughton's Letters from a Malratta Camp (p. 156) the word hackery is used for what is in Upper India commonly called an Ekka (q.v.) or light native pony-carriage; but this is an exceptional application.

1673. "The Coach wherein I was breaking, we were forced to mount the Indian Hackery, a Two-wheeled Chariot, drawn by swift little Oxen."—Fryer, 83.

1690. "Their Hackeries likewise, which are a Kind of Coach, with two Wheels, are all drawn by Oxen."—Ovington, 254.

1711. "The Streets (at Surat) are wide and commodious; otherwise the Hackerys, which are very common, would be an Inconvenience. These are a sort of Coaches drawn by a Pair of Oxen."—Lockyer, 259.

1742. "The bridges are much worn, and out of repair, by the number of Hackeries and other carriages which are continually passing over them."—In Wheeler, iii. 262.

1756. "The 11th of July the Nawab arrived in the city, and with him Bundoo Sing, to whose house we were removed that afternoon in a hackery."—Holwell, in Wheeler's Early Records, 249.

c. 1760. The hackrees are a conveyance drawn by oxen, which would at first give an idea of slowness that they do not deserve . . . they are open on three sides, covered a-top, and are made to hold two people sitting cross-legged."—Grose, i. 155-156.

1780. "A hackery is a small covered carriage upon two wheels, drawn by bullocks, and used generally for the female part of the family."—Hodges, Travels, 5.

1798. "At half-past six o'clock we each

* It is possible that the mere Portuguese article and noun "a carreta" might have produced the Anglo-Indian hackery. Thus in Correa, under 1513, we have a description of the Surat hackeries: "and the carriages (as carretas) in which he and the Portuguese travelled were elaborately wrought, and furnished with silk hangings, covering them from the sun; and these carriages (as carretas) run so smoothly (the country consisting of level plains) that the people travelling in them sleep as tranquilly as on the ground."—ii. 369.

† For these swift oxen see also Forbes below, and Aelian de N.A. quoted under gyne.

got into a hackeray."—Stavorinus, tr. by Wilcocks, iii. 295.

1811. Solvyns draws and describes the Hackery in the modern Bengal sense.

1813. "Travelling in a light hackaree, at the rate of five miles an hour."—Forbes, Or. Mem., iii. 376.

Forbes's engraving represents such an ox-carriage as would be called in Bengal a bauli. (See Bylee in Suppl.).

1829. "The genuine vehicle of the country is the hackery. This is a sort of wee tent, covered more or less with tinsel and scarlet, and bells and gilding, and placed upon a clumsy two-wheeled carriage with a pole that seems to be also a kind of boot, as it is at least a foot deep. This is drawn by a pair of white bullocks."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed., 84.

1860. "Native gentlemen, driving fast trotting oxen in little hackery carts, hastened home from it."—Tenney's Ceylon, ii. 140.

Hadgee, s. Ar. Hājī, a pilgrim to Mecca; from hajj, the pilgrimage, or visit to a venerated spot. Hence Hājī and Hāji used colloquially in Persian and Turkish.*

1765. "Hodgee acquired this title from his having in his early years made a pilgrimage to Hodge (or the tomb of Mahommed at Mecca)."—Hotwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 59.

Hákim, s. Hind. from Ar. hākīm, a judge, a ruler, or master; 'the authority.'

The same Arab. root hakm, 'bridling, restraining, judging,' supplies a variety of words occurring in this Glossary, viz.

Hākīm (as here).

Hākīm (see Huckeem).

Fukm (see Hookum).

Hikmat (see Hickmut).

1698. "Hackum, a Governor."—Fryer's Index-Explanatory.

c. 1861.

"Then comes a settlement Hakim, to teach me to plough and weed—

I sowed the cotton he gave me—but first I boiled the seed. . . ."

A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

Halálcore, s. Literally Arab. Pers. halál-khor, 'one who eats what is lawful,' applied euphemistically to a person of very low caste, a sweeper or scavenger, perhaps as implying 'to whom all is lawful food.' Generally used as synonymous with bungy, q.v.

1623. "Sciah Selim nel principio . . . si sdegnò tanto, che poco mancò che per dispetto non la desse per forza in matrimonio ad uno della razza che chiamano halal chor, quasi dica 'mangia lecito,' cioè che ha per lecito di mangiare ogni cosa . . ." (See other quotation under harem).—P. della Valle, ii. 525.

1638. ". . . sont obligez de se purifier depuis la teste i'usqu'aux pieds si quelqu'un de ces gens qu'ils appellent Alchores, leur a touché."—Mandelslo, Paris, 1659, 219.

1665. "Ceux qui ne parlent que Persan dans les Indes, les appellent Halalcour, c'est à dire celui qui se donne la liberté de manger de tout ce qu'il lui plaît, ou, selon quelques uns, celui qui mange ce qu'il a légitimement gagné. Et ceux qui approuvent cette dernière explication, disent qu'autrefois Halalcours s'appellent Harancours, mangeurs de Viande defenduës."—Theriot, v. 190.

1673. "That they should be accounted the Offshoot of the People, and as base as the Holencores (whom they account so, because they defile themselves by eating anything)."—Fryer, 28.

1690. "The Halalchors . . . are another Sort of Indians at Suratt, the most contemptible, but extremely necessary to be there."—Orington, 382.

1783. "That no Hollocore, Derah, or Chandala caste, shall upon any consideration come out of their houses after 9 o'clock in the morning, lest they should taint the air, or touch the superior Hindoos in the streets."—Mahratta Proclamation at Baroch, in Forbes, Or. Mem., iv. 232.

1786. "When all my schoolfellows and youthful compeers (those misguided few excepted who joined, to use a Gentoo phrase, the hallachores of the human race) were striking off with eager hope and earnest intent, in some one or other of the many paths of busy life, I was 'standing idle in the market-place.'"—Letter of Robert Burns, in A. Cunningham's ed. of Works and Life, vi. 63.

1788. The Indian Vocabulary also gives Hallachore.

1810. "For the meaner offices we have a Hallalcor or Chandela (one of the most wretched Pariahs)."—Maria Graham, 31.

Halállecur. V. used in the imperative for infinitive, as is common in the Anglo-Indian use of Hind. verbs, being Ar. H. halál-kar, 'make lawful,' i.e. put (an animal) to death in the manner prescribed to Mahommedans, when it is to be used for food.

Note by Prof. Robertson Smith.—There is current confusion about the word hājī. It is originally the participle of hajj, 'he went on the hajj.' But in modern usage hājī is used as part., and hājī is the title given to one who has made the pilgrimage. When this is prefixed to a name, the double j cannot be pronounced without inserting a short vowel and the a is shortened; thus you say "al-Hājī Soleimān," or the like. The incorrect form Hājī is however used by Turks and Persians.

1883. "The diving powers of the poor duck are exhausted. . . . I have only . . . to seize my booty, which has just enough of life left to allow Peer Khan to make it halal, by cutting its throat in the name of Allah, and dividing the webs of its feet."—Tribes on My Frontier, 167.

Half-caste, s. A person of mixt European and Indian blood.

1789. "Mulattoes, or as they are called in the East Indies, half-casts."—Munro's Narrative, 51.

1793. "They (the Mahratta Infantry) are commanded by half-cast people of Portuguese and French extraction, who draw off the attention of the spectators from the bad clothing of their men, by the profusion of antiquated lace bestowed on their own."—Dirom, Narrative, 11.

1809. "The Padre, who is a half-cast Portuguese, informed me that he had three districts under him."—Ld. Valentia, i. 329.

1828. "An invalid sergeant . . . came, attended by his wife, a very pretty young half-caste."—Heber, i. 298.

1875. "Othello is black—the very tragedy lies there; the whole force of the contrast, the whole pathos and extenuation of his doubts of Desdemona, depend on this blackness. Fechter makes him a half-caste."—G. H. Lewes, On Actors and the Art of Acting.

Hanger, s. The word in this form is not in Anglo-Indian use, but (with the Scotch whinger, old Eng. whinyard, Fr. cangiar, &c., other forms of the same) may be noted here as a corruption of the Arab. khanjar, 'a dagger or short falchion.' This (vulg. cunjur) is the Indian form. The khanjar in India is a large double-edged dagger with a very broad base and a slight curve.

1574. "Patrick Spreull . . . being per-sewit be Johne Boill Chapman . . . in invading of him, and stryking him with a quhinger . . . through the quhilk the said Johnes neis wes woundit to the effusoun of his blude."—Exts. from Records of the Burgh of Glasgow (1876), p. 2.

1601. "The other day I happened to enter into some discourse of a hanger, which I assure you, both for fashion and workmanship was most peremptory beautiful and gentlemanlike. . . ."—B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, i. 4.

1672. ". . . il s'estoit emporté contre elle jusqu'à un tel excès qu'il luy avoit porté quelques coups de Cangiar dans les mamelles. . . ."—Journal d'Ant. Galland, i. 177.

1673. ". . . handjar de diamants. . . ."—App. to do. ii. 189.

"His pistol next he cock'd anew
And out his nutbrown whinyard drew."
Hudibras, Canto iii.

1781. "I fancy myself now one of the most formidable men in Europe; a blunderbuss for Joe, a pair of double barrels to stick in my belt, and a cut and thrust hanger with a little pistol in the hilt, to hang by my side."—Lord Minto, in Life, i. 56.

"Lost out of a buggy on the Road between Barnagur and Calcutta, a steel mounted Hanger with a single guard."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, June 30.

1883. ". . . by farrashes, the carpet-spreader class, a large cangjar, or curved dagger, with a heavy ivory handle, is carried; less for use than as a badge of office."—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.

Hansil, s. A hawzer, from the English (Roeback).

Hanspeek, Uspuck, &c., s. Sea Hind. Aspak. A handspike, from the English.

Harakiri, s. This, the native name of the Japanese rite of suicide committed as a point of honour or substitute for judicial execution, has long been interpreted as "happy despatch," but what the origin of this curious error is we do not know. The real meaning is realistic in the extreme, viz., hara = 'belly,' kiri = 'cut.'

1616. "Here we had news how Galsa Same was to passe this way to morrow to goe to a church near Miaco, called Coyo; som say to cut his bellie, others say to be shaved a prist and to remeane theare the rest of his daies."—Cocks's Diary, i. 164.

1617. "The King demanded 800 tais from Shosque Dono, or else to cut his belly, whoe, not having it to pay, did it."—Ibid. 337, see also ii. 202.

Haramzada, s. A scoundrel; literally 'misbegotten'; a common term of abuse. It is Arabo-Persian ḥarām-zāda, 'son of the unlawful.' Ḥarām is from a root signifying sacer (see under harem), and which appears as Hebrew in the sense of devoting to destruction, and of 'a ban.' Thus in Numbers xxi. 3: "They utterly destroyed them and their cities; and he called the name of the place Hormah."

Harem, s. Ar. ḥaram and ḥarīm, i.e. sacer, applied especially to women of the family and their apartment. This word is not now commonly used in India; zenana (q.v.) being the common word for 'the women of a family' or their apartments.

1623. "Non so come sciah Selim ebbe notizia di lei e s'innamorò. Volle condurla nel suo haram o gynaecio, e tenerla quivi appresso di sè come una delle altre concubine; ma questa donna (Nurmahal) che era sopra modo astuta . . . ricusò."—F. della Valle, ii. 525.

1630. "This Duke here and in other seralios (or Harams as the Persians term them) has above 300 concubines."—Herbert, 139.

1676. "In the midst of the large Gallery is a Nich in the Wall, into which the King descends out of his Haram by a private pair of Stairs."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 49.

1726. "On the Ganges also lies a noble fortress, with the Palace of the old Emperor of Hindostan, with his Hharaam or women's apartment. . ."—Valentijn, v. 168.

Harry, s. This word is quite obsolete. Wilson gives Hārī as Beng. 'A servant of the lowest class, a sweeper.' But in two out of our three quotations harry is applied to a woman, in one case employed to carry water. The third is doubtful. A female servant of this description is not now known among English families in Bengal.

c. 1753. Among the expenses of the Mayor's Court at Calcutta we find: "A harry . . . Rs. 1."—Long, 43.

c. 1754. "A Harry or water-wench . . ." (at Madras).—Ives, 50.

"In a tariff of wages recommended by the "Zemindars of Calcutta," we have: "Harry-woman to a Family . . . 2 Rs."—In Seton Karr, i. 95.

1781. "2 Harries or Sweepers . . . 6 Rs.

2 Beesties . . . 8 Rs."

Establishment . . . under the Chief Magistrate of Banaris, in Appendix to Narrative of Insurrection there, Calcutta, 1782.

Hatty, s. H. hāthī, the most common word for an elephant. From the Sansk. hasta, 'the hand,' and hastī, 'the elephant,' i.e. 'the creature with a hand,' come the H. words hāth and hāthī, with the same meanings. The analogy of the elephant's trunk to the hand presents itself to Pliny:

"Mandunt ore; spirant et bibunt odoranturque haud inproprie appellatā manu."—viii. 10.

and to Tennyson:

" . . . camels knelt
Unbidden, and the brutes of mountain back
That carry kings in castles, bow'd black knees
Of homage, ringing with their serpent hands,

To make her smile, her golden ankle-bells."
—Merlin and Vivien.

c. 1526. "As for the animals peculiar to Hindustān, one is the elephant, as the Hindustānis call it Hathi, which inhabits the district of Kalpi, the more do the wild elephants increase in number. That is the tract in which the elephant is chiefly taken."—Baber, 315.

This notice of Baber's shows how remarkably times have changed. No elephants now exist anywhere near the region indicated.

Hattyhook, s. Hāthchuk; servant's and gardener's Hind. for artichoke. This is worth producing, because our word is itself the corruption of an Oriental word thus carried back to the East in mangled form. See Artichoke.

a. Hind. hāth (the hand or forearm, and thence) 'a cubit,' from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger; a measure of 18 inches, and sometimes more.

b. Hind. hāth, a market held on certain days.

Havildar, s. Hind. havildār. A sepy non-commissioned officer, corresponding to a sergeant, and wearing the chevrons of a sergeant. This, dating from about the middle of the last century, is the only modern use of the term in that form. It is a corruption of Pers. hawāludār or hawāldār, one holding an office of trust; and in this form it had, in other times, a variety of applications to different charges and subordinate officers. Thus among the Mahrattas the commandant of a fort was so styled; whilst in Eastern Bengal the term was, and perhaps still is, applied to the holder of a hawāla, an intermediate tenure between those of zemindar and ryot.

1673. "We landed at about Nine in the Morning, and were civilly treated by the Customer in his Choultry, till the Havildar could be acquainted of my arrival."—Fryer, 123.

1696. " . . . the havildar of St. Thomé and Pulecat."—Wheeler, i. 308.

1824. "Curreen Musseeh was, I believe, a havildar in the Company's army, and his sword and sash were still hung up, with a not unpleasing vanity, over the desk where he now presided as catechist."—Heber, i. 149.

Hazree, s. This word is commonly used in Anglo-Indian households in the Bengal Presidency for 'breakfast.' It is not clear how it got this meaning. It is properly hāzīrī, 'muster,' from the Ar. hāzīr, 'ready' or 'present.' See Chota hazry.

Hendry Kendry, n.p. Two islands off the coast of the Concan, about 7 m. south of the entrance to Bombay Harbour, and now belonging to Kolāba District. The names, according to Ph. Anderson, are Haneri and Khaneri; in the Army. chart they are Oonari, and Khundari. They are also variously written (the one) Hundry, Onderu, Hunarey, Henery, and (the other) Kundra, Cundry, Cunarey, Kenery. The real names are given in the Bombay Gazetteer as Underi and Khanderi. Both islands were piratically occupied as late as the beginning of this century. Khanderi passed to us in 1818 as part of the Peshwa's territory; Underi lapsed in 1840.

1673. "These Islands are in number seven; viz. Bombaim, Canorein, Trumbay, Elephanto, the Putachoes, Munchumbay, and Kerenjau, with the Rock of Henry Kenry . . ."—Fryer, 61.

1681. "Although we have formerly wrote you that we will have no war for Hendry Kendry, yet all war is so contrary to our constitution, as well as our interest, that we cannot too often inculcate to you our aversion thereunto."—Court of Directors to Surat, quoted in Anderson's Western India, p. 175.

1727. "... four Leagues south of Bombay, are two small Islands, Undra and Cundra. The first has a Fortress belonging to the Sedee, and the other is fortified by the Sevaje, and is now in the Hands of Connajee Angria."—A. Ham, i. 243.

c. 1760. "At the harbor's mouth lie two small fortified rocks, called Henara and Canara . . . These were formerly in the hands of Angria, and the Siddes, or Moors, which last have long been dispossessed of them."—Grose, i. 58.

Herbed, s. A Parsee priest, not specially engaged in priestly duties. Pers. hurbat, from Pahlavi aērpāt.

1630. "The Herbood or ordinary Churchman."—Lord's Display, ch. viii.

Hickmat, s. Ar. H. hikmat; an ingenious device or contrivance. See under Hakim.

Hidgelee, n.p. The tract so-called was under native rule a chakla, or district, of Orissa; and under our rule formerly a zilla of Bengal, but now it is a part of Midnapur Zilla, of which it constitutes the S.E. portion, viz., the low coast lands on the west side of the Hoogly estuary, and below the junction of the Rupnarayan. The name is properly Hijili; but it has gone through many strange phases in European records.

1553. "The first of these rivers (from the E. side of the Ghauts) rises from two sources to the east of Chaul, about 15 leagues distant, and in an altitude of 18 to 19 degrees. The river from the most northerly of these sources is called Crusna, and the more southerly Benkora, and when they combine they are called Ganga; and this river discharges into the illustrious stream of the Ganges between the two places called Angeli and Picholda in about 22 degrees."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1586. "An haven which is called Angeli in the Country of Orixā."—Fitch, in Hakl, ii. 389.

1686. "Chanock, on the 15th December (1686) . . . burned and destroyed all the magazines of salt, and granaries of rice, which he found in the way between Hughley and the island of Ingelee."—Orme (reprint), ii. 12.

1726. "Hingeli."—Valentijn, v. 153.

1727. "... Inhabited by Fishers, as are also Ingellie and Kidgerie, two neighbouring Islands on the West Side of the Mouth of the Ganges."—A. Ham, i. 275.

1758. In apprehension of a French Fleet the Select Committee at Port William recommend: "That the pagoda at Ingellie should be washed black, the great tree at the place cut down, and the buoys removed."—In Long, 153.

1784. "Ships laying at Kedgerie, Ingellee, or any other parts of the great River."—In Seton-Karr, i. 37.

Hilsa, s. Hind. hilsā. A rich and savoury fish of the shad kind (Clupea ilisha, Day), called in books the 'sable-fish,' (a name, from the Port. savel, quite obsolete in India) and on the Indus pulla (palla). The large shad, which of late has been commonly sold by London fishmongers in the beginning of summer, is very near the hilsa but not so rich. The hilsa is a sea-fish, ascending the river to spawn, and is taken as high as Dehli on the Jumna, as high as Mandalay on the Irawadi (Day). It is also taken in the Guzerat rivers, though not in the short and shallow streams of the Concan, nor in the Deccan rivers, from which last it seems excluded by the rocky obstructions. It is the special fish of Sind under the name of palla, and monopolizes the name of fish, just as salmon does on Scotch rivers (Dr. Macdonald's Acct. of Bombay Fisheries, 1883).

1539. "... A little Island, called Apo-fingua (Ape-Fingan) ... inhabited by poor people who live by the fishing of shads (que vive de la pescaria dos saveis).<sup>5</sup>—Pinto (orig. cap. xviii.), Cogan, p. 22.

1613. "Na quella costa marittima occidental de Viontana (Ujong-Tana, Malay Peninsula) habitavão Saletes pescadores que não tinham outro tratto ... salvo de sua pescaria de saveis, donde so aproveitão das ovas chamado Turabos passados por salmeura."—Eredia de Godinho, 22.

1810. "The hilsah (or sable-fish) seems to be midway between a mackerel and a salmon."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 154-5.

1813. Forbes calls it the sable or salmon-fish, and says "it a little resembles the European fish (salmon) from which it is named."—Or. Mem. i. 53.

1824. "The fishery, we were told by these people, was of the 'Hilsa' or 'Sable-fish.'"—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 81.

Himalāya, n.p. This is the common pronunciation of the name of the great range "Whose snowy ridge the roving Tartar bounds," properly Himālāya, 'the Abode of Snow'; also called Himavat, 'The Snowy'; Himagiri and Himaśaila; Himādri, Himakūta, etc., from various forms of which the ancients made Imaus, Emodus, etc. Pliny had got somewhere the true meaning of the name: "... a montibus Hemodis, quorum promontorium Imaus vocatur nivosum significante. ..." (vi. 17). We do not know how far back the use of the modern name is to be found. We do not find it in Baber, who gives Siwālak as the Indian name of the mountains (see Siwalic). The oldest occurrence we know is in the Āin, which gives in the Geographical Tables, under the Third Climate, Koh-i-Himālāh (orig. ii. 36.) This is disguised in Gladwin's version by a wrong reading into Kerdehmaleh (ed. 1800, ii. 367).* This form (Him-maleh) is used by Major Rennell, but hardly as if it was yet a familiar term.

* Hemachal and Hemakūt also occur in the Āin (see Gladwin, ii. 342, 343). Karāchal is the name used by Ibn Batūta in the 14th century, and by Al-Bīrūnī 300 years earlier. 17th century writers often call the Himālāya the "Mountains of Nugger-Cote" (q.v.).

In Elphinstone's Letters Himāleh or some other spelling of that form is always used (see below). When we get to Bishop Heber we find Himalaya the established English form.

1822. "What pleases me most is the contrast between your present enjoyment, and your former sickness and despondency. Depend upon it England will turn out as well as Hemaleh."—Elphinstone to Major Close, in Life, ii. 139, see also i. 336, where it is written Himaleh.

Hindee, s. This is the Pers. adjective form from Hind, 'India,' and illustration of its use for a native of India will be found under Hindoo. By Europeans it is most commonly used for those dialects of Hindustani speech which are less modified by Persian vocables than the usual Hindustani, and which are spoken by the rural population of the N.W. Provinces. The earliest literary work in Hindi is the great poem of Chand Bardai (c. 1200) which records the deeds of Prithvirāja, the last Hindu sovereign of Dehli.

Hindkī or Hindekī, n.p. This modification of the name is applied to people of Indian descent, but converted to Islam, on the Peshawar frontier, and scattered over other parts of Afghanistan. They do the banking business, and hold a large part of the trade in their hands.

Hindoo, n.p. Pers. Hindū. A person of Indian religion and race. This is a term derived from the use of the Mahomedan conquerors, see under India. The word in this form is Persian. Hindī is that used in Arabic, e.g.

c. 940. "An inhabitant of Mansūra in Sind, among the most illustrious and powerful of that city ... had brought up a young Indian or Sindian slave (Hindī aw Sindī)."
—Mas'ūdī, vi. 264.

In the following quotation from a writer in Persian observe the distinction made between Hindū and Hindī:

c. 1290. "Whatever live Hindū fell into the King's hands was pounded into bits under the feet of elephants. The Musalmāns, who were Hindīs (country born), had their lives spared."—Amīr Khosrū, in Elliot, iii. 539.

1563. "... moreover if people of Arabia or Persia would ask of the men of this country whether they are Moors or Gentooes, they ask in these words: 'Art thou Mosalman or Indu?'" —Garcia, f. 137 b.

Hindu is often used on the Peshawur frontier as synonymous with bunya (see under banyan). A soldier (of the tribes) will say, 'I am going to the Hindu,' i.e. to the bunya of his company.

Hindoo Koosh, n.p. Hindū-Kūsh; a term applied by our geographers to the whole of the Alpine range which separates the basins of the Kabul River and the Helmand from that of the Oxus. It is, as Rennell points out, properly that part of the range immediately north of Kabul, the Caucasus of the historians of Alexander, who crossed and recrossed it somewhere not far from the longitude of that city. The real origin of the name is not known. It is, as far as we know, first used in literature by Ibn Batuta, and the explanation of the name which he gives, however doubtful, is still popular. The name has been by some later writers modified into Hindu Koh (mountain), but this is factitious, and throws no light on the origin of the name.

c. 1334. "Another motive for our stoppage was the fear of snow; for there is midway on the road a mountain called Hindū-Kūsh, i.e. 'the Hindu-Killer,' because so many of the slaves, male and female, brought from India, die on the passage of this mountain, owing to the severe cold and quantity of snow."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 84.

1504. "The country of Kābul is very strong, and of difficult access . . . Between Balkh, Kundez, and Badakhshān on the one side, and Kābul on the other, is interposed the mountain of Hindū-Kūsh, the passes over which are seven in number."—Bāber, p. 139.

1548. "From this place marched, and entered the mountains called Hindū-Kush."—Mem. of Enq. Humayun, 89.

"It was therefore determined to invade Badakhshan . . . The Emperor, passing over the heel of the Hindū-Kush, encamped at Shergrān."—Tabakat-i Akbari, in Elliot, v. 223.

1793. "The term Hindoo-Kho, or Hindoo-Kush, is not applied to the ridge throughout its whole extent; but seems confined to that part of it which forms the N.W. boundary of Cabul; and this is the INDIAN CAUCASUS of Alexander."—Rennell, Mem., 3rd ed. [150].

1817. ". . . those Who dwell beyond the everlasting snows Of Hindoo Koosh, in stormy freedom bred."—Mokanna.

Hindostan, n.p. Pers. Hindūstān.

(a) 'The country of the Hindus,' India. In modern native parlance this word indicates distinctively (b) India north of the Nerbudda, and exclusive of Bengal and Behar. The latter provinces are regarded as Pūrb (see Poorub), and all south of the Nerbudda as Dakhan (see Deccan).

But the word is used in older Mahommedan authors just as it is used in English school-books and atlases, viz., as (a) the equivalent of India Proper. Thus Baber says of Hindustān: "On the East, the South, and the West it is bounded by the Ocean" (310).

1553. ". . . and so the Persian nation adjacent to it give it as at present its proper name that of Indostān."—Barros, I. iv. 7.

1663. ". . . and common usage in Persia, and Coraḡone, and Arabia, and Turkey, calls this country Industan . . . for istān is as much as to say 'region,' and indū 'India.'"—Garcia, f. 137 b.

1663. "And thus it came to pass that the Persians called it Indostan."—Faria y Sousa, i. 33.

1665. "La dernière parti est la plus connue: c'est celle que l'on appelle Indostan, et dont les bornes naturelles au Couchant et au Levant, sont le Gange et l'Indus."—Thevenot, v. 9.

1672. "It has been from old time divided into two parts, i.e. the Eastern, which is India beyond the Ganges, and the Western India within the Ganges, now called Indostan."—Baldaeus, I.

1770. "By Indostan is properly meant a country lying between two celebrated rivers, the Indus and the Ganges . . . A ridge of mountains runs across this long tract from north to south, and dividing it into two equal parts, extends as far as Cape Comorin."—Raynal (tr.), i. 34.

1783. "In Macassar Indostan is called Neegree Telinga."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 82.

1803. "I feared that the dawk direct through Hindostan would have been stopped."—Wellington, ed. 1837, ii. 209.

1824. "One of my servants called out to them,—'Aha! dandee folk, take care! You are now in Hindostan! The people of this country know well how to fight, and are not afraid.'"—Heber, i. 124. See also pp. 268, 269.

In the following stanza of the good bishop's the application is apparently the same; but the accentuation is excruciating, "Hindōstan" as if rhyming to "Boston."

1824.

"Then on! then on! where duty leads,
My course be onward still,
O'er broad Hindostan's sultry meads,
Or bleak Almora's hill."—Ib. 113.

1834. "It may be as well to state that Mr. H. G. Keene's forthcoming History of Hindustan . . . will be limited in its scope to the strict meaning of the word 'Hindustan' = India north of the Deccan."—Academy, April 26th, p. 294.

Hindostanee, s. Hindūstānī, properly an adjective, but used substantively in two senses, viz. (a) a native of Hindustān, and (b) (Hindūstānī zabān) 'the language of that country,' but in fact the language of the Mahomedans of Upper India, and eventually of the Mahomedans of the Deccan, developed out of the Hindi dialect of the Doab chiefly, and of the territory round Agra and Dehli, with a mixture of Persian vocables and phrases, and a readiness to adopt other foreign words. It is also called Oordoo, i.e. the language of the Urdū ('Horde') or Camp. This language was for a long time a kind of Mahomedan lingua franca over all India, and still possesses that character over a large part of the country, and among certain classes. Even in Madras, where it least prevails, it is still recognised in native regiments as the language of intercourse between officers and men. Old-fashioned Anglo-Indians used to call it the Moors (q.v.).

b.—

1616. "After this he (Tom Coryate) got a great mastery in the Indostan, or more vulgar language; there was a woman, a landress, belonging to my Lord Embassador's house, who had such a freedom and liberty of speech, that she would sometimes scould, brawl, and rail from the sun-rising to the sun-set; one day he undertook her in her own language. And by eight of the clock he so silenced her, that she had not one word more to speak."—Terry, Extracts relating to T. C.

1673. "The Language at Court is Persian, that commonly spoke is Indostan (for which they have no proper Character, the written Language being called Banyan), which is a mixture of Persian and Sclavonian, as are all the dialects of India."—Fryer, 201.

This intelligent traveller's reference to Sclavonian is remarkable, and shows a notable perspicacity, which would have delighted the late Lord Strangford, had he noticed the passage.

1685. ". . . so applied myself to a Portuguese mariner who spoke Indostan (ye current language of all these Islands)" [Maldives].—Hedges, March 9.

1726. "The language here is Hindustans or Moors (so 'tis called there), though he who can't speak any Arabic and Persian passes for an ignoramus."—Valentijn, Chor. i. 37.

1727. "This Persian . . . and I, were discoursing one Day of my Affairs in the Industan Language, which is the established Language spoken in the Mogul's large Dominions."—A. Ham. ii. 183.

1745. "Benjaminii Schulzii Missionarii Evangelicæ, Grammatica Hindustanica . . . Edidit, et de suscipiendâ barbaricarum linguarum culturâ præfatus est D. Jo. Henr. Callenberg, Halæ Saxoniae."—Title from Catalogue of M. Garcin de Tassy's Books, 1879. This is the earliest we have heard of.

1763. "Two of the Council of Pondicherry went to the camp, one of them was well versed in the Indostan and Persic languages, which are the only tongues used in the Courts of the Mahomedan Princes."—Orme, i. 144 (ed. 1803).

1772. "Manuscripts have indeed been handed about, ill spelt, with a confused mixture of Persian, Indostans, and Bengals."—Preface to Hailey's Grammar, xi. See under Moors.

1777. "Alphabetum Brammhanicum seu Indostanum."—Romæ.

1778. "Grammatica Indostana—A mais Vulgar—Que se practica no Imperio do gram Mogol—Offercida—Aos muitos Reverendos—Padres Missionarios—Do dito Imperio. Em Roma MDCCLXXVIII.—Na Estamperia da Sagrada Congregação—de Propaganda Fide." (Title transcribed.)

There is a reprint of this (apparently) of 1865, in the Catalogue of Garcin de Tassy's books.

c. 1830. "Cet ignoble patois d'Hindoustani, qui ne servira jamais à rien quand je serai retourné en Europe, est difficile."—V. Jacquemont, Correspondance, i. 95.

1844. "Hd. Quarters, Kurrachee, 12th February, 1844. The Governor unfortunately does not understand Hindoostanee, nor Persian, nor Maharrata, nor any other eastern dialect. He therefore will feel particularly obliged to Collectors, sub-Collectors, and officers writing the proceedings of Courts-Martial, and all Staff Officers, to indite their various papers in English, larded with as small a portion of the to him unknown tongues as they conveniently can, instead of those he generally receives—namely, papers written in Hin- dostanee larded with occasional words in English.

"Any Indent made for English Dictionaries shall be duly attended to, if such be in the stores at Kurrachee: if not, gentlemen who have forgotten the vulgar tongue are requested to procure the requisite assistance from England."—GG. OO., by Sir Charles Napier, 85.

“ . . . they sound strange

As Hindostanee to an Ind-born man Accustomed many years to English speech.”

E. B. Browning, Aurora Leigh.

Hing, s. Asafoetida. Skt. hingu, Hind. hing, Dakh. hingu. A repulsively smelling gum-resin which forms a favourite Hindu condiment, and is used also by Europeans in Western and Southern India as an ingredient in certain cakes eaten with curry. (See Poppadam.)

This product affords a curious example of the uncertainty that sometimes besets the origin of drugs which are the objects even of a large traffic. Hanbury and Flückiger, whilst describing Falconer's Narthex Asafoetida (Ferula Narthex, Boiss.) and Scorodosma foetidum, Bunge (F. asafoetida, Boiss.) two umbelliferous plants, both cited as the source of this drug, say that neither has been proved to furnish the asafoetida of commerce. Yet the plant producing it has been described and drawn by Kaempfer, who saw the gum-resin collected in the Persian Province of Laristan (near the eastern shore of the P. Gulf); and in recent years (1857) Surgeon-Major Bellow has described the collection of the drug near Kandahar. Asafoetida has been identified with the σάφρον or laserpitium of the ancients. The substance is probably yielded not only by the species mentioned above, but by other allied plants, e.g. Ferula Jaeschkiana, Vatke, of Kashmir and Turkestan. The Hing of the Bombay market is the produce of F. alliacea, Boiss.

c. 645. “This kingdom of Tsao-kin-tcha (Tsäuküta?) has about 7000 li of compass,—the compass of the capital called Ho-si-na (Ghazna) is 30 li. . . . The soil is favourable to the plant Yo-Kin (Curcuma, or turmeric) and to that called Hing-kiu.”—Peterius Bould., iii. 187.

1563. “A Portuguese in Bisnagar had a horse of great value, but which exhibited a deal of flatulence, and on that account the King would not buy it. The Portuguese cured it by giving it this ymgu mixt with flour: the King then bought it, finding it thoroughly well, and asked him how he had cured it. When the man said it was with ymgu, the King replied: ‘Tis nothing then to marvel at, for you have given it to eat the food of the gods’ (or, as the poets say, nectar). Whereupon the Portuguese made answer sotto voce and in Portuguese: ‘Better call it the food of the devils!’” *—Garcia, f. 21 b.

1586. “I went from Agra to Satagam in Bengale in the companie of one hundred and four score Boates, laden with Salt, Opium, Hinge, Lead, Carpets, and divers other commodities down the River Jemena.”—R. Fitch, in Hakluyt, ii. 386.

1611. “In the Kingdom of Gujarat and Cambaya, the natives put in all their food Ingu, which is Assafetida.”—Teixeira, Relaciones, 29.

1631. “. . . . ut totas aedes foetore repleant, qui insuetis vix tolerandus esset. Quod Javani et Malaii et ceteri Indiarum incolae negabant se quicquam odoratos naribus unquam percepisse. Apud hos Hin hic succus nominatur.”—Jac. Bonui, lib. iv. p. 41.

1638. “Le Hingh, que nos droguistes et apoticares appellent Asa foetida, vient la plus part de Perse, mais celle que la Province d’Vtrad (?) produit dans les Indes est bien meilleur.”—Mandelslo, 230.

1673. “In this Country Asa Foetida is gathered at a place called Descoon; some deliver it to be the Juice of a Cane or Reed inspissated; others, of a Tree wounded: It differs much from the stinking Stuff called Hing, it being of the Province of Carnania; this latter is that the Indians perfume themselves with, mixing it in all their Pulse, and make it up in Wafers to correct the Windiness of their Food.”—Fryer, 239.

1689. “The Natives at Suratt are much taken with Asa Foetida, which they call Hin, and mix a little with the Cakes that they eat.”—Ovington, 397.

1712. “. . . substantiam obtinet ponderosam, instar rapae solidam candidissimamque, plenam succi pinguis, albisimi, foetidissimi, porraceo odore nares horridè ferientis; qui ex eâ collectus, Persis Indis- que Hingh, Europaeis Asa foetida appellatur.”—Eng. Kaempfer Amoen. Exotic. 537.

1857. “Whilst riding in the plain to the N.E. of the city (Candahar) we noticed several assafoetida plants. The assafoetida, called hang or hing by the natives, grows wild in the sandy or gravelly plains that form the western part of Afghanistan. It is never cultivated, but its peculiar gum-resin is collected from the plants on the deserts where they grow. The produce is for the most part exported to Hindustan.”—Bellew, Journal of a Pol. Mission, &c., p. 270.

* The Germans do worse than this Portuguese, for they call the drug Teufels dreck, i.e. diaboli non cibis sed sterco!

Hirava, n.p. Malayāl. Iraya. The name of a very low caste in Malabar.

1510. "La sexta sorte (de' Gentili) se chiamāo Hirava, e questi seminano e raccoglieno il riso."—Varthema (ed. 1517, f. 43 v).

Hobson-Jobson, s. A native festal excitement; a tamāsha (see tumasha); but especially the Moharram ceremonies. This phrase may be taken as a typical one of the most highly assimilated class of Anglo-Indian argot, and we have ventured to borrow from it a concise alternative title for our Glossary. It is peculiar to the British soldier and his surroundings, with whom it probably originated, and with whom it is by no means obsolete, as we once supposed.* It is in fact an Anglo-Saxon version of the wailings of the Mahomedans as they beat their breasts in the processions of the Moharram—"Yā Hasan! Yā Hosain!"

It is to be remembered that these observances are in India by no means confined to Shi'as. Except at Lucknow and Murshidābād the great majority of Mahomedans in that country are professed Sunnis. Yet here is a statement of the facts from an unexceptionable authority:

"The commonalty of the Mussalmans, and especially the women, have more regard for the memory of Hasan and Husein, than for that of Muhammad and his khalifs. The heresy of making Ta'ziyas (see Tazea) on the anniversary of the two latter imāms, is most common throughout India: so much so that opposition to it is ascribed by the ignorant to blasphemy. This example is followed by many of the Hindus, especially the Mahrattas. The Muharram is celebrated throughout the Dekhan and Malwa, with greater enthusiasm than in other parts of India. Grand preparations are made in every town on the occasion, as if for a festival of rejoicing, rather than of observing the rites of mourning, as they ought. The observance of this custom has so strong a hold on the mind of the commonalty of the Mussulmans that they believe Muhammadanism to depend merely on keeping the memory of the imāms in the above manner."—Mir Shahāmat 'Alī, in J. R. As. Soc. xiii. 369.

We find no literary quotation to exemplify the phrase as it stands. But these which follow show it in the process of evolution:

* My friend Major John Trotter tells me he has repeatedly heard it used by British soldiers in the Punjab; and has heard it also from a regimental Moonshee.—[H. Y.]

1618. "... e particolarmente delle donne che, battendosi il petto e facendo gesti di grandissima compassione replicano spesso con gran dolore quegli ultimi versi di certi loro canti: Vāh Hussein! sciah Hussein!"—P. della Valle, i. 552

c. 1630. "Nine dayes they wander up and downe (shaving all that while neither head nor beard, nor seeming joyfull), incessantly calling out Hussan, Hussan! in a melancholy note, so long, so fiercely, that many can neither howle longer, nor for a month's space recover their voices."—Sir T. Herbert, 261.

c. 1665. "... ainsi j'eus tout le loisir dont j'eus besoin pour y voir celebrer la Fête de Hussein Fils d'Ally .... Les Mores de Golconde le celebrent avec encore beaucoup plus de folies qu'en Perse .... d'autres font des dances en rond, tenant des épées nues la pointe en haut, qu'ils touchent les unes contre les autres, en criant de toute leur force Hussein."—Thevenot, v. 320.

1673. "About this time the Moors solemnize the Exequies of Hosseen Gossien, a time of ten days Mourning for two Unfortunate Champions of theirs."—Fryer, p. 108.

"On the Days of their Feasts and Jubilees, Gladiators were approved and licensed; but feeling afterwards the Evils that attended that Liberty, which was chiefly used in their Kossy Gossy, any private Grudge being then openly revenged: it never was forbid, but it passed into an Edict by the following King, that it should be lawful to Kill any found with Naked Swords in that Solemnity."—Fryer, 357.

1720. "Under these promising circumstances the time came round for the Mussulman feast called Hossein Jossen ... better known as the Mohurram."—In Wheeler, ii. 347.

1726. "In their month Moharram they have a season of mourning for the two brothers Hassan and Hossein .... They name this mourning-time in Arabic Ashur, or the 10 days; but the Hollanders call it Jaksom Baksom."—Valentijn, Choro. 107.

1763. "It was the 14th of November, and the festival which commemorates the murder of the brothers Hassein and Jassein happened to fall out at this time."—Orme, i. 193.

1832. "... they kindle fires in these pits every evening during the festival; and the ignorant, old as well as young, amuse themselves in fencing across them with sticks or swords; or only in running and playing round them, calling out, Ya Allce! Ya Allce! ... Shah Hussin! Shah Hussin! ... Shah Hosein! Shah Hosein! ... Doolha! Doolha! (bridegroom! ...); Hae dost! Hae dost! (alas, friend! ...); Ruheco! Ruheco! (Stay! Stay!). Every two of these words are repeated probably a hundred times over as loud as they can bawl out."—Jaffur Shureef, Qanoon-e-Islam, tr. by Herklots, p. 173.

1883. "... a long procession . . . followed and preceded by the volunteer mourners and breast-beaters shouting their cry of Hous-s-e-i-n H-as-san, Houss-e-i-n H-a-s-san, and a simultaneous blow is struck vigorously by hundreds of heavy hands on the bare breasts at the last syllable of each name."—Wills' Modern Persia, 282.

Hodgett, s. This 'is used among the English in Turkey and Egypt for a title-deed of land. It is Arabic hujjat, 'evidence.' Hojat, perhaps a corruption of the same word, is used in Western India for an account current between landlord and tenant.

Hog-deer, s. The Anglo-Indian popular name of the Axis porcinus, Jerd., the Pārā of Hindustan. The name is nearly the same as that which Cosmas (c. 545) applies to an animal (Χοιρέλαφος) which he draws (see under Babiroussa), but the two have no other relation.

The Hog-deer is abundant in the grassy openings of forest throughout the Gangetic valley and further east. "It runs with its head low, and in a somewhat ungainly manner; hence its popular appellation."—Jerdon, Mammals, 263.

Hog-plum, s. The austere fruit of the amrā (Hind.), Spondias mangifera, Pers. (Ord. Terebinthaceae) is sometimes so called; also called the wild mango. It is used in curries, pickles, and tarts. It is a native of various parts of India, and is cultivated in many tropical climates.

1852. "The Karens have a tradition that in those golden days when God dwelt with men, all nations came before him on a certain day, each with an offering from the fruits of their land, and the Karens selected the hog's plum for this oblation; which gave such offence that God cursed the Karen nation and placed it lowest . . ."—Mason's Burmah, ed. 1860, p. 461.

Hokchew, Hoksieu, Aucheo, etc., n.p. These are forms which the names of the great Chinese port of Fuh-chau, the capital of Fuh-Kien, takes in many old works. They, in fact, imitate the pronunciation in the Fuh-kien dialect, which is Hok-chiu; Fuh-Kien similarly being called Hoh-kien.

1585. "After they had travelled more than half a league in the suburbs of the citie of Aucheo, they met with a post that came from the vizroy."—Mendoza, ii. 78.

1616. "Also this day arrived a small

China bark or soma from Hochchew, laden with silk and stuffes."—Cocks, i. 219.

Home. In Anglo-Indian speech this means England.

1837. "Home always means England; nobody calls India home—not even those who have been here thirty years or more, and are never likely to return to Europe."—Letters from Madras, 92.

1865. "You may perhaps remember how often in times past we debated, with a seriousness becoming the gravity of the subject, what article of food we should each of us respectively indulge in, on our first arrival at home."—Waring, Tropical Resident, 154.

So also in the West Indies:

c. 1830. "... 'Oh, your cousin Mary, I forgot—fine girl, Tom—may do for you at home yonder' (all Creoles speak of England as home, although they may never have seen it)."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 238.

Hong, s. The Chinese word is hang, meaning 'a row or rank'; a house of business; at Canton a warehouse, a factory, and particularly applied to the establishments of the European nations ("Foreign Hongs"), and to those of the so-called "Hong Merchants." These were a body of merchants who had the monopoly of trade with foreigners, in return for which privilege they became security for the good behaviour of the foreigners, and for their payment of dues. The guild of these merchants was called 'The Hong.' This monopoly seems to have been first established about 1720—30, and it was terminated under the Treaty of Nanking, in 1842.

The Hong merchants are of course not mentioned in Lockyer (1711), nor by A. Hamilton (in China previous to, and after 1700, pubd. 1727). The latter uses the word, however, and the rudiments of the institution may be traced not only in his narrative, but in that of Ibn Batuta.

c. 1346. "When a Musulman trader arrives in a Chinese city, he is allowed to choose whether he will take up his quarters with one of the merchants of his own faith settled in the country, or will go to an inn. If he prefers to go and lodge with a merchant, they count all his money and confide it to the merchant of his choice; the latter then takes charge of all expenditure on account of the stranger's wants, but acts with perfect integrity. . ."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 265-6.

1727. "When I arrived at Canton the Hapoa (see Hoppo) ordered me lodgings for myself, my Men, and Cargo, in (a) Haung or Inn belonging to one of his Merchants ... and when I went abroad, I had always some Servants belonging to the Haug to follow me at a Distance."—A. Ham, ii. 227.

1782. "... l'Opeou (see Hoppo) ... s'embarque en grande cerémonie dans une galère pavoisée, emmenant ordinairement avec lui trois ou quatre Hanistes."—Sonnerat, ii. 236.

"... Les loges Européennes s'appellent hams."—Id. ii. 245.

1783. "It is stated indeed that a monopolizing Company in Canton, called the Cohong, had reduced commerce there to a desperate state."—Report of Com. on Affairs of India, Burke, vi. 461.

1797. "A Society of Hong, or united merchants, who are answerable for one another, both to the Government and to the foreign nations."—Sir G. Staunton, Embassy to China, ii. 565.

1882. "The Hong merchants (collectively the Co-hong) of a body corporate, date from 1720."—The Fankwa at Canton, p. 34.

Cohong is, we believe, though speaking with diffidence, an exogamous union between the Latin co- and the Chinese hong.

Hong-boat, s. A kind of sampan (q.v.) or boat, with a small wooden house in the middle, used by foreigners at Canton. "A public passenger-boat (all over China, I believe) is called Hang-chwen, where chwen is generically 'vessel,' and hang is perhaps used in the sense of 'plying regularly.' Boats built for this purpose, used as private boats by merchants and others, probably gave the English name Hong-boat to those used by our countrymen at Canton."—Note by the Rev. G. E. (now Rt. Rev. Bishop) Moule.

Honore, Onore, n.p. Honāvar, a town and port of Canara, of ancient standing and long of piratical repute. The etymology is unknown to us (see what Barbosa gives as the native name below). Vincent has supposed it to be the Náoupa of the Periplus, "the first part of the pepper-country Λιμυρική,"—for which read Λιμυρική, the Tamil country or Malabar. But this can hardly be accepted, for Honore is less than 5000 stadia from Barygaza, instead of being 7000 as it ought to be by the Periplus, nor is it in the Tamil region. The true Náoupa must have been Cannanore, or Pudopatana, a little south of the last.

The long defence of Honore by Captain Torriano, of the Bombay Artillery, against the forces of Tippoo, in 1783–4, is one of the most noble records of the Indian army. (See an account of it in Forbes's Oriental Memoirs, iv. 109 seqq.)

c. 1343. "Next day we arrived at the city of Hinaur, beside a great estuary which big ships enter. . . . The women of Hinaur are beautiful and chaste . . . they all know the Kurān al-'Azīm by heart. I saw at Hinaur 13 schools for the instruction of girls and 23 for boys,—such a thing as I have seen nowhere else. The inhabitants of Maleibār pay the Sultan . . . a fixed annual sum from fear of his maritime power."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 65–67.

1516. "... there is another river on which stands a good town called Honor; the inhabitants use the language of the country, and the Malabars call it Ponou-aram (or Ponaram, in Ramusio); here the Malabars carry on much traffic. . . . In this town of Onor are two Gentoo corsairs patronised by the Lord of the Land, one called Timoja and the other Raogy, each of whom has 5 or 6 very big ships with large and well-armed crews."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. 291.

1553. "This port (Onor) and that of Batalá . . . belonged to the King of Bisnaga, and to this King of Onor his tributary, and these ports, less than 40 years before were the most famous of all that coast, not only for the fertility of the soil and its abundance in provisions . . . but for being the ingress and egress of all merchandize for the kingdom of Bisnaga, from which the King had a great revenue; and principally of horses from Arabia . . ."—Barros, I. viii. cap. x.

Hoogly, Hooghley, n.p. Properly Hugli; a town on the right bank of the Western Delta Branch of the Ganges, that which has long been known from this place as the Hoogly River, and on which Calcutta also stands, on the other bank, and 25 miles nearer the sea. Hoogly was one of the first places occupied by Europeans in the interior of Bengal; first by the Portuguese in the first half of the 16th century. An English factory was established here in 1640; and it was for some time their chief settlement in Bengal. In 1688 a quarrel with the Nawab led to armed action, and the English abandoned Hoogly; but on the arrangement of peace they settled at Chatānati (see Chuttanuttty), now Calcutta.

1616. "After the force of don Francisco de Menezes arrived at Sundiva as we have related, there came a few days later to the same island 3 sanguicels, right well equipped with arms and soldiers, at the charges of Manuel Viegas, a householder and resident of Ogolim, or Porto Pequeno, where dwelt in Bengala many Portuguese, 80 leagues up the Ganges, in the territory of the Mogor, under his ill faith that every hour threatened their destruction."—Bocarro, Decada, 476.

c. 1632. "Under the rule of the Bengal is a party of Frank merchants . . . came trading to Sâtganw (see Porto Pequeno); one kos above that place, they occupied some ground on the bank of the estuary. . . . In course of time, through the ignorance and negligence of the rulers of Bengal, these Europeans increased in number, and erected substantial buildings, which they fortified. . . . In due course a considerable place grew up, which was known by the name of the Port of Hûgî . . . These proceedings had come to the notice of the Emperor (Shâh Jahân), and he resolved to put an end to them." &c. —'Abdul Hamîd Lâhori, in Elliot, vii. 31-32.

1644. "The other important voyage which used to be made from Cochim was that to Bengalla, when the port and town of Ugolim were still standing, and much more when we had the Porto Grande (q.v.) and the town of Diangt; this used to be made by so many ships that often in one monsoon there came 30 or more from Bengalla to Cochim, all laden with rice, sugar, lac, iron, salt-petre, and many kinds of cloths both of grass and cotton, ghee (manteyga), long pepper, a great quantity of wax, besides wheat and many things besides, such as quilts and rich bedding; so that every ship brought a capital of more than 20,000 xerafins. But since these two possessions were lost, and the two ports were closed, there go barely one or two vessels to Orixa." —Bocarro, MS., f. 315.

1665. "O Rey de Arração nos tomou a fortaleza de Sirião em Pegu; O grão Mogor a cidade do Golim em Bengala." —P. Manoel Godinho, Relação, &c.

c. 1666. "The rest they kept for their service to make Rowers of them; and such Christians as they were themselves, bringing them up to robbing and killing; or else they sold them to the Portuguese of Goa, Celan, St. Thomas, and others, and even to those that were remaining in Bengall at Ogouli, who were come thither to settle themselves there by favour of Jehan-Guyre, the Grandfather of Aureng-Zebe . . ." —Bernier, E. T., 54.

1727. "Hughly is a Town of large Extent, but ill built. It reaches about 2 Miles along the River's Side, from the Chenchura before mentioned to the Bandel, a Colony formerly settled by the Portuguese, but the Mogul's Fowzdaar governs both at present." —A. Ham. ii. 19.

Hoogly River, n.p. See preceding. The stream to which we give this name is formed by the combination of three of the delta branches of the Ganges, viz., the Baugheruttee, Jalinghee, and Matabanga (Bhāgirathi, Jalangrī, and Matabhāngā), known as the Nuddeea (Nadiyā) Rivers.

Hooka, s. Hind. from Arab. hukkah, properly 'a round casquet.' The Indian pipe for smoking through water, the elaborated hubble-bubble (q.v.). That which is smoked in the hooka is a curious compound of tobacco, spice, molasses; fruit, &c.

In 1840 the hooka was still very common at Calcutta dinner-tables, as well as regimental mess-tables, and its bubble-bubble-bubble was heard from various quarters before the cloth was removed—as was customary in those days. Going further back some twelve or fifteen years it was not very uncommon to see the use of the hooka kept up by old Indians after their return to Europe; one such at least, in the recollection of the elder of the present writers in his childhood, being a lady, who continued its use in Scotland for several years. When the junior of the present writers landed first at Madras, in 1860, there were perhaps half-a-dozen Europeans at the Presidency who still used the hooka; there is not one now (c. 1878). A few gentlemen at Hyderabad are said still to keep it up.

1768. "This last Season I have been without Company (except that of my Pipe or Hooker), and when employed in the innocent diversion of smoaking it, have often thought of you, and Old England." —MS. Letter of James Rennell, July 1st.

1783. "For my part, in thirty years' residence, I never could find out one single luxury of the East, so much talked of here, except sitting in an arm-chair, smoaking a hooka, drinking cool water (when I could get it), and wearing clean linen." —(Jos. Price) Some Observations on a late Publication, &c., 79.

1789. "When the cloth is removed, all the servants except the hookerbedar retire, and make way for the sea breeze to circulate, which is very refreshing to the Company, whilst they drink their wine, and smoke the hooker, a machine not easily described . . ." —Munro's Narrative, 53.

1828. "Every one was hushed, but the noise of that wind . . . and the occasional bubbling of my own hookah, which had just been furnished with another chillum." —The Kuzzilbash, i. 2.

c. 1849. See Sir C. Napier, quoted under Gram-fed.

c. 1858.

"Son houka bigarré d'arabesques fleuries."
Léconte de Lisle, Poèmes Barbares.

1872. "... in the background the carcass of a boar with a cluster of villagers sitting by it, passing a hookah of primitive form round, for each to take a pull in turn."
—A True Reformer, Ch. I.

Hooka-burdar, s. Hind. from Pers. hukka burdār, 'hooka-bearer'; the servant whose duty it was to attend to his master's hooka, and who considered that duty sufficient to occupy his time. See quotation from Munro under hooka; also Williamson, V. M., i. 220.

1801. "The Resident... tells a strange story how his hookah-burdar, after cheating and robbing him, proceeded to England, and set up as the Prince of Sylhet, took in everybody, was waited upon by Pitt, dined with the Duke of York, and was presented to the King."—Mt. St. Elphinstone, Life, i. 34.

Hookum, s. An order; Ar.-H. hukm; see under Hakim.

Hooluck, s. Beng. hālak? The black gibbon (Hylobates hoolook, Jer.) not unfrequently tamed on our Eastern frontier, and from its gentle engaging ways, and plaintive cries, often becoming a great pet.

In the forests of the Kasia Hills, when there was neither sound nor sign of a living creature, by calling out hoo! hoo! one sometimes could wake a clamour in response from the hoolucks as if hundreds had suddenly started to life, each shouting hoo! hoo! hoo! at the top of his voice.

1884. "He then... describes a gibbon he had (not an historian nor a book, but a specimen of Hylobates hooluck) who must have been wholly delightful. This engaging anthropoid used to put his arm through Mr. Sterndale's, was extremely clean in his habits ('which,' says Mr. Sterndale thoughtfully and truthfully, 'cannot be said of all the monkey tribe'), and would not go to sleep without a pillow. Of course he died of consumption. The gibbon, however, as a pet has one weakness, that of 'howling in a piercing and somewhat hysterical fashion for some minutes till exhausted.'"—Saty. Review, May 31, on Sterndale's Nat. Hist. of Mammalia of India, &c.

Hooly, s. Hind. holī (Skt. holākā). The spring festival, held at the approach of the vernal equinox, during the 10 days preceding the full moon of the month P'hālgua. It is a sort of carnival in honour of Krishna and the milkmaids. Passers-by are chaffed, and pelted with red powder, or drenched with yellow liquids from squirts. Songs, mostly obscene, are sung in praise of Krishna, and dances performed round fires. In Bengal the feast is called dol jātrā, or "Swing-cradle festival."

c. 1590. "Here is also a place called Cheramutty, where, during the feast of the Hooly, flames issue out of the ground in a most astonishing manner."—Gladwin's Ayeen Akbery, ii. 34.

1673. "... Their Hooly, which is at their other Seed-Time."—Fryer, 180.

1727. "One (Feast) they kept on Sight of a New Moon in February, exceeded the rest in ridiculous Actions and Expense; and this they called the Feast of Wooly, who was... a fierce fellow in a War with some Giants that infested Sindy..."—A. Ham. i. 128.

1808. "I have delivered your message to Mr. H. about April day, but he says he understands the learned to place the Hooly as according with May day, and he believes they have no occasion in India to set apart a particular day in the year for the manufacture..."—Letter from Mrs. Halhed to W. Hastings, in Cal. Review, xxvi. 93.

1809. "... We paid the Muha Raj (Sindhia) the customary visit at the Hohlee. Everything was prepared for playing; but at Captain C.'s particular request, that part of the ceremony was dispensed with. Playing the Hohlee consists in throwing about a quantity of flour, made from a water-nut called singara, and dyed with red sanders; it is called abeer; and the principal sport is to cast it into the eyes, mouth, and nose of the players, and to splash them all over with water tinged of an orange colour with the flowers of the dak tree."—Broughton's Letters, p. 87.

Hoon, s. A gold Pagoda (coin), q. v. Hind. hūn, "perhaps from Canar. homu (gold)," Wilson.

1647. "A wonderfully large diamond from a mine in the territory of Golkonda had fallen into the hands of Kutbu-l Mulk; whereupon an order was issued, directing him to forward the same to Court; when its estimated value would be taken into account as part of the two huns of huns which was the stipulated amount of his annual tribute."—Ināyat Khān, in Elliot, vii. 84.

1879. "In Exhibit 320 Ramji engages to pay five hons (=Rs. 20) to Vitthoba, besides paying the Government assessment."—Bombay High Court Judgment, 27th Jan., p. 121.

Hoondy, s. Hind. hundī, hundavī; Mahr. and Guj. hundī. A bill of exchange in a native language.

1810. "Hoondies (i.e. bankers' drafts) would be of no use whatever to them."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 530.

Hoonimaun. See Lungoor.

Hoowa. A peculiar call (hūwa) used by the Singhalese, and thence applied to the distance over which this call can be heard. Compare the Australian coo-ee.

Hopper, s. A colloquial term in S. India for cakes (usually of rice-flour), somewhat resembling the wheaten chupatties (q.v.) of Upper India. Tamil appam.

1582. "Thus having talked a while, he gave him very good entertainment, and commanded to give him certaine cakes, made of the flower of Wheate, which the Malabars do call Apes, and with the same honnie."—Castañeda (by N. L.) f. 38.

1606. "Great dishes of apas."—Gouvea, f. 48 r.

c 1690. "Ex iis (the chestnuts of the Jack fruit) in siccatis farinam, ex eaque placentas, apas dictas, conficiunt."—Rheede, iii.

1707. "Those who bake oppers without permission will be subject to severe penalty."—Thesavaleme (Tamil Laws of Jaffna), 700.

1800. "Appas (called hoppers by the English) . . . supply their morning repast."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 161.

Hoppo, s. The Chinese Superintendent of Customs at Canton. Giles says: "The term is said to be a corruption of Hoo poo, the Board of Revenue, with which office the Hoppo, or Collector of duties, is in direct communication." Dr. Williams gives a different account (see below). Neither affords much satisfaction.

1711. "The Hoppos, who look on Europe Ships as a great Branch of their Profits, will give you all the fair Words imaginable."—Lockyer, 101.

1727. "I have staid about a Week, and found no Merchants come near me, which made me suspect, that there were some underhand Dealings between the Hapoa and his Chaps, to my Prejudice."—A. Ham, ii. 228. See also under Hong.

1743. ". . . just as he (Mr. Anson) was ready to embark, the Hoppo or Chinese Custom-house officer of Macao refused to grant a permit to the boat."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. 1756, p. 355.

1750-52. "The hoppo, happa, or first inspector of customs . . . came to see us to-day."—Osbeck, i. 359.

1782. "La charge d'Opeou répond à celle d'intendant de province."—Sonnierat, ii. 236.

1797. ". . . the Hoppo or mandarine more immediately connected with Europeans."—Sir G. Staunton, i. 239.

1842 (?). "The term hoppo is confined to Canton, and is a corruption of the term hoi-po-sho, the name of the officer who has control over the boats on the river, strangely applied to the Collector of Customs by foreigners."—Wells Williams, Chinese Commercial Guide, 221.

1882. "It may be as well to mention here that the 'Hoppo' (as he was incorrectly styled) filled an office especially created for the foreign trade at Canton. . . . The Board of Revenue is in Chinese 'Hoo-poo,' and the office was locally misapplied to the officer in question."—The Fankwaie at Canton, p. 36.

Horse-keeper, s. An old provincial English term, used in the Madras Presidency and in Ceylon, for 'groom.' The usual corresponding words are, in N. India syce (q.v.), and in Bombay ghorawālā (see Gorawalla).

1555. "There in the reste of the Cophine made for the nones thei bewrie one of his dierest lemmans, a waityng manne, a Cooke, a Horse-keeper, a Lacquie, a Butler, and a Horse, whiche thei al at first strangle, and thruste in."—W. Watreman, Fardle of Faciouns, N. 1.

1609. "Watermen, Lackeyes, Horse-keepers."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 216.

1673. "On St. George's Day I was commanded by the Honorable Gerald Aungier . . . to embarque on a Bombaim Boat . . . waited on by two of the Governor's servants . . . an Horsekeeper . . ."—Fryer, 123.

1698. ". . . followed by his boy . . . and his horsekeeper."—In Wheeler, i. 300.

1829. "In my English buggy, with lamps lighted and an English sort of a nag, I might almost have fancied myself in England, but for the black horse-keeper alongside of me."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 87.

1837. "Even my horse pretends he is too fine to switch off his own flies with his own long tail, but turns his head round to order the horsekeeper . . . to wipe them off for him."—Letters from Madras, 50.

Horse-radish tree, s. This is a common name, in both N. & S. India, for the tree called in Hind. sahajūā; Moringa pterygosperma, Gaertn., Hy- peranthera Moringa, Vahl, (N. O. Moringaceae), in Sankst. sobhānjana. Sir G. Birdwood says: "A marvellous tree botanically, as no one knows in what order to put it; it has links with so many; and it is evidently a 'head-centre' in the progressive development of forms." The name is given because the scraped root is used in place of horse-radish, which it closely resembles in flavour. In S. India the same plant is called the Drumstick-tree (q.v.), from the shape of the long slender fruit, which is used as a vegetable, or in curry, or made into a native pickle "most nauseous to Europeans" (Punjab Plants). It is a native of N.W. India, and also extensively cultivated in India and other tropical countries, and is used also for many purposes in the native pharmacopœia.

Hosbolhookum, &c. Properly (Arab. used in Hind.) hasb-ul-hukm, literally 'according to order'; these words forming the initial formula of a document issued by officers of state on royal authority, and thence applied as the title of such a document.

1702. "The Nabob told me that the great God knows that he had ever a hearty respect for the English . . . saying, here is the Hosbulhookum, which the king has sent me to seize Factories and all their effects."—In Wheeler, i. 387.

1727. "The Phirmaund is presented (by the Goosberdaar,* or Hosbalhouckain, or, in English, the King's Messenger) and the Governor of the Province or City makes a short speech."—A. Ham. i. 230 (233).

1759. "Housbul-hookum (under the great seal of the Nabob Vizier, Ulmah Maleck, Nizam al Mulack Bahadour. Be peace unto the high and renowned Mr. John Spencer . . . )"—In Cambridge's Acct. of the War, &c., 229.

The same author (1761) says:—

"A grant signed by the Mogul is called a Phirmaund (farmān). By the Mogul's Son, a Nushawn (nishān). By the Nabob, a Pervanna (parvāna). By the Vizier, a Housbul-hookum."—Account of the War, &c., 226.

Hot-winds, s. This may almost be termed the name of one of the seasons of the year in Upper India, when the hot dry westerly winds prevail, and such aids to coolness as the tatty and thermantidote (qq.v.) are brought into use. May is the typical month of such winds.

1804. "Holkar appears to me to wish to avoid the contest at present; and so does Gen. Lake, possibly from a desire to give his troops some repose, and not to expose the Europeans to the hot winds in Hindustan."—Wellington, iii. 180.

1873. "It's no good thinking of lunch in this roaring hot wind that's getting up, so we shall be all light and fresh for another shy at the pigs this afternoon."—The True Reformer, i. p. 8.

Howdah, vulg. Howder, &c., s. Hind. modified from Arab. haudaj. A great chair or framed seat carried by an elephant. The original Arabic word haudaj is applied to litters carried by camels.

c. 1663. "At other times he rideth on an Elephant in a Mik-dember or Hauze . . . the Mik-dember being a little square House or Turret of Wood, is always painted and gilded; and the Hauze, which is an Oval seat, having a Canopy with Pillars over it, is so likewise."—Bernier, E. T. 119.

c. 1785. "Colonel Smith . . . reviewed his troops from the houdar of his elephant."—Carraccioli's L. of Clive, iii. 133.

A popular rhyme which was applied in India successively to Warren Hastings' escape from Benares in 1781, and to Col. Monson's retreat from Malwa in 1804, and which was perhaps much older than either, runs:

Ghore par hauda, hūhī par jīn

Jaldi bhāg-gāyā (Warren Hastin!

Kornāil Munsin!)

which may be rendered with some anachronism in expression,

"Horses with howdahs, and elephants saddled Off helter skelter the Sahibs skedaddled."

1831.

"And when they talked of Elephants,

And riding in my Howder,

(So it was called by all my aunts)

I prouder grew and prouder."

H. M. Parker, in Bengal Annual, 119.

1856.

"But she, the gallant lady, holding fast

With one soft arm the jewelled howdah's side,

Still with the other circles tight the babe

Sore smitten by a cruel shaft . . ."

The Banyan Tree, a Poem.

1863. "Elephants are also liable to be disabled . . . ulcers arise from neglect or carelessness in fitting on the howdah."—Sat. Review, 6th Sept., 1863, 312.

Hubba, s. A grain; a jot or tittle. Ar. habba.

1786. "For two years we have not received a hubba on account of our tunkaw, though the ministers have annually charged a lac of rupees, and never paid us anything."—In Art. ag. Hastings, Burke, vii. 141.

Hubble-bubble, s. An onomatopoeia applied to the hooka in its rudimentary form, as used by the masses in India. Tobacco, or a mixture containing tobacco among other things, is placed with embers in a terra-cotta chillum (q.v.), from which a reed carries the smoke into a coco-nut shell half full of water, and the smoke is drawn through a hole in the side, generally without any kind of mouth-piece, making a bubbling or gurgling sound. An elaborate description is given in Terry's Voyage (see below), and another in Govinda Samanta, i. 29 (1872).

1616. "... they have little Earthen Pots . . . having a narrow neck and an open round top, out of the belly of which comes a small spout, to the lower part of which spout they fill the Pot with water : then putting their Tobacco loose in the top, and a burning coal upon it, they having first fastened a very small strait hollow Cane or Reed . . . within that spout . . . the Pot standing on the ground, draw that smoke into their mouths, which first falls upon the Superficies of the water, and much discolours it. And this way of taking their Tobacco, they believe makes it much more cool and wholesome."—Terry, ed. of 1665, p. 363.

c. 1630. "Tobacco is of great account here; not strong (as our men love), but weak and leafy; sucked out of long canes call'd hubble-bubbles . . ."—Sir T. Herbert, 28.

1673. "Coming back I found my troublesome Comrade very merry, and packing up his Household Stuff, his Bang bowl, and Hubble-bubble, to go along with me."—Fryer, 127.

"... bolstered up with embroidered Cushions, smoking out of a silver Hubble-bubble."—Ibid. 131.

1697. "... Yesterday the King's Dewan, and this day the King's Buxee . . . arrived . . . to each of whom sent two bottles of Rose-water, and a glass Hubble-bubble, with a compliment."—In Wheeler, i. 318.

c. 1760. See Grose, i. 146.

1811. "Cette manière de fumer est extrêmement commune . . . on la nomme Hubble de Bubbet."—Solreys, tom. iii.

1868. "His (the Dyak's) favourite pipe is a huge Hubble-bubble."—Wallace, Mal. Archip., ed. 1880, p. 80.

Hubshee, n.p. Arab. Ḥabashī, Pers. Ī abshī, 'an Abyssinian,' an Ethiopian, a negro. The name is often specifically applied to the chief of Jinjira on the western coast, who is the descendant of an Abyssinian family.

1208. "There are numerous cities and villages in this province of Abash, and many merchants."—Marco Polo, 2d ed. ii. 425.

1553. "At this time, among certain Moors, who came to sell provisions to the ships, had come three Abeshis (Abeshis) of the country of the Prester John . . ."—Barros, i. iv. 4.

1673. "Cows Cawn, an Hobsy or Arabian Coffery."—Fryer, 147.

1681. "Habessini . . . nunc passim nominantur; vocabulo ab Arabibus indito, quibus Habesh colluvium vel mixturam gentium denotat."—Ludolphi Hist. Aethiop. lib. i. c. i.

1750-60. "The Moors are also fond of having Abyssinian slaves, known in India by the name of Hobshy Coffreers."—Grose, i. 148.

1884. "One of my Tibetan ponies had short curly brown hair, and was called both by my servants, and by Dr. Campbell, 'a Hubshee.'"

"I understood that the name was specific for that description of pony amongst the traders."—Note by Sir Joseph Hooker.

Huck, s. Properly Arab. ḥakk. A just right; a lawful claim; a perquisite claimable by established usage.

Huckeem, s. Ar. Hind. ḥakīm; a physician. See note under Hakim.

1622. "I, who was thinking little or nothing about myself, was forthwith put by them into the hands of an excellent physician, a native of Shiraz, who then happened to be at Lar, and whose name was Hekim Abu'l fetah. The word hekim signifies 'wise;' it is a title which it is the custom to give to all those learned in medical matters."—P. della Valle, ii. 318.

1673. "My Attendance is engaged, and a Million of Promises, could I restore him to his Health, laid down from his Wives, Children, and Relations, who all (with the Citizens, as I could hear going along) pray to God that the Hackin Frangi, the Frank Doctor, might kill him . . ."—Fryer, 312.

1836. "A curious cry of the seller of a kind of sweetmeat (ḥalāweh) composed of treacle fried with some other ingredients, is 'For a nail! O sweetmeat!' . . . children and servants often steal implements of iron, &c., from the house . . . and give them to him in exchange."—Lane, Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1863.

1837. "I had the native works on Materia Medica collated by competent Hakeems and Moonshees."—Royle, Hindoo Medicine, 25.

Hullia, s. Canarese holeya; the same as poleya (pulayan), q.v., equivalent to Pariah (q.v.).

1817. "... a Huliā or Pariar King."—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, i. 151.

1874. "At Melkotta, the chief seat of the followers of Rāmānya Achārya, and at the Brāhman temple at Bailur, the Holeyars or Pareyars have the right of entering the temple on three days in the year, specially set apart for them."—M. J. Falhouse, in Ind. Antig. iii. 191.

Hulwa, s. Ar. ḥalwā and ḥalāwa is generic for sweetmeat, and the word is in use from Constantinople to Calcutta. In Hind. the word represents a particular class, of which the ingredients are milk, sugar, almond paste, and ghee flavoured with cardamom. "The best at Bombay is imported from Muskat" (Birdwood).

1672. "Ce qui estoit le plus plaisant, c'estoit un homme qui précédoit le corps des confituriers, lequel avoit une chemise qui luy descendoit aux talons, toute couverte d'alva, c'est à dire, de confiture."—Journ. d'Ant. Galland, i. 118.

1673. "... the Widow once a Moon (to) go to the Grave with her Acquaintance to repeat the doleful Dirge, after which she bestows Holway, a kind of Sacramental Wafer; and entreats their Prayers for the Soul of the Departed."—Fryer, 94.

Hummaul, s. Arab. ḥammāl, a porter. The use of the word in India is confined to the west, and there now most commonly indicates a palankin-bearer. The word still survives in parts of Sicily in the form camallu=It. 'faccino,' a relic of the Saracenic occupation. In Andalusia alhamel now means a man who lets out a baggage horse; and the word is also used in Morocco in the same way (Dozy).

c. 1350. "Those rustics whom they call camalls (camallos), whose business it is to carry burdens, and also to carry men and women on their shoulders in litters, such as are mentioned in Canticles: Ferculum fecit sibi Solomon de tignis Libani," whereby is meant a portable litter such as I used to be carried in at Zayton, and in India."—John de Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 366.

1691. "His honour was carried by the Amaals, i.e. the Palankyn-bearers, 12 in number, sitting in his Palankyn."—Valentijn, v. 266.

1711. "Hamalage, or Cooley-hire, at 1 oz (see Gosbeck) for every maund Tabrees."—Tariff in Lockyer, 243.

1750-60. "The Hamauls or porters, who make a livelihood of carrying goods to and from the warehouses."—Grose, i. 120.

1809. "The palankeen-bearers are here called hamauls (a word signifying carrier)

... these people come chiefly from the Mahratta country, and are of the coombie or agricultural caste."—Maria Graham, 2.

1813. For Hamauls at Bussora, see Milburn, i. 126.

1840. "The hamals groaned under the weight of their precious load, the Apostle of the Ganges" (Dr. Duff to wit).—Smith's Life of Dr. John Wilson, 1878, p. 282.

1877. "The stately iron gate enclosing the front garden of the Russian Embassy was beset by a motley crowd... Hamals, or street porters, bent double under the burden of heavy trunks and boxes, would come now and then up one or other of the two semi-circular avenues."—Letter from Constant. in Times, May 7th.

Humming-bird, s. This name is popularly applied in some parts of India to the sun-birds (sub-fam. Nectarininae.)

Hump, s. "Calcutta humps" are the salted humps of Indian oxen, exported from that city. See under Buffalo.

Hurcarra, hircara, &c., s. Hind. harkāra, "a messenger, a courier; an emissary, a spy" (Wilson). The etymology, according to the same authority, is har ('every'), kūr ('business').

The word became very familiar in the Gilchristian spelling Hurkaru, from the existence of a Calcutta newspaper bearing that title ("Bengal Hurkaru," generally enunciated by non-Indians as Hurkierōō), for the first 60 years of this century, or thereabouts.

1748. "The city of Dacca is in the utmost confusion on account of ... advices of a large force of Mahrattas coming by way of the Sunderbunds, and that they were advanced as far as Sundra Col, when first descried by their Hurcurrahs."—In Long, 4.

1757. "I beg you to send me a good alcara who understands the Portuguese language."—Letter in Iles, 159.

"Hircars or Spies."—Id. 161.

1761. "The head Harcar returned, and told me this as well as several other secrets very useful to me, which I got from him by dint of money and some rum."—Letter of Capt. Martin White, in Long, 260.

1780. "One day upon the march a Hircarra came up and delivered him a letter from Colonel Baillie."—Letter of T. Munro, in Life, i. 26.

1803. "The Hircarras reported the enemy to be at Bokerdun."—Letter of A. Wellesley in id. 348.

c. 1810. "We were met on the entrance of Tippoo's dominions by four hircarrahs, or soldiers, whom the Sultan sent as a guard to conduct us safely."—Miss Edgeworth, Lame Jervas.

Miss Edgeworth has oddly misused the word here.

1813. "The contrivances of the native halcarrahs and spies to conceal a letter are extremely clever, and the measures they frequently adopt to elude the vigilance of an enemy are equally extraordinary."—Forbes, Or. Mem., iv. 129.

Hurtaul, s. Hind. from Sansk. hartāl or haritāl, yellow arsenic, orpiment.

c. 1347. Ibn Batuta seems oddly to confound it with camphor: "The best (camphor) called in the country itself al-hardāla, is that which attains the highest degree of cold."—iv. 241.

c. 1750. "... Hartal and Cotch, Earth-Oil and Wood-Oil . . ."—List of Burmese Products, in Darbymple's Or. Reper., i. 109.

Hazāra, n.p. This name has two quite distinct uses.

(a.) Pers. Hazāra. It is used as a generic name for a number of tribes occupying some of the wildest parts of Afghanistan, chiefly N.W. and S.W. of Kabul. These tribes are in no respect Afghan, but are in fact most or all of them Mongol in features, and some of them also in language.

The term at one time appears to have been used more generally for a variety of the wilder clans in the higher hill countries of Afghanistan and the Oxus basin, much as in Scotland a century and a half ago they spoke of "the clans." It appears to be merely from the Persian hazār = 1000. The regiments, so to speak, of the Mongol hosts of Chinghiz and his immediate successors, were called hazāras, and if we accept the belief that the Hazaras of Afghanistan were predatory bands of those hosts who settled in that region (in favour of which there is a good deal to be said), this name is intelligible. If so, its application to the non-Mongol hill people of Wakhān, &c., must have been a later transfer.

c. 1480. "The Hazāra, Takdari,* and all the other tribes having seen this, quietly submitted to his authority."—Tarkhān-Nāma, in Elliot, i. 303.

c. 1505. Kabul "on the west has the mountain districts, in which are situated Karnūd and Ghūr. This mountainous tract is at present occupied and inhabited by the Hazāra and Nukderi tribes."—Baber, p. 136.

1508. "Mirza Ababeker, the ruler and tyrant of Kāshghar, had seized all the Upper Hazāras of Badakhshān."—Erskine's Baber and Humāyūn, i. 287.

(b.) A mountain district in the extreme N.W. of the Punjab, of which Abbottābād, called after its founder General James Abbott, is the British head-quarter. The name of this region apparently has nothing to do with Hazāras in the tribal sense, but is probably a survival of the ancient name of a territory in this quarter, called in Sanskrit Abhisāra, and figuring in Ptolemy, Arrian, and Curtius as the kingdom of King Abisares.

Huzoor, s. Arab. ḥuzūr, 'the presence'; used by natives as a respectful way of speaking of or to exalted personages, to or of their master, or occasionally of any European gentleman in presence of another European.

Hyson. See under Tea.

I.

Imaum, s. Ar. Imām, 'an exemplar, a leader,' (from a root signifying 'to aim at, to follow after'), a title technically applied to the Caliph (Khalīfa) or 'Vicegerent,' or Successor, who is the head of Islām. The title "is also given—in its religious import only—to the heads of the four orthodox sects . . . and in a more restricted sense still, to the ordinary functionary of a mosque who leads in the daily prayers of the congregation" (Dr. Badger, Omān, App. A.).

The title has been perhaps most familiar to Anglo-Indians as that of the Princes of Omān, or "Imaums of Muscat" as they were commonly termed. This title they derived from being the heads of a sect (Ibādhiya) holding peculiar doctrine as to the Imamate, and rejecting the Caliphate of Ali or his successors. It has not been assumed by the Princes themselves since Sa'īd bin Ahmad who died in the early part of this century, but was always applied by the English to * Probably read Nakudari, and see Murao Polo, Bk. I. ch. 18, note on Nigudari.

* "Hazārājāt bāddest. The upper districts in Badakhshān were called Hazāras," Erskine's Note. He is using the Tarikh Rashidi. But is not the word Hazāras here, 'the clans,' used elliptically for the highland districts occupied by them?

Saiyid Sa'id, who reigned for 52 years, dying in 1856. Since then, and since the separation of the dominions of the dynasty in Oman and in Africa, the title Imām has no longer been used.

It is a singular thing that in an article on Zanzibar in the J. R. Geog. Soc., vol. xxiii. by the late Col. Sykes, the Sultan is called always the Imaun.

1673. "At Night we saw Muschat, whose vast and horrid Mountains no Shade but Heaven does hide . . . The Prince of this country is called Imaum, who is guardian at Mahomet's Tomb, and on whom is devolved the right of Caliphship according to the Ottoman belief."—Fryer, 220.

Imaumbarra, s. This is apparently a hybrid word Imām-bāra, in which the last part is the Hindi bāra, 'an enclosure,' etc. It is applied to a building maintained by Shī'a communities in India for the express purpose of celebrating the Muharram ceremonies (see Hobson-Jobson). The sepulchre of the Founder and his family is often combined with this object.

The Imambāra of the Nawāb Asaf-ud-daula at Lucknow is, or was till the siege of 1858, probably the most magnificent modern Oriental structure in India. It united with the objects already mentioned a mosque, a college, and apartments for the members of the religious establishment. The great hall is "conceived on so grand a scale," says Fergusson, "as to entitle it to rank with the buildings of an earlier age." The central part of it forms a vaulted apartment of 162 feet long by 53½ wide.

Impale, v. It is startling to find an injunction to impale criminals given by an English governor (Vansittart, apparently) little more than a century ago :

1764. "I request that you will give orders to the Naib of Dacca to send some of the Factory Sepoys along with some of his own people, to apprehend the said murderers and to impale them, which will be very serviceable to traders."—The Governor of Fort William to the Nawab; in Long, 389.

Inaum, Enaum, s. Arab. in'ām, 'a gift' (from a superior), a favour, but especially in India a gift of rent-free land : also land so held. In'ām-dār, the holder of such lands. A full detail of the different kinds of in'ām, especially among the Mahrattas, will be found in Wilson, s.v.

The word is also used in Western India for buksheesh (q. v.).

This use is said to have given rise to a little mistake on the part of an English political traveller some 20 or 30 years ago, when there had been some agitation regarding the in'ām lands and the alleged harshness of the Government in dealing with such claims. The traveller reported that the public feeling in the west of India was so strong on this subject, that his very palankin-bearers at the end of their stage invariably joined their hands in supplication, shouting, "In'ām ! In'ām ! Sahib !"

India, Indies, n.p. A book might be written on this name. We can only notice a few points in connexion with it.

It is not easy, if it be possible, to find a truly native (i.e., Hindu) name for the whole country which we call India; but the conception certainly existed from an early date. Bhārata-varsha is used apparently in the Puranas with something like this conception. Jambudvīpa, a term belonging to the mythical cosmography, is used in the Buddhist books, and sometimes, by natives of the south, even now. The accuracy of the definitions of India in some of the Greek and Roman writers shows the existence of the same conception of the country that we have now; a conception also obvious in the modes of speech of Hwen T'sang and the other Chinese pilgrims. The Asoka inscriptions, c. B. C. 250, had enumerated Indian kingdoms covering a considerable part of the conception, and in the great inscription at Tanjore, of the 11th century A.D., which incidentally mentions the conquest (real or imaginary) of a great part of India, by the king of Tanjore, Vira-Chola, the same system is followed. In a copperplate of the 11th century, by the Chalukya dynasty of Kalyāna, we find the expression "from the Himālaya to the Bridge" (Ind. Antig. i, 81), i.e., the Bridge of Rāma, or 'Adam's Bridge,' as our maps have it. And Mahomedan definitions as old, and with the name, will be found below. Under the Hindu kings of Vijaynagara also (from 14th century) inscriptions indicate all India by like expressions.

The origin of the name is without doubt (Sansk.) Sindhu, 'the sea,' and thence the Great River on the West, and the country on its banks, which we still call Sindh.* By a change common in many parts of the world, and in various parts of India itself, this name exchanged the initial sibilant for an aspirate, and became (eventually) in Persia Hindū, and so passed to the Greeks and Latins, viz. Ἰνδοί for the people, Ἰνδός for the river, Ἰνδική and Ἰνδία for the country on its banks. Given this name for the western tract, and the conception of the country as a whole to which we have alluded, the name in the mouths of foreigners naturally but gradually spread to the whole.

Some have imagined that the name of the land of Nod ('wandering'), to which Cain is said to have migrated, and which has the same consonants, is but a form of this; which is worth noting, as this idea may have had to do with the curious statement in some medieval writers (e.g. John Marignolli) that certain eastern races were "the descendants of Cain." In the form Hidhu, India appears in the great cuneiform inscription on the tomb of Darius Hystaspes near Persepolis, coupled with Gadāra (i.e., Gandhāra, or the Peshawur country), and no doubt still in some degree restricted in its application. In the Hebrew of Esther i. 1, and viii. 9, the form is Hoddu (see also Peritsoi below). The first Greek writers to speak of India and the Indians were Hecataeus of Miletus, Herodotus, and Ctesias (B.C. c. 500, c. 440, c. 400). The last, though repeating more fables than Herodotus, shows a truer conception of what India was.

Before going further, we ought to point out that India itself is a Latin form, and does not appear in a Greek writer, we believe, before Lucian and Polyænus, both writers of the middle of the 2nd century. The Greek form is ἡ Ἰνδική, or else 'The Land of the Indians.'

The name of "India" spread not only from its original application, as denoting the country on the banks of the Indus, to the whole peninsula between (and including) the valleys of Indus and Ganges; but also in a vaguer way to all the regions beyond. The compromise between the vaguer and the more precise use of the term is seen in Ptolemy, where the boundaries of the true India are defined, on the whole with surprising exactness, as 'India within the Ganges;' whilst the darker regions beyond appear as 'India beyond the Ganges.' And this double conception of India, as 'India Proper' (as we may call it), and India in the vaguer sense, has descended to our own time.

So vague became the conception in the 'dark ages' that the name is sometimes found to be used as synonymous with Asia, 'Europe, Africa, and India' forming the three parts of the world. Earlier than this, however, we find a tendency to discriminate different Indias, in a form distinct from Ptolemy's Intra et extra Gangem; and the terms India Major, India Minor can be traced back to the 4th century. As was natural where there was so little knowledge, the application of these terms was various and oscillating, but they continued to hold their ground for 1000 years, and in the later centuries of that period we generally find a third India also, and a tendency (of which the roots go back, as far at least as Virgil's time) to place one of the three in Africa.

It is this conception of a twofold or threefold India that has given to us and other nations of Europe the vernacular expressions in plural form which hold their ground to this day: the Indies, les Indes, (It.) le Indie, &c.

We may add further, that China is called by Friar Odoric Upper India (India Superior), whilst Marignolli calls it India Magna and Maxima, and calls Malabar India Parva, and India Inferior.

There was yet another, and an oriental application of the term India to the country at the mouth of the Euphrates and Tigris, which the people of Basra still call Hind; and which Sir H. Rawlinson connects with the fact that the Talmudic writers confounded Obilalah in that region with the Havilah of Genesis.*

In the work of the Chinese traveller

* In most of the important Asiatic languages the same word indicates the Sea or a River of the first class; e.g. Sindhu as here; in Western Tibet gyamto and Samundrang (corr. of Skt. samundra) 'the Sea,' which are applied to the Indus and Sutlej (see J. R. Geog. Soc. xxiii. 34-35); Hebrew yam, applied both to the sea and to the Nile; Ar. bahr; Pers. daryā; Mongol. dalai, &c. Compare the Homeric Ἠεκάτης.

* See Cathay, &c. 55, note.

Hwen T'sang again we find that by him also and his coreligionists a plurality of Indias was recognized, i.e., five, viz., North, Central, East, South, and West.

Here we may remark how two names grew out of the original Sindhu. The aspirated and Persianised form Hind, as applied to the great country beyond the Indus, passed to the Arabs. But when they invaded the valley of the Indus and found it called Sindhu, they adopted that name in the form Sind, and thenceforward 'Hind and Sind' were habitually distinguished, though generally coupled, and conceived as two parts of a great whole.

Of the application of India to an Ethiopian region, an application of which indications extend over 1500 years, we have not space to speak here.*

The vague extension of the term India to which we have referred, survives in another form besides that in the use of "Indies." India, to each European nation which has possessions in the East, may be said, without much inaccuracy, to mean in colloquial use that part of the East in which their own possessions lie. Thus to the Portuguese, India was, and probably still is, the West Coast only. In their writers of the 16th and 17th century a frequent distinction is made between India, the territory of the Portuguese and their immediate neighbours on the West coast, and Mogor, the dominion of the Great Mogul. To the Dutchman India means Java and its dependencies. To the Spaniard, if we mistake not, India is Manila. To the Gaul are not les Indes Pondicherry, Chandernagore, and Réunion?

As regards the West Indies, this expression originates in the misconception of the great Admiral himself, who in his memorable enterprise was seeking, and thought he had found, a new route to the "Indias" by sailing west instead of east. His discoveries were to Spain the Indies, until it gradually became manifest that they were not identical with the ancient lands of the east, and then they became the West-Indies.

Indian is a name which has been carried still further abroad; from being applied, as a matter of course, to the natives of the islands, supposed of India, discovered by Columbus, it naturally passed to the natives of the adjoining continent, till it came to be the familiar name of all the tribes between (and sometimes even including) the Esquimaux of the North and the Patagonians of the South.

This abuse no doubt has led to our hesitation in applying the term to a native of India itself. We use the adjective Indian, but no modern Englishman who has had to do with India ever speaks of a man of that country as "an Indian." Forrest, in his Voyage to Mergui, uses the inelegant word Indostaners; but in India itself a Hindustani means, as has been indicated under that word, a native of the upper Gangetic valley and adjoining districts.

Among the Greeks 'an Indian' (Ἰνδός) acquired a notable specific application, viz., to an elephant driver or mahout (q.v.).

B.C. c. 486. "Says Darius the King: By the grace of Ormazd these (are) the countries which I have acquired besides Persia. I have established my power over them. They have brought tribute to me. That which has been said to them by me they have done. They have obeyed my law. Medea . . . Arachotia (Harauvatish), Sattagydia (Thatagush), Gancaria (Gadāra), India (Hidush)" . . . —On the Tomb of Darius at Nakhsh-i-Rustam, see Ravlinson's Herod. iv. 250.

B.C. c. 440. "Eastward of India lies a tract which is entirely sand. Indeed, of all the inhabitants of Asia, concerning whom anything certain is known, the Indians dwell nearest to the east, and the rising of the Sun."—Herodotus, iii. c. 98 (Ravlinson).

B.C. c. 300. "India then (ἡ τοῦτον Ἰνδική) being four-sided in plan, the side which looks to the Orient and that to the South, the Great Sea compasseth; that towards the Arctic is divided by the mountain chain of Hēmodus from Scythia, inhabited by that tribe of Scythians who are called Sakai; and on the fourth side, turned towards the West, the Indus marks the boundary, the biggest or nearly so of all rivers after the Nile."—Megasthenes, in Diodorus, ii. 35. (From Müller's Fragm. Hist. Græc., ii. 402.)

A.D. c. 140. "Τὰ δὲ ἀπὸ τοῦ Ἰνδοῦ πρὸς ἄνω, τοῦτό μοι ἔστω ἡ τῶν Ἰνδῶν γῆ, καὶ Ἰνδοὶ οὗτοι ἔσονται."—Arrian, Indica, ch. ii.

c. 650. "The name of T'ien-chu (India) has gone through various and confused forms . . . . Anciently they said Shin-tu ; whilst some authors call it Hien-teou. Now conforming to the true pronunciation one should say In-tu."—Hwen-T'sang, in Pel. Bouddh., ii. 57.

c. 944. "For the nonce let us confine ourselves to summary notices concerning the kings of Sind and Hind. The language of Sind is different from that of Hind . . . ."—Mas'udi, i. 381.

c. 590. "As for the land of the Hind it is bounded on the East by the Persian Sea (i.e. the Indian Ocean), on the W. and S. by the countries of Islām, and on the N. by the Chinese Empire . . . . The length of the land of the Hind from the government of Mokran, the country of Manštra and Bodha and the rest of Sind, till thou comest to Kannūj and thence passest on to Tobbat (see Tibet), is about 4 months, and its breadth from the Indian Ocean to the country of Kannūj about three months."—Istakhri, pp. 6 and 11.

c. 1020. "India (Al-Hind) is one of those plains, bounded on the south by the Sea of the Indians. Lofty mountains bound it on all the other quarters. Through this plain the waters descending from the mountains are discharged. Moreover, if thou wilt examine this country with thine eyes, if thou wilt regard the rounded and worn stones that are found in the soil, however deep thou mayest dig,—stones which near the mountains, where the rivers roll down violently, are large; but small at a distance from the mountains, where the current slackens; and which become mere sand where the currents are at rest, where the waters sink into the soil, and where the sea is at hand—then thou wilt be tempted to believe that this country was at a former period only a sea which the debris washed down by the torrents hath filled up . . . ."—Al-Birūnī, in Reinaud's Extracts, Journ. As., Ser. IV. 1844.

"Hind is surrounded on the East by Chīn and Māchin, on the west by Sind and Kābul, and on the south by the Sea."—Id. in Elliot, i. 45.

1205. "The whole country of Hind, from Pershaur to the shores of the Ocean, and in the other direction, from Siwistān to the hills of Chīn . . . ."—Hasan Nizāmī in Elliot, ii. 236.

That is, from Peshawar in the north, to the Indian Ocean in the south; from Sehwan (on the west bank of the Indus) to the mountains on the east dividing from China.

c. 1500. "Hodu quae est India extra et intra Gangem."—Itinera Mundi (in Hebrew), by Abū Peritsoḥ, in Hyde, Syntagma Disert., Oxon, 1767, i. 75.

1553. "And had Vasco da Gama belonged to a nation so glorious as the Romans he would perchance have added to the style of his family, noble as that is, the surname 'Of India,' since we know that those symbols of honour that a man wins are more glorious than those that he inherits, and that Scipio gloried more in the achievement which gave him the surname of 'Africanus,' than in the name of Cornelius, which was that of his family."—Barros, I. iv. 12.

1572. Defined, without being named, by Camoens :

"Alem do Indo faz, e aquem do Gange
Hu terreno muy grãde, e assaz famoso,
Que pela parte Austral o mar abrange,
E para o Norte o Emodio cavernoso."

Lusiadas, vii. 17.

Englished by Burton :

"Outside of Indus, inside Ganges, lies a wide-spread country, famed enough of yore;
northward the peaks of caved Emódus
rise, and southward Ocean doth confine the shore."

1577. "India is properly called that great Province of Asia, in the whiche great Alexander kepte his warres, and was so named of the ryuer Indus."—Eden, Hist. of Travayle, f. 3 v.

The distinct Indias.

c. 650. "The circumference of the Five Indies is about 90,000 li; on three sides it is bounded by a great sea; on the north it is backed by snowy mountains. It is wide at the north and narrow at the south; its figure is that of a half-moon."—Hwen T'sang, in Pel. Bouddh., ii. 58.

1298. "India the Greater is that which extends from Maabar to Kesmacoran,* and it contains 13 great kingdoms. . . . India the Lesser extends from the Province of Champa to Mutfilī,† and contains 8 great Kingdoms. . . . Abash (Abyssinia) is a very great province, and you must know that it constitutes the Middle India."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 34, 35.

c. 1328. "What shall I say? The greatness of this India is beyond description. But let this much suffice concerning India the Greater and the Less. Of India Tertia I will say this, that I have not indeed seen its many marvels, not having been there. . . ."—Friar Jordanus, p. 41.

Indies.

c. 1601. "He does smile his face into more lines than are in the new map with the augmentation of the Indiaes."—Twelfth Night, Act III. sc. 2.

1653. "I was thirteen times captive and seventeen times sold in the Indies."—Trans. of Pinto by H. Cogan, p. 1.

1826. ". . . Like a French lady of my acquaintance, who had so general a notion of the East, that upon taking leave of her, she enjoined me to get acquainted with a friend of hers, living as she said quelque part dans les Indes, and whom, to my astonishment, I found residing at the Cape of Good

India of the Portuguese.

1598. "At the ende of the countrey of Cambai beginneth India and the lands of Decan and Cuncam . . . from the island called Das Vagnas (read Vaguas) . . . which is the righte coast that in all the East Countries is called India . . . Now you must vnderstande that this coast of India beginneth at Daman, or the Island Das Vaguas, and stretched South and by East, to the Cape of Comorin, where it endeth."—Linschoten, ch. ix.-x.

See also quotation from the same under Abada.

c. 1567. "Di qui (Coilan) a Cao Comeris si fanno settanta due miglia, e qui si finisce la costa dell' India."—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 390.

c. 1610. "Il y a grand nombre des Portugais qui demeurent es ports du coste de Bengale . . . ils n'osient retourner en l'Inde, pour quelques fautes qu'ils y ont commis."—Pyrard de la Val, i. 239.

1615. "Sociorum literis, qui Mogoris Regiam incolunt auditum est in India de celeberrimo Regno illo quod Saraceni Cataium vocant."—Trigautius, De Christianâ Expeditione apud Sinas, p. 544.

1644. (Speaking of the Daman district above Bombay)—"The fruits are nearly all the same as those that you get in India, and especially many Mangas and Cassaras (?), which are like chestnuts."—Bocarro, MS.

1673. "The Portugals . . . might have subdued India by this time, had not we fallen out with them, and given them the first Blow at Ormuz . . . they have added some Christians to those formerly converted by St. Thomas, but it is a loud Report to say all India."—Fryer, 137.

1881. In a correspondence with Sir R. Morier, we observe the Portuguese Minister of Foreign Affairs calls their Goa Viceroy "The Governor General of India."

India of the Dutch.

1876. The Dorian "is common throughout all India."—Filet, Plant-Kunding Woordenboek, 196.

Indies applied to America.

1563. "And please to tell me . . . which is better, this (Radix Chinæ) or the guinaco of our Indies as we call them. . ."—Garcia, f. 177.

Indian. This word in English first occurs, according to Dr. Guest, in the following passage :

A.D. 433-440.

"Mid israelum ic waes
Mid ebreum and iudeum, and mid egyptum."

In Guest's English Rhythms, ii. 86-87.

But it may be queried whether iudeum is not here an error for iudeum ;

the converse error to that supposed to have been made in the printing of Othello's death-speech—

"Of one whose hand
Like the base Judean threw a pearl away."

Indian used for Mahout.

B.C. "And upon the beasts (the elephants) there were strong towers of wood, which covered every one of them, and were girt fast unto them with devices : there were also upon every one two and thirty strong men, that fought upon them, beside the Indian that ruled them."—I. Maccabees, vi. 37.

B.C. c. 150. "Of Beasts (i.e. elephants) taken with their Indians there were ten ; and of all the rest, which had thrown their Indians, he got possession after the battle by driving them together."—Polybius, Bk. i. ch. 40.

See also iii. 46, and xi. 1.

It is very curious to see the drivers of Carthaginian elephants thus called Indians, though it may be presumed that this is only a Greek application of the term, not a Carthaginian use.

B.C. c. 20. "Tertio die . . . ad Thabusion castellum imminens fluvio Indo ventum est ; cui fecerat nomen Indus ab elephanto dejectus."—Livy, Bk. xxxviii. 14.

This Indus or "Indian" River, named after the Mahout thrown into it by his elephant, was somewhere on the borders of Phrygia.

A.D. c. 210. "Along with this elephant was brought up a female one called Nikaia. And the wife of their Indian being near death placed her child of 30 days old beside this one. And when the woman died a certain marvellous attachment grew up of the Beast towards the child. . . ."—Athenæus, xiii. ch. 8.

Indian, for Anglo-Indian.

1816. ". . . our best Indians. In the idleness and obscurity of home they look back with fondness to the country where they have been useful and distinguished, like the ghosts of Homer's heroes, who prefer the exertions of a labourer on the earth to all the listless enjoyments of Elysium."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 367.

Indigo, s. The plant Indigofera tinctoria, L. (N. O. Leguminosæ), and the dark blue dye made from it. Greek Ἰνδικόν. This word appears from Hippocrates to have been applied in his time to pepper.

C.A.D. 60. "Of that which is called Ἰνδικόν one kind is produced spontaneously, being as it were a scum thrown out by the Indian reeds ; but that used for dyeing is a purple effluence which floats on the brazen cauldrons, which the craftsmen skim off and dry. That is deemed best which is blue in colour, succulent, and smooth to the touch."—Dioscorides, v. cap. 107.

c. 70. "After this . . . Indico (Indicum) is a colour most esteemed; out of India it commeth; whereupon it tooke the name; and it is nothing els but a slimie mud cleaving to the foame that gathereth about canes and reeds: whiles it is punned or ground, it looketh blacke; but being dissolved it yeeldeth a wonderfull lovely mixture of purple and azur . . . Indico is valued at 20 denarii the pound. In physicke there is use of this Indico; for it doth assuage swellings that doe stretch the skin."—Plinie, by Ph. Holland, ii. 531.

c. 80-90. "This river (Sinthus, i.e. Indus) has 7 mouths . . . and it has none of them navigable except the middle one only, on which there is a coast mart called Barbaricon . . . The articles imported into this mart are . . . On the other hand there are exported Costus, Bdelium . . . and Indian Black (Ἰνδικὸν μέλας, i.e. Indigo)."—Periplus, 38, 39.

1298. (At Coilum) "They have also abundance of very fine indigo (ymde). This is made of a certain herb which is gathered and [after the roots have been removed] is put into great vessels upon which they pour water, and then leave it till the whole of the plant is decomposed. . . ."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 22.

1584. "Indico from Zindi and Cambaia."—Barrett in Hakluyt, ii. 413.

1610. "In the country thereabouts is made some Indico."—Sir H. Middleton in Purchas, i. 259.

c. 1670. Tavernier gives a detailed account of the manufacture as it was in his time. "They that sift this Indigo must be careful to keep a Linnen-cloth before their faces, and that their nostrils be well stopt. . . . Yet . . . they that have sifted Indigo for 9 or 10 days shall spit nothing but blew for a good while together. Once I laid an egg in the morning among the sifters, and when I came to break it in the evening it was all blew within."—E. T., ii. 128-9.

We have no conception what is meant by the following singular (apparently sarcastic) entry in the "Indian Vocabulary":—

1788. "Indergo—a drug of no estimation that grows wild in the woods."

1881. "Découvertes et Inventions.—Décidément le cabinet Gladstone est poursuivi par la malechance. Voici un savant chimiste de Munich qui vient de trouver le moyen de préparer artificiellement et à très bon marché le bleu indigo. Cette découverte peut amener la ruine du gouvernement des Indes anglaises, qui est déjà menacé de la banqueroute. L'indigo, en effet, est le principal article de commerce des Indes (!): dans l'Allemagne, seulement, on en importe par an pour plus de cent cinquante millions de francs."—Havre Commercial Paper, quoted in Pioneer Mail, Feb. 3rd.

Inglees, s. Hind. Inglis and Inglis. Wilson gives as the explanation of this: "Invalid soldiers and sipahis, to whom allotments of land were assigned as pensions; the lands so granted." But the word is now used as the equivalent of (sepoys') pension simply.

Mr. Carnegie says the word is "probably a corruption of English, as pensions were unknown among native Governments, whose rewards invariably took the shape of land assignments." This, however is quite unsatisfactory; and Sir H. Elliott's suggestion (mentioned by Wilson) that the word was a corruption of invalid (which the sepoys may have confounded in some way with English) is most probable.

Interloper, s. One in former days who traded without the licence, or outside of the service, of a company (such as the E. I. C.) which had a charter of monopoly. The etymology of the word remains obscure. It looks like Dutch, but intelligent Dutch friends have sought in vain for a Dutch original. Onderloopen, the nearest word we can find, means 'to be inundated.' The hybrid etymology given by Bailey, though allowed by Skeat, seems hardly possible. Perhaps it is an English corruption from ontloopen, 'to evade, escape, run away from.'

1627. "Interlopers in trade, ¶ Attur Acad. pa. 54."—Minsheu.

(What is the meaning of the reference?)

1681. "The Shippe Expectation, Capt. Ally Cormand, an Interloper, arrived in ye Downes from Porto Novo."—Hedges, Journall (MS.).

1682. "The Spirit of Commerce, which sees its drifts with eagle's eyes, formed associations at the risque of trying the consequence at law . . . since the statutes did not authorize the Company to seize or stop the ships of these adventurers, whom they called Interlopers."—Orme's Fragments, 127.

1683. "If God gives me life to get this Phirmaund into my possession, ye Honble. Compy. shall never more be much troubled with Interlopers."—Hedges, Jan. 6.

1719. ". . . their business in the South Seas was to sweep those coasts clear of the French interlopers, which they did very effectually."—Shelvoke's Voyage, 29.

"I wish you would explain yourself; I cannot imagine what reason I have to be afraid of any of the Company's ships, or Dutch ships, I am no interloper."—Robinson Crusoe, Pt. ii.

1730. "To Interlope [of inter, L. between, and loopen, Du. to run, q. d. to run in between, and intercept the Commerce of others], to trade without proper Authority, or interfere with a Company in Commerce."—Bailey's English Dict. s. v.

1760. "Enterlooper. Terme de Commerce de Mer, fort en usage parmi les Compagnies des Pays du Nord, comme l'Angleterre, la Hollande, Hambourg, le Danemark, &c. Il signifie un vaisseau d'un particulier qui pratique et fréquente les Côtes, et les Havres ou Ports de Mer éloignés, pour y faire un commerce clandestin, au préjudice des Compagnies qui sont autorisées elles seules à le faire dans ces mêmes lieux. . . . Ce mot se prononce comme s'il étoit écrit Eintrelopre. Il est emprunté de l'Anglois, de enter qui signifie entrer et entreprendre, et de Looper, Courreur."—Savary des Bruslons, Dict. Univ. de Commerce, Nouv. ed., Copenhague, s. v.

I-say. The Chinese mob used to call the English soldiers A'says or Isays, from the frequency of this apostrophe in their mouths. (The French gamins, it is said, do the same at Boulogne.) At Amoy the Chinese used to call out after foreigners Akee! Akee! a tradition from the Portuguese Aqui! 'Here!' In Java the French are called by the natives Orang deedong, i.e. the dites-donc people. (See Fortune's Two Visits to the Tea Countries, 1853, p. 52; and Notes and Queries in China and Japan, ii. 175).

Ipecacuanha (Wild), s. The garden name of a plant (Asclepias curassavica, L.) naturalized in all tropical countries. It has nothing to do with the true ipecacuanha, but its root is a powerful emetic, whence the name. The true ipecacuanha is cultivated in India.

Iron-wood. This name is applied to several trees in different parts; e.g. to Mesua ferrea, L. (N. O. Clusiaceae). H. Nagkesar; and in the Burmese provinces to Xylia dolabriformis, Benth.

Iskat, s. Ratlines. A marine term from Port. escada (Roebuck).

Istoop, s. Oakum. A marine term from estopa (Roebuck).

Istubbul, s. This usual Hind. word for 'stable,' may naturally be imagined to be a corruption of the English word. But it is really Arab.

istabl, though that no doubt came in old times from the Latin stabulum through some Byzantine Greek form.

Itzeboo, s. A Japanese coin, the smallest silver denomination. Itsi-bū = "one drachm." Present value about 1s. See Cocks's Diary, i. 176, ii. 77.

J.

Jack, s. Short for Jack-Sepoy; in former days a familiar style for the native soldier; kindly, rather than otherwise.

1853. ". . . he should be leading the Jacks."—Oakfield, ii. 66.

Jack, s. The tree called by botanists Artocarpus integrifolia, L. fil., and its fruit.

The name, says Drury, is "a corruption of the Sansk. word Tchackka, which means the fruit of the tree" (Useful Plants, p. 55). There is, however, no such Sanskrit word; the Sanskrit names are Kantaka, Phala, Panasa, and Phalasa. Rheede rightly gives Tajaka (chākka) as the Malayalam name, and from this no doubt the Portuguese took jaca and handed it on to us. "They call it," says Garcia Orta, "in Malavar jacas, in Canarese and Guzerati panas" (f. 111). "The Tamil form is sākkei, the meaning of which, as may be deduced from the various uses to which the word is put in Tamil, is 'the fruit abounding in rind and refuse.'" (Letter from Bp. Caldwell.)

We can hardly doubt that this is the fruit of which Pliny writes: "Major alia pomo et suavitate præcellentior; quo sapientiores Indorum vivunt. (Folium alas avium imitatur longitudine trium cubitorum, latitudine duum.) Fructum e cortice mittit admirabilem succi dulcedine; ut uno quaternos satiet. Arbori nomen palae, pomo arieneae; plurima est in Sydracis, expeditionum Alexandri termino. Est et alia similis huic; dulcior pomo; sed interaneorum valetudini infesta." (Hist. Nat. xii. 12.) Thus rendered, not too faithfully, by Philemon Holland: "Another tree there is in India, greater yet than the former; bearing a fruit much fairer, bigger, and sweeter than the figs aforesaid; and whereof the Indian Sages and Philosophers do ordinarily live. The leaf resembleth birds' wings, carrying three cubits in length, and two in breadth. The fruit it putteth forth at the bark, having within it a wonderfull pleasant juice: insomuch as one of them is sufficient to give four men a competent and full refection. The tree's name is Pala, and the fruit is called Ariena. Great plenty of them is in the country of the Sydraci, the utmost limit of Alexander the Great his expeditions and voyages. And yet there is another tree much like to this, and beareth a fruit more delectable than this Ariena, albeit the guts in a man's belly it wringeth and breeds the bloudie flux " (i. 361).

Strange to say, the fruit thus described has been generally identified with the plantain: so generally that (we presume) the Linneæan name of the plantain, Musa sapientum, was founded upon the interpretation of this passage. Lassen, at first hesitatingly (i. 262), and then more positively (ii. 678), adopts this interpretation, and seeks Ariena in the Sansk. Vārāṇa. The shrewder Gildemeister does the like, for he, sans phrase, uses arienas as Latin for 'plantains.' Ritter, too, accepts it, and is not staggered even by the uno quaternos satiet. Humboldt, quoth he, often saw Indians make their meal with a very little manioc and three bananas of the big kind (Platano-arton). Still less sufficed the Indian Brahmins (sapientes), when one fruit was enough for four of them (v. 876, 877). Bless the venerable Prince of Geographers! Would one Kartoffel, even "of the big kind," make a dinner for four German Professors? Just as little would one plantain suffice four Indian Sages?

The words that we have italicised in the passage from Pliny are quite enough to show that the Jack is intended; the fruit growing e cortice (i.e. piercing the bark of the stem, not pendent from twigs like other fruit), the sweetness, the monstrous size, are in combination infallible. And as regards its being the food of sages, we may observe that the jack fruit is at this day in Travancore one of the staples of life. But that Pliny, after his manner, has jumbled things, is also manifest. The first two clauses of his description (Majer alia, &c.; Folium alas, &c.) are found in Theophrastus, but apply to two different trees. Hence we get rid of the puzzle about the big leaves, which led scholars astray after plantains, and originated Musa sapientum. And it is clear from Theophrastus that the fruit which caused dysentery in the Macedonian army was yet another. So Pliny has rolled three plants into one! Here are the passages of Theophrastus:—

"(1) And there is another tree which is both itself a tree of great size, and produces a fruit that is wonderfully big and sweet. This is used for food by the Indian Sages, who wear no clothes. (2) And there is yet another which has the leaf of a very long shape, and resembling the wings of birds, and this they set upon helmets; the length is about two cubits. . . . (3) There is another tree the fruit of which is long, and not straight but crooked, and sweet to the taste. But this gives rise to colic and dysentery ("Ἄλλο τέ ἐστιν οὗ ὁ καρπὸς μακρὸς καὶ οὐκ εὐθὺς ἀλλὰ σκολιὸς, ἐσθιόμενος δὲ γλαυκὸς. Οὗτος ἐν τῇ κοιλίᾳ θηγμὸν ποιεῖ καὶ δυσεντέριαν. . .") wherefore Alexander published a general order against eating it" (Hist. Plant. iv. 4-5).

It is plain that Pliny and Theophrastus were using the same authority, but neither copying the whole of what he found in it.

The second tree, whose leaves were like birds' wings and were used to fix upon helmets, is hard to identify. The first was, when we combine the additional characters quoted by Pliny but omitted by Theophrastus, certainly the Jack; the third was, we suspect, the mango (q.v.). The terms long and crooked would, perhaps, answer better to the plantain, but hardly the unwholesome effect. As regards the uno quaternos satiet, compare Friar Jordanus below on the Jack: "Sufficiet circiter pro quinque personis." Indeed the whole of the Friar's account is worth comparing with Pliny's. Pliny says it took four men to eat a jack, Jordanus says five. But an Englishman who had a plantation in Central Java told one of the present writers that he once cut a jack on his ground which took three men—not to eat—but to carry!

As regards the names given by Pliny it is hard to say anything to the purpose, because we do not know to which of the three trees jumbled together the names really applied. If pala really applied to the jack, possibly it may be the Sansk. phalasa, or panasa. Or it may be merely p'hala, 'a fruit,' and the passage would then be a comical illustration of the persistence of Indian habits of mind. For a stranger in India, on asking the question, 'What on earth is that?' as he well might on his first sight of a jack-tree with its fruit, would at the present day almost certainly receive for answer: 'Phal hai khudind!'—'It is a fruit, my lord!' Ariena looks like hiranya, 'golden,' which might be an epithet of the jack, but we find no such specific application of the word.

Omitting Theophrastus and Pliny, the oldest foreign description of the jack that we find is that by Hwen Tsang, who met with it in Bengal:

c. A.D. 650. "Although the fruit of the pan-wa-so (panasa) is gathered in great quantities, it is held in high esteem. These fruits are as big as a pumpkin; when ripe they are of a reddish yellow. Split in two they disclose inside a quantity of little fruits as big as crane's eggs; and when these are broken there exudes a juice of reddish-yellow colour and delicious flavour. Sometimes the fruit hangs on the branches, as with other trees; but sometimes it grows from the roots, like the fo-ling (Radix Chinæ), which is found under the ground."—Julien, iii. 75.

c. 1328. "There are some trees that bear a very big fruit called chaqui; and the fruit is of such size that one is enough for about five persons. There is another tree that has a fruit like that just named, and it is called Bloqui, quite as big and as sweet, but not of the same species. These fruits never grow upon the twigs, for these are not able to bear their weight, but only from the main branches, and even from the trunk of the tree itself, down to the very roots."—Friar Jordanus, 13-14.

A unique MS. of the travels of Friar Odoric, in the Palatine Library at Florence, contains the following curious passage:

c. 1330. "And there be also trees which produce fruits so big that two will be a load for a strong man. And when they are eaten you must oil your hands and your mouth; they are of a fragrant odour and very savoury; the fruit is called chabassi."

The name is probably corrupt (perhaps chacassi?). But the passage about oiling the hands and lips is aptly elucidated by the description in Baber's Memoirs (see below), a description matchless in its way, and which falls off sadly in the new translation by M. Pavet de Courteille, which quite omits the "haggises."

c. 1335. "The Shaki and Barki. This name is given to certain trees which live to a great age. Their leaves are like those of the walnut, and the fruit grows direct out of the stem of the tree. The fruits borne nearest to the ground are the barki; they are sweeter, and better-flavoured than the Shaki . . ." etc. (much to same effect as before).—Ibn Batuta, iii. 127; see also iv. 228.

c. 1350. "There is again another wonderful tree called Chake-Baruke, as big as an oak. Its fruit is produced from the trunk, and not from the branches, and is something marvellous to see, being as big as a great lamb, or a child of three years old. It has a hard rind like that of our pine-cones, so that you have to cut it open with a hatchet; inside it has a pulp of surpassing flavour, with the sweetness of honey, and of the best Italian melon; and this also contains some 500 chestnuts of like flavour, which are capital eating when roasted."—John de' Marignoli, in Cathay, &c., 363.

c. 1440. "There is a tree commonly found, the trunk of which bears a fruit resembling a pine-cone, but so big that a man can hardly lift it; the rind is green and hard, but still yields to the pressure of the finger. Inside there are some 250 or 300 pippins, as big as figs, very sweet in taste, and contained in separate membranes. These have each a kernel within, of a windy quality, of the consistence and taste of chestnuts, and which are roasted like chestnuts. And when cast among embers (to roast), unless you make a cut in them they will explode and jump out. The outer rind of the fruit is given to cattle. Sometimes the fruit is also found growing from the roots of the tree underground, and these fruits excel the others in flavour, wherefore they are sent as presents to kings and petty princes. These (moreover) have no kernels inside them. The tree itself resembles a large fig-tree, and the leaves are cut into fingers like the hand. The wood resembles box, and so it is esteemed for many uses. The name of the tree is Cachi" (i.e. Çachi or Tzacchi).—Nicolo de' Conti.

The description of the leaves—"foliis da modum palmi intercisus"—is the only slip in this admirable description. Conti must, in memory, have confounded the Jack with its congener the bread-fruit (Artocarpus incisa or incisifolia). We have translated from Poggio's Latin, as the version by Mr. Winter Jones in India in the XVth Century is far from accurate.

1530. "Another is the kadhil. This has a very bad look and flavour (odour?). It looks like a sheep's stomach stuffed and made into a haggis. It has a sweet sickly taste. Within it are stones like a filbert. . . The fruit is very adhesive, and on account of this adhesive quality many rub their mouths with oil before eating them. They grow not only from the branches and trunk of the tree, but from its roots. You would say that the tree was all hung round with haggises!"—Leyden and Erskine's Baber, 325.

Here kadhil represents the Hind. name kathul. The practice of oiling the lips on account of the "adhesive quality" (or as modern mortals would call it, 'stickiness') of the jack, is still usual among natives, and is the theme of a proverb on premature precautions:

Gāch'h meñ Kathal, honth meñ tel! "You have oiled your lips whilst the jack still hangs on the tree!"

We may observe that the call of the Indian cuckoo is in some of the Gangetic districts rendered by the natives as "Kathal-pakkā! Kathal-pakkā!" i.e. "Jack's ripe," the bird appearing at that season.

c. 1590. "In Sircar Hajypoor there are plenty of the fruits called Kathal and Budhul; * some of the first are so large as to be too heavy for one man to carry."—Gladwin's Ayeen, ii. 25.

1563. "R. What fruit is that which is as big as the largest (coco) nuts?"

"O. You just now ate the chestnuts from inside of it, and you said that roasted they were like real chestnuts. Now you shall eat the envelopes of these . . .

"R. They taste like a melon; but not so good as the better melons.

"O. True. And owing to their viscous nature they are ill to digest; or say rather they are not digested at all, and often issue from the body quite unchanged. I don't much use them. They are called in Malabar jacas; in Canarin and Guzerati panās.

. . . The tree is a great and tall one; and the fruits grow from the wood of the stem, right up it, and not on the branches like other fruits."—Garcia, f. 111.

1673. "Without the town (Madras) grows their Rice . . . Jawks, a Coat of Armour over it, like an Hedg-hog's, guards its weighty Fruit."—Fryer, 40.

1810. "The jack-wood . . . at first yellow, becomes on exposure to the air of the colour of mahogany, and is of as fine a grain."—Maria Graham, 101.

1878. "The monstrous jack that in its eccentric bulk contains a whole magazine of tastes and smells."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49-50.

It will be observed that the older authorities mention two varieties of the fruit by the names of shakti and barkī or modifications of these, different kinds according to Jordanus, only from different parts of the tree according to Ibn Batuta. P. Vincenzo Maria (1672) also distinguishes two kinds, one of which he calls Giacha Barca, the other Giacha papa or girasole. And Rheede, the great authority on Malabar plants, says (iii. 19):

"Of this tree, however, they reckon more than 30 varieties, distinguished by the quality of their fruit, but all may be reduced to two kinds; the fruit of one kind distinguished by plump and succulent pulp of delicious honey flavour, being the varaka; that of the other, filled with softer and more flabby pulp of inferior flavour, being the Tsyakapa."

More modern writers seem to have less perception in such matters than the old travellers, who entered more fully and sympathetically into native tastes. Drury says, however, "There are several varieties, but what is called the Honey-jack is by far the sweetest and best."

"He that desireth to see more hereof let him reade Ludovicus Romanus, in his fifth Booke and fiftene Chapter of his Navigaciouns, and Christopherus a Costa in his cap. of Iaca, and Gracia ab Horto, in the Second Booke and fourth Chapter," saith the learned Paludanus . . . And if there be anybody so unreasonable, so say we too,—by all means let him do so! *

Jackal, s. The Canis aureus, L., seldom seen in the daytime, unless it be fighting with the vultures for carrion, but in shrieking multitudes, or rather what seem multitudes from the noise they make, entering the precincts of villages, towns, of Calcutta itself, after dark, and startling the new comer with their hideous yells. Our word is not apparently Anglo-Indian, being taken from the Turkish chakāl. But the Pers. shaghāl is close, and Sansk. srigāla, 'the howler,' is probably the first form. The common Hind. word is gīdar. The jackal takes the place of the fox as the object of hunting "meets" in India; the indigenous fox being too small for sport.

1554. "Non procul inde audio magnam clamorem et velut hominum iridentium insulantiumque voces. Interrogo quid sit; . . . narrant mihi ululatum esse bestiarum, quas Turcae Ciacales vocant. . . ."—Busbeq. Epist. i. p. 78.

1615. "The inhabitants do nightly house their goates and sheepe for feare of Iaccals (in my opinion no other than Foxes), whereof an infinite number do lurke in the obscure vaults."—Sandys, Relation, &c., 205.

1616. ". . . those jackalls seem to be wild Doggs, who in great companies run

* This is in Blochmann's ed. of the Persian barhal, which is a Hind. name for the Artocarpus Lakoocha, of Roxb.

* A part of this article is derived from the notes to Jordanus by one of the present writers. We may add, in aid of such further investigation, that Paludanus is the Latinized name of v.d. Broecke, the commentator on Linscloten. "Lodovicus Romanus" is our old friend Varthema, and "Gracia ab Horto" is Garcia De Orta.

1672. "There is yet another kind of beast which they call Jackhalz; they are horribly greedy of man's flesh, so the inhabitants beset the graves of their dead with heavy stones."—Baldaeus (Germ. ed.), 422.

1673. "An Hellish concert of Jackals (a kind of Fox)."—Fryer, 53.

1681. "For hereare many Jackalls, which catch their Henes, some Tigres that destroy their Cattle; but the greatest of all is the King; whose endeavour is to keep them poor and in want."—Knox, Ceylon, 87. On p. 20 he writes Jacols.

1711. "Jackcalls are remarkable for Howling in the Night; one alone making as much noise as three or four Cur Dogs, and in different Notes, as if there were half a Dozen of them got together."—Lockyer, 382.

1810. Colebrooke (Essays, ii. 109) spells shakal. But Jackal was already English.

Jack-snipe of English sportsmen is Gallinago gallinula, Linn., smaller than the common snipe, G. scolopacinus, Bonap.

Jackass Copal. This is a trade name, and is a capital specimen of Hobson-Jobson. It is, according to Capt. Burton, a corruption of chakāzi.

There are three qualities of copal in the Zanzibar market. 1. Sandarusi m'ti, or 'Tree Copal,' gathered direct from the tree which exudes it (Trachylobium Mossambicense). 2. Chakāzi or chakazzi, dug from the soil, but seeming of recent origin, and priced on a par with No. 1. 3. The genuine Sandarusi, or true Copal (the Animé of the English market), which is also fossil, but of ancient production, and bears more than twice the price of 1 & 2 (see Sir J. Kirk in J. Linn. Soc. (Botany) for 1871). Of the meaning of chakāzi we have no authentic information. But considering that a pitch made of copal and oil is used in Kutch, and that the cheaper copal would naturally be used for such a purpose, we may suggest as probable that the word is a corr. of jahāzi, and = 'ship-copal.'

Jaquette, Town and Cape, n.p. The name, properly Jakad, formerly attached to a place at the extreme west horn of the Kāthiawār Peninsula, where stands the temple of Dwarka (q.v.). Also applied by the Portuguese to the Gulf of Cutch. See quotation from Camoens under Diul-Sind. The last important map that gives this name, so far as we are aware, is Aaron Arrowsmith's great Map of India, 1816, in which Dwarka appears under the name of Juggut.

1525. (Melequyaz) "holds the revenue of Crystna, which is in a town called Zaguate where there is a place of Pilgrimage of gentoos which is called Crysna. . . ."—Lembrança das Cousas da India, 35.

1553. "From the Diul estuary to the Point of Jaquete 38 leagues; and from the same Jaquete, which is the site of one of the principal temples of that heathenism, with a noble town, to our city Diu of the Kingdom of Guzarat, 58 leagues."—Barros, l. ix. 1.

1555. "Whilst the tide was at its greatest height we arrived at the gulf of Chakad, where we descried signs of fine weather, such as sea-horses, great snakes, turtles, and sea-weeds."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 77.

1726. In Valentyn's map we find Jaquete marked as a town (at the west point of Kāthiawār) and Enceada da Jaquete for the Gulf of Cutch.

1727. "The next sea-port town to Buet, is Jigat. It stands on a Point of low Land, called Cape Jigat. The City makes a good Figure from the Sea, showing 4 or 5 high Steeples."—A. Ham. i. 135.

1813. "Jigat Point . . . on it is a pagoda: the place where it stands was formerly called Jigat More, but now by the Hindoos Dorecur (i. e. Dwarka, q. v.). At a distance the pagoda has very much the appearance of a ship under sail. . . . Great numbers of pilgrims from the interior visit Jigat pagoda. . . ."—Milburn, i. 150.

1841. "Jigat Point called also Dwarka, from the large temple of Dwarka standing near the coast."—5th edition of Horsburgh's Directory, i. 480.

Jade, s. The well-known mineral, so much prized in China, and so wonderfully wrought in that and other Asiatic countries; the yashm of the Persians; nephrite of mineralogists.

The derivation of the word has been the subject of a good deal of controversy. We were at one time inclined to connect it with the yada-tāsh, the yada stone used by the nomads of Central Asia in conjuring for rain. The stone so used was however, according to P. Hyacinth, quoted in a note with which we were favoured by the lamented Prof. Anton Schiefner, a bezoar (q.v.).

Major Raverty, in his translation of the Tabakāt-i-Nāṣirī, in a passage referring to the regions of Tukhārīstān and Bāmīān, has the following:

"That tract of country has also been famed and celebrated, to the uttermost parts of the countries of the world, for its mines of gold, silver, rubies, and crystal, bejādah [jade], and other [precious] things" (p. 421). On bejādah his note runs: "The name of a gem, by some said to be a species of ruby, and by others a species of sapphire; but jade is no doubt meant." This interpretation seems however chiefly, if not altogether, suggested by the name; whilst the epithets compounded of bejāda, as given in dictionaries, suggest a red mineral, which jade rarely is. And Prof. Max Müller, in an interesting letter to the Times, dated Jan. 10th, 1880, states that the name jade was not known in Europe till after the discovery of America, and that the jade brought from America was called by the Spaniards pedra de ijada, because it was supposed to cure pain in the groin (Sp. ijada); for like reasons to which it was also called lapis nephriticus, whence nephrite (see Bailey, below). Skeat, s.v. says: "It is of unknown origin; but probably Oriental. Prof. Cowell finds yedā a material out of which ornaments are made, in the Divyāvadāna; but it does not seem to be Sanskrit." Prof. Müller's etymology seems incontrovertible; but the present work has afforded various examples of curious etymological coincidences of this kind.

1730. "Jade, a greenish Stone, bordering on the colour of Olive, esteemed for its Hardness and Virtues by the Turks and Poles, who adorn their fine Sabres with it; and said to be a preservative against the nephritic Colick."—Bailey's Eng. Dict. s. v.

Jadoo, s. Hind. from Pers. jadū; conjuring, magic, hocus-pocus.

Jadoogur, s. Properly Hind. jadū-

ghar, 'conjuring-house.' The term commonly applied by natives to a Freemason's Lodge, when there is one, at an English station. On the Bombay side it is also called Shaitān khāna (see Burton's Sind Revisited), a name consonant to the ideas of an Italian priest who intimated to one of the present writers that he had heard the raising of the devil was practised at Masonic meetings, and asked his friend's opinion as to the fact. In S. India the Lodge is called Talai-veṭṭa-Kovil, 'Out-head Temple,' because part of the rite of initiation is supposed to consist in the candidate's head being cut off and put on again.

Jafna, Jafnapatām, n.p. The very ancient Tamil settlement, and capital of the Tamil kings on the singular peninsula which forms the northernmost part of Ceylon. The real name is, according to Emerson Tennent, Yalpannan, and it is on the whole probable that this name is identical with the Galiba (Prom.) of Ptolemy.

1553. "... the Kingdom Triquinamālē, which at the upper end of its coast adjoins another called Jafnapatām, which stands at the northern point of the island."—Barros, III. ii. cap. 1.

c. 1566. In Cesare de' Federici it is written Gianifanpatan.—Ramusio, iii. 390r.

Jaggery, s. Coarse brown (or almost black) sugar, made from the sap of various palms. The wild date tree (Phoenix sylvestris, Roxb.), Hind. khajūr, is that which chiefly supplies palm-sugar in Guzerat and Coromandel, and almost alone in Bengal. But the palmyra, the carvota, and the coco-palm all give it; the first as the staple of Tinnevely and northern Ceylon; the second chiefly in southern Ceylon, where it is known to Europeans as the Jaggery Palm (kitāl of natives); the third is much drawn for toddy (q.v.) in the coast districts of Western India, and this is occasionally boiled for sugar. Jaggery is usually made in the form of small round cakes. Great quantities are produced in Tinnevely, where the cakes used to pass as a kind of currency (as cakes of salt used to pass in parts of Africa, and in Western China), and do even yet to some small extent.

The word jaggery is only another form of sugar (q.v.), being like it a corruption of the Sansk. sarkara, Konkani, sakkara.

1516. "Sugar of palms, which they call xagara."—Barbosa, 59.

1553. Exports from the Maldives "also of fish-oil, coco-nuts, and jagara, which is made from these after the manner of sugar."—Barros, Dec. III. liv. iii. cap. 7.

1561. "Jagre, which is sugar of palm-trees."—Correa, Lendas, i. 2, 592.

1563. "And after they have drawn this pot of çura, if the tree gives much they draw another, of which they make sugar, prepared either by sun or fire, and this they call jagra."—Garcia, f. 67.

c. 1567. "There come every yeere from Cochín and from Cananor tenne or fifteene great Shippes (to Chaul) laden with great nuts . . . and with sugar made of the selfe same nuts called Giagra."—Cæsar Frederike in Hakl. ii. 344.

1598. "Of the aforesaid sura they likewise make sugar, which is called iagra; they seeth the water, and set it in the sun, whereof it becometh sugar, but it is little esteemed, because it is of a browne colour."—Linschoten, 102.

1616. "Some small quantity of wine, but not common, is made among them; they call it Raak, distilled from Sugar, and a spicy rinde of a tree called Jagra. . . ."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 365.

1727. "The Produce of the Samorin's Country is . . . Cocoa-Nut, and that tree produceth Jaggery, a kind of sugar, and Copera, or the kernels of the Nut dried."—A. Ham. i. 306.

c. 1750-60. "Arrack, a coarse sort of sugar called Jagree, and vinegars are also extracted from it" (coco-palm).—Grose, i. 47.

1807. "The Tari or fermented juice, and the Jagory or inspissated juice of the Palmira tree . . . are in this country more esteemed than those of the wild date, which is contrary to the opinion of the Bengalese."—F. Buchanan, Mysore, &c., i. 5.

1860. "In this state it is sold as jaggery in the bazaars, at about three farthings per pound."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 524.

Jagheer, Jaghire, s. Pers. jāgūr (lit. 'place-holding'). An assignment of land and of its rent as annuity.

c. 1666. "... Not to speak of what they finger out of the Pay of every Horseman, and of the number of the Horses; which certainly amounts to very considerable Pensions, especially if they can obtain good Jah-gihirs, that is, good Lands for their Pensions."—Bernier, E. T., 66.

1673. "It (Surat) has for its Maintenance the Income of six Villages; over which the Governor sometimes presides, sometimes not, being in the Jageea, or diocese of another."—Fryer, 120.

"Jageah, an Annuity."—Id. Index, vi.

1768. "I say, Madam, I know nothing of books; and yet I believe upon a land-carriage fishery, a stamp-act, or a jaghire, I can talk my two hours without feeling the want of them."—Mr. Lofty, in The Good-Natured Man, Act II.

1778. "Should it be more agreeable to the parties, Sir Matthew will settle upon Sir John and his Lady, for their joint lives, a jagghire."

"Sir John. A Jagghire?"

"Thomas. The term is Indian, and means an annual Income."—Footc, The Nabob, i. 1.

We believe the traditional stage pronunciation in these passages is Jag Hire (assonant in both syllables to Quay Mire); and this is also the pronunciation given in some dictionaries.

1778. "... Jaghires, which were always rents arising from lands."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 52.

1809. "He was nominally in possession of a larger jaghire."—Lord Valentia, i. 401.

A territory adjoining Fort St. George was long known as the Jaghire, or the Company's Jaghire, and is often so mentioned in histories of last century. This territory, granted to the Company by the Nabob of Arcot in 1750 and 1763, nearly answers to the former Collectorate of Chingleput and present Collectorate of Madras.

Jagheerdar, s. Pers. Hind. jāgūr-dār, the holder of a jagheer.

1826. "The Resident, many officers, men of rank . . . jagheerdars, Brahmins, and Pundits, were present, assembled round my father."—Pandurang Hari, 389.

1883. "The Sikhs administered the country by means of jagheerdars, and paid them by their jagheers: the English administered it by highly paid British officers, at the same time that they endeavoured to lower the land-tax, and to introduce grand material reforms."—Bosworth Smith, L. of Lord Lawrence, i. 378.

Jain, s. and adj. The non-Brahminical sect so called; believed now to represent the earliest heretics of Buddhism, at present chiefly to be found in the Bombay Presidency. There are a few in Mysore, Canara, and in some parts of the Madras Presidency, but in the middle ages they appear to have been numerous on the coast of the Peninsula generally. They are also found in various parts of Central and Northern India and Behar. The Jains are generally merchants, and some have been men of enormous wealth (see Colebrooke's Essays, i. 378, seqq.). The name is Sansk. jaina, meaning a follower of jina. The latter word is a title applied to certain saints worshipped by the sect in the place of gods; it is also a name of the Bud-dhas.

An older name for the followers of this sect appears to have been Nir-grantha,* properly the title of Jain ascetics only (otherwise Yatis).

Jail-khana, s. A hybrid word for 'a gaol,' commonly used in the Bengal Presidency.

Jaleebote, s. Jālībōt. A marine corruption of jolly-boat (Roebuck). See Gallivat.

Jam, s. Jām; a title borne by certain chiefs in Kutch, in Kattywar, and on the lower Indus. The derivation is very obscure (see Elliot, i. 495). For an example of use see Sir C. Napier, s.v. dawk.

Jamboo or Jumboo, s. The Rose-apple, Eugenia jambos, L., Jambosa vulguris, Decand.; Sansk. jambū, Hind. jam, jambū, jamrūl, &c. This is the use in Bengal, but there is great confusion in application, both colloquially and in books. The name jambū is applied in some parts of India to the exotic guava (q. v.), as well as to other species of Eugenia; including the jāmun, with which the rose-apple is often confounded in books. They are very different fruits, though they have been both classed by Linnaeus under the genus Eugenia (see further remarks under Jamoon).

Garcia de Orta mentions the rose-apple under the name Iambos, and says (1563) it had been recently introduced into Goa from Malacca. This may have been the Eugenia Malaccensis, L., which is stated in Forbes Watson's Catalogue of nomenclature to be called in Bengal Malūka Jamrūl, and in Tamil Malākā maram, i.e., 'Malacca tree.' The Sanskrit name jambū is, in the Malay language, applied with distinguishing adjectives, to all the species.

1672. P. Vincenzo Maria describes the Giambo d'India, with great precision, and also the Giambo di China,—no doubt J. malaccensis,—but at too great length for extract, pp. 351-352.

1673. "In the South a Wood of Jamboes, Mangoes, Coccoes."—Fryer, 46.

* See Burnell, S. Indian Paleogeography, p. 47, note.

1727. "Their Jambo Malacca (at Goa) is very beautiful and pleasant."—A. Ham. i. 255.

1810. "The jumboo, a species of rose-apple, with its flowers like crimson tassels covering every part of the stem."—Maria Graham, 22.

James and Mary, n.p. The name of a famous sand-bank in the Hoogly R. below Calcutta, which has been fatal to many a ship. It is mentioned under 1748, in the record of a survey of the river quoted in Long, p. 10. It is a common allegation that this name is a corruption of the Hind. words jal mari, with the supposed meaning of 'dead water.' But the real origin of the name dates, as Sir George Bird-wood has shown, out of India Office records, from the wreck of a vessel called the "Royal James and Mary," in September, 1694, on that sand-bank (Letter to the Court, from Chittanuttie, Dec. 19th, 1694).

Jamoon, s. Hind. jāmun, jāman, jāmli, &c. The name of a poor fruit common in many parts of India, and apparently in E. Africa, the Eugenia jambolana, Lamk. (Calyptanthus jambolana of Willdenow, Syzygium jambolanum of Decand.) This seems to be confounded with the Eugenia jambos, or Rose-apple (see Jamboo, above) by the author of a note on Leyden's Baber, which Mr. Erskine justly corrects (Baber's own account is very accurate), by the translators of Ibn Batuta, and apparently, as regards the botanical name, by Capt. Burton. The latter gives jāmli as the Indian, and zam as the Arabic name. The name jāmli appears to be applied to this fruit at Bombay, which of course promotes the confusion spoken of. In native practice the stones of this fruit have been alleged to be a cure for diabetes, but European trials do not seem to have confirmed this.

c. 13** "The inhabitants (of Mombasa) gather also a fruit which they call jāmūn, and which resembles an olive; it has a stone like the olive, but has a very sweet taste."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 191. Elsewhere the translators write tehoumōn (iii. 128, iv. 114, 229), a spelling indicated in the original, but surely by some error.

c. 1530. "Another is the jaman. . . . It is on the whole a fine looking tree. Its fruit resembles the black grape, but has a more acid taste, and is not very good."—Baber, 325.

The note on this runs: "This, Dr. Hunter says, is the Eugenia Jambolana, the rose-apple (Eugenia jambolana, but not the rose-apple, which is now called Eugenia jambu.—D. W.). The jâman has no resemblance to the rose-apple; it is more like an oblong slice than anything else, but grows on a tall tree."

1563. "I will eat of those olives, —, at least they look like such; but they are very astringent (ponticas) as if binding, —, and yet they do look like ripe Cordova olives."

"O. They are called jambolones, and grow wild in a wood that looks like a myrtle grove; in its leaves the tree resembles the arbutus; but like the jack, the people of the country don't hold this fruit for very wholesome."—Garcia, f. 111 y.

1859. "The Indian jamli. . . . It is a noble tree, which adorns some of the coast villages and plantations, and it produces a jamson-like fruit, with a pleasant sub-acid flavour."—Burton, in J. R. G. S., xxix. 36.

Jangar, s. A raft. Port. jangada. This word, chiefly colloquial, is the Tamil-Malayâlam shangâdam. It is a word of particular interest as being one of the few Dravidian words preserved in the remains of classical antiquity, occurring in the Periplus as our quotation shows. Bluteau does not call the word an Indian term.

c. 80-90. "The vessels belonging to these places (Camara, Poduce, and Sopatma on the east coast) which hug the shore to Limyricē (Dimyricē), and others also called Σάγγαρα, which consist of the largest canoes of single timbers lashed together; and again those biggest of all which sail to Chryse and Ganges, and are called Κολανδιόφωνα."*—Periplus, in Müller's Geog. Gr. Min., i.

c. 1504. "He held in readiness many jangadas of timber."—Correa, Lendas, I., i. 476.

c. 1540. ". . . and to that purpose had already commanded two great Rafts (jâgadas), covered with dry wood, barrels of pitch and other combustible stuff, to be placed at the entering into the Port."—Pinto (orig. cap. xlv.). in Cogan, p. 56.

1553. ". . . the fleet . . . which might consist of more than 200 rowing vessels of all kinds, a great part of them combined into jangadas in order to carry a greater mass of men, and among them two of these contrivances on which were 150 men."—Barros, II. i. 5.

1598. "Such as stayed in the ship, some took boards, deals, and other peeces of wood, and bound them together (which ye Portugals call Iangadas) every man what they could catch, all hoping to save their lives, but of all those there came but two men safe to shore."—Linschoten, p. 147.

1602. "For his object was to see if he could rescue them in jangadas, which he ordered him immediately to put together of baulks, planks, and oars."—Couto, Dec. IV., liv. iv., cap. 10.

1756. ". . . having set fire to a jungodo of Boats, these driving down towards the Fleet, compelled them to weigh."—Capt. Jackson, in Dalrymple's Or. Rep. i. 199.

Jangomay, Zangomay, Jamahey, &c., n.p. The town and state of Siamese Laos, called by the Burmese Zimmé, by the Siamese Xieng-mai or Kiang-mai, &c., is so called in narratives of the 17th century. Serious efforts to establish trade with this place were made by the E. I. Company in the early part of the 17th century, of which notice will be found in Purchas, Pilgrimage, and Sainsbury, e.g. in vol. i. (1614), pp. 311, 325; (1615) p. 425; (1617) ii., p. 90. The place has again become the scene of commercial and political interest; an English Vice-Consulate has been established; and a railway survey undertaken.

1553. (Barros) illustrates the position of the different kingdoms of India by the figure of a (left) hand, laid with the palm downwards "And as regards the western part, following always the sinew of the forefinger, it will correspond with the ranges of mountains running from north to south along which lie the kingdom of Ará, and Bremá, and Jangomá."—III. ii. 5. See also under Judea.

c. 1587. "I went from Pegu to Iamayhey, which is in the Countrey of the Langleiannes, whom we call Iangomes; it is five and twentie dayes journey to Northeast from Pegu. . . . Hither to Iamayhey come many Merchants out of China, and bring great store of Muske, Gold, Silver, and many things of China worke."—E. Fitch, in Hakluyt, ii.

c. 1606. "But the people, or most part of them, fled to the territories of the King of Jangoma, where they were met by the Padre Friar Francisco, of the Annunciation, who was there negotiating. . . ."—Bocarro, 136.

c. 1615. "The King (of Pegu) which now reigneth . . . hath in his time recovered from the King of Syam. . . the town and kingdom of Zangomay, and therein an Englishman called Thomas Samuel, who not long before had been sent from Syam by Master Lucas Anthonison, to discover the Trade of that country by the sale of certaine goods sent along with him for that purpose."—W. Methold, in Purchas, v. 1006.

Japan, n.p. Mr. Giles says: "Our word is from Jeh-pun, the Dutch orthography of the Japanese Ni-pon." What the Dutch have to do with the matter is hard to see.

A form closely resembling Japán, as we pronounce it, must have prevailed, among foreigners at least, in China as early as the 13th century; for Marco Polo calls it Chipan-gu or Jipan-ku, a name representing the Chinese Zhi-pán-Kwe ('Sun-origin-Kingdom'), the Kingdom of the Sunrise or Extreme Orient, of which the word Nipon or Niphon, used in Japan, is said to be a dialectic variation.

But as there was a distinct gap in Western tradition between the 14th century and the 16th, when Japan again became known, no doubt we, or rather the Portuguese, acquired the name from the traders at Malacca, in the Malay forms, which Crawford gives as Jápung and Jápang.

1505. ". . . and not far off they took aship belonging to the King of Calichut; out of which they have brought me certain jewels of good value; including Meccoco pearls worth 8,000 ducats; also three astrological instruments of silver, such as are not used by our astrologers, large and well-wrought, which I hold in the highest estimation. They say that the King of Calichut had sent the said ship to an island called Saponin to obtain the said instruments. . . ."—Letter from the K. of Portugal (Dom Manuel) to the K. of Castille (Ferdinand). Reprint by A. Burnell, 1881, p. 8.

1521. "In going by this course we passed near two very rich islands; one is in twenty degrees latitude in the antarctic pole, and is called Cipanghu."—Piçafetta, Magellan's Voyage, Hak. Soc., 67.

Here the name appears to be taken from the chart or Mappe-Monde which was carried on the voyage. Cipanghu appears by that name on the globe of Martin Behaim (1492), but 20 degrees north, not south, of the equator.

1545. "Now as for us three Portugals, having nothing to sell, we employed our time either in fishing, hunting, or seeing the Temples of these Gentiles, which were very sumptuous and rich, whereinto the Bonzes, who are their priests, received us very courteously, for indeed it is the custome of those of Jappon (do Japão) to be exceeding kind and courteous."—Pinto, orig. cap. cxxiv. (Cogan's E. T., p. 173).

1553. "After leaving to the eastward the isles of the Lequios (see Loo Choo) and of the Japons (dos Japões), and the great province of Meaco, which for its great size we know not whether to call it Island or Continent, the coast of China still runs on, and those parts pass beyond the antipodes of the meridian of Lisbon."—Barros, I., ix. 1.

1727. "Japon, with the neighbouring Islands under its Dominions, is about the magnitude of Great Britain."—A. Ham., ii. 306.

Jargon, Jarcoon, s. Or Zircon; the name of a precious stone often mentioned by writers of the 16th century, but respecting the identity of which there seems to be a little obscurity. The English Cyclopaedia, and the Times Reviewer of Emanuel's book On Precious Stones (1866) identify it with the hyacinth or jacinth; but Lord Stanley of Alderley, in his translation of Barbosa (who mentions the stone several times under the form giagonza and jagonza), on the authority of a practical jeweller identifies it with corundum. This is probably an error. Jagonza looks like a corruption of jacinthus. And Haüy's Mineralogy identifies jargon and hyacinth under the common name of zircon. Dana's Mineralogy states that the term hyacinth is applied to those stones, consisting of silicate of zirconia, "which present bright colours, considerable transparency, and smooth shining surfaces. . . . The variety from Ceylon, which is colourless, or has a smoky tinge, and is therefore sold for inferior diamonds, is sometimes called jargon" (Syst. of Mineral., 3rd ed., 1850, 379—380).

The word probably comes into European languages through the Span. azarcon, a word of which there is a curious history in Dozy and Engelmann. Two Spanish words and their distinct Arabic originals have been confounded in the Span. Dict. of Cobarruvias (1611) and others following him. Sp. zarca is 'a woman with blue eyes,' and this comes from Ar. zarkā, fem. of azrak, 'blue.' This has led the lexicographers above referred to astray, and azarcon has been by them defined as a 'blue earth, made of burnt lead.' But azarcon really applies to 'red-lead,' or vermilion, as does the Port. zarcão, azarcão, and its proper sense is as the Dict. of the Sp. Academy says (after repeating the inconsistent explanation and etymology of Co-barruvias), "an intense orange-colour, Lat. color aureus." This is from the Arab. zarkūn, which in Ibn Baithar is explained as synonymous with salikūn, and asranj, "which the Greeks call sandix," i.e. cinnabar or vermilion (see Sontheimer's Ebn Beithar, i. 44, 530). And the word, as Dozy shows, occurs in Pliny under the form syricum (see quotations below),

The eventual etymology is almost certainly Persian, either zargūn, 'gold colour,' as Marcel Devic suggests, or āzargūn (perhaps more properly āzar-gūn, from āzar, 'fire'), 'flame-colour,' as Dozy thinks.

A.D. c. 70. "Hoc ergo adulteratur minium in officinis sociorum, et ubivis Syrico. Quoniam modo Syricum fiat suo loco docebimus, sublini autem Syrico minium compendi ratio demonstrat."—Plin. N. H., XXXIII. vii.

"Inter facticios est et Syricum, quo minium sublini diximus. Fit autem Sinopide et sandyce mixtis."—Id. XXXV. vi.

1796. "The artists of Ceylon prepare rings and heads of canes, which contain a complete assortment of all the precious stones found in that island. These assemblages are called Jargons de Ceilan, and are so called because they consist of a collection of gems which reflect various colours."—Fra Paolino, Eng. ed. 1800, 393.

(This is a very loose translation. Fra Paolino evidently thought Jargon was a figurative name applied to this mixture of stones, as it is applied to a mixture of languages).

1813. "The colour of Jargons is grey, with tinges of green, blue, red, and yellow."—I. Mawe, A Treatise on Diamonds, &c. 119.

1860. "The 'Matura Diamonds' which are largely used by the native jewellers, consist of zircon, found in the syenite, not only uncoloured, but also of pink and yellow tints, the former passing for rubies."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 38.

Jarool, s. The Lagerstroemia reginae, Roxb., Beng. jāruḷ. A tree very extensively diffused in the forests of Eastern and Western India and Pegu. It furnishes excellent boat-timber, and is a splendid flowering tree.

"An exceeding glorious tree of the Concan jungles, in the month of May robed as in imperial purple, with its terminal panicles of large showy purple flowers. I for the first time introduced it largely into Bombay gardens, and called it Flos reginae."—Birdwood, M.S.

1850. "Their forests are frequented by timber-cutters, who fell jarool, a magnificent tree with red wood, which, though soft, is durable under water, and therefore in universal use for boat building."—Hooker, Him. Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 318.

1853. "Much of the way from Rangoon also, by the creeks, to the great river, was through actual dense forest, in which the jarool, covered with purple blossoms, made a noble figure."—Blackwood's Mag., May, 1856, 538.

Jask, Jasques, Cape, n.p. Ar. Rās Jāshak, a point on the eastern side of the Gulf of Omān, near the entrance to the Persian Gulf, and 6 miles south of a port of the same name. The latter was frequented by the vessels of the English Company whilst the Portuguese held Ormus. After the Portuguese were driven out of Ormus (1622) the English trade was moved to Gombroon (q.v.). The peninsula of which Cape Jask is the point, is now the terminus of the submarine cable from Bushire; and a company of native infantry is quartered there.

Jāsak appears in Yākūt as "a large island between the land of Omān and the Island of Kish." No island corresponds to this description, and probably the reference is an incorrect one to Jask (see Dict. de la Perse, p. 149).

By a curious misapprehension, Cape Jasques seems to have been Englished as Cape James (see Dunn's Or. Navigator, 1780, p. 94).

1553. "Crossing from this Cape Moçandan to that opposite to it called Jasque, which with it forms the mouth of the strait, we enter on the second section (of the coast) according to our division. . . ."—Barros, I. ix. i.

Jaun, s. This is a term used in Calcutta, and occasionally in Madras, of which the origin is unknown to the present writers. It is, or was, applied to a small palankin carriage, such as is commonly used by business men in going to their offices, &c.

Java, n.p. This is a geographical name of great antiquity, and occurs, as our first quotation shows, in Ptolemy's Tables. His Ἰαβαδίων represents with singular correctness what was probably the Prakrit or popular form of Yavadvīpa (see under Diu and Maldivē), and his interpretation of the Sanskrit is perfectly correct. It will still remain a question whether Java was not applied to some cereal more congenial to the latitude than barley,* or was, (as is possible) an attempt to give an Indian meaning to some aboriginal name of similar sound. But the sixth of our quotations, the transcript and translation of a Sanskrit inscription in the Museum at Batavia by Mr. Holle, which we owe to the kindness of Prof. Kern, indicates that a signification of wealth in cereals was attached to the name in the early days of its Indian civilization. This inscription is most interesting, as it is the oldest dated inscription yet discovered upon Javanese soil. Till a recent time it was not known that there was any mention of Java in Sanskrit literature, and this was so when Lassen published the 2nd vol. of his Indian Antiquities (1849). But in fact Java was mentioned in the Ramāyana, though a perverted reading disguised the fact until the publication of the Bombay edition in 1863. The passage is given in our second quotation; and we also give passages from two later astronomical works whose date is approximately known. The Yava-Koṭi, or Java Point of these writers is understood by Prof. Kern to be the eastern extremity of the island.

We have already (see under Benjamin) alluded to the fact that the terms Jāva, Jāwi were applied by the Arabs to the archipelago generally, and often with specific reference to Sumatra. Prof. Kern, in a paper to which we are largely indebted, has indicated that this larger application of the term was originally Indian. He has discussed it in connexion with the terms "Golden and Silver Islands" (Suvarṇa dvīpa and Rūpya dvīpa), which occur in the quotation from the Ramāyana, and elsewhere in Sanskrit literature, and which evidently were the basis of the Chrysē and Argyrē, which take various forms in the writings of the Greek and Roman geographers. We cannot give the details of his discussion, but his condensed conclusions are as follows: (1.) Suvarṇa-dvīpa and Yava-dvīpa were according to the prevalent representations the same; (2.) Two names of islands originally distinct were confounded with one another; (3.) Suvarṇa-dvīpa in its proper meaning is Sumatra, Yava-dvīpa in its proper meaning is Java; (4.) Sumatra, or a part of it, and Java were regarded as one whole, doubtless because they were politically united; (5.) By Yava-kōṭi was indicated the east point of Java.

* This word appears to read Geme, though the writing is difficult to one who is not expert. Nor can we suggest any measure=10 kos. The Gau (see Gow) is 4 kos; the yavana or jojan is sometimes stated to be 8 kos.

† The Teutonic word Corn affords a handy instance of the varying application of the name of a cereal to that which is, or has been, the staple grain of each country. Corn in England familiarly means 'wheat'; in Scotland 'oats'; in Germany 'rye'; in America 'maize.'

This Indian (and also insular) identification, in whole or in part, of Sumatra with Java explains a variety of puzzles, e.g. not merely the Arab application of Java, but also the ascription, in so many passages, of great wealth in gold to Java, though the island, to which that name properly belongs, produces no gold.

This tradition of gold-produce we find in the passages quoted from Ptolemy, from the Ramāyana, from the Holle inscription, and from Marco Polo. It becomes quite intelligible when we are taught that Java and Sumatra were at one time both embraced under the former name, for Sumatra has always been famous for its gold-production.

1298. "When you sail from Ziamba (Chamba) 1500 miles in a course between south and south-east, you come to a very great island called Java, which, according to the statement of some good mariners, is the greatest Island that there is in the world, seeing that it has a compass of more than 3000 miles, and is under the dominion of a great king. . . . Pepper, nutmegs, spike, galanga, cubebs, cloves, and all the other good spices are produced in this island, and it is visited by many ships with quantities of merchandise from which they make great profits and gain, for such an amount of gold is found there that no one would believe it or venture to tell it."—Marco Polo, in Ramusio, ii. 51.

c. 1330. "In the neighbourhood of that realm is a great island, Java by name, which hath a compass of a good 3000 miles. Now this island is populous exceedingly, and is the second best of all islands that exist. . . . The King of this island hath a palace which is truly marvellous. . . . 1503. The Syrian bishops Thomas, Jaballaha, Jacob, and Denha, sent on a mission to India in 1503 by the (Nestorian)

"This is some account of remotest Sin, which I record without vouching for its truth . . . for in sooth it is a far off land. I have seen no one who had gone to it and penetrated far into it; only the merchants seek its outlying parts, to wit the country known as Jāwa on the sea-coast, like to India; from it are brought Aloeswood (ūd), camphor, and nard (sunbul), and clove, and mace (basbāsa), and China drugs, and vessels of china-ware."—Id. iii. 445.

Kazwini speaks in almost the same words of Jāwa. He often copies Yākūt, but perhaps he really means his own time (for he uses different words) when he says: "Up to this time the merchants came no further into China than to this country (Jāwa) on account of the distance and difference of religion."—II. 18.

1298. "When you leave this Island of Pentam and sail about 100 miles, you reach the Island of Java the Less. For all its name 'tis none so small but that it has a compass of 2000 miles or more. . . ." etc.—Marco Polo, bk. iii. ch. 9.

c. 1300. ". . . In the mountains of Jāwa scented woods grow. . . . The mountains of Jāwa are very high. It is the custom of the people to puncture their hands and entire body with needles, and then rub in some black substance."—Rashīd-uddin, in Elliot, i. 71.

1328. "There is also another exceeding great island, which is called Jaua, which is in circuit more than seven [thousand?] miles as I have heard, and where are many world's wonders. Among which, besides the finest aromatic spices, this is one, to wit, that there be found pygmy men . . . There are also trees producing cloves, which when they are in flower emit an odour so pungent that they kill every man who cometh among them, unless he shut his mouth and nostrils. . . . In a certain part of that island they delight to eat white and fat men when they can get them. . . ."—Friar Jordanus, 30-31.

c. 1330. "Parmi les isles de la Mer de l'Inde il faut citer celle de Djāwah, grande isle célèbre par l'abondance de ses drogues . . . au sud de l'isle de Djāwah on remarque la ville de Fansour, d'où le camphre Fansotri tire son nom."—Géog. d'Aboulfeda, II. pt. ii. 127.

c. 1346. "After a passage of 25 days we arrived at the Island of Jāwa, which gives its name to the lubān jāwīy (see benjamin) . . . We thus made our entrance into the capital, that is to say the city of Sumatra; a fine large town with a wall of wood and towers also of wood."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 228-230.

1553. "And so these, as well as those of the interior of the Island (Sumatra), are all dark, with lank hair, of good nature and countenance, and not resembling the Javanese, although such near neighbours, indeed it is very notable that at so small a distance from each other their nature should vary so much, all the more because all the people of this Island call themselves by the common name of Jawis (Jawīs), because they hold it for certain that the Javanese (or Jāos) were formerly lords of this great Island. . . ."—Barros, III. v. 1.

1555. "Beyond the Island of Iaua they sailed along by another called Bali; and then came also unto other called Anjaue, Cambaba, Solor. . . The course by these Islands is about 500 leagues. The ancient cosmographers call all these Islands by the name Iauos; but late experience hath found the names to be very diuers as you see."—Antonio Galvano, old E. T. in Hakluyt, iv. 423.

1556. "It is a saying in Goozerat, —
'Who goes to Java
Never returns.

If by chance he return,
Then for two generations to live upon,
Money enough he brings back."

Rās Mālā, ii. 82.

Java-radish, s. A singular variety (Raphanus caudatus, L.) of the common radish (R. sativus, L.), of which the pods, which attain a foot in length, are eaten and not the root. It is much cultivated in W. India. It is curious that the H. name of the common radish is māli, from māl, 'root,' exactly analogous to radish from radix.

Jawaub, s. Hind. from Arab. jawāb.

'an answer.' In India it has, besides this ordinary meaning, that of 'dismissal.' And in Anglo-Indian colloquial it is especially used for a lady's refusal of an offer; whence the verb passive, 'to be jawaub'd.'

Jawāb among the natives is often applied to anything erected or planted for a symmetrical double, where

"Grove nods at grove, each alley has a brother, And half the platform just reflects the other."

Jay, s. The name usually given by Europeans to the Coracias Indica, Linn. the Nikkant or 'blue-throat' of the Hindus, found all over India.

Jeel, Hind. jīl. A stagnant sheet of inundation; a mere or lagoon. Especially applied to the great sheets of remanent inundation in Bengal. In Eastern Bengal they are also called bheel (q.v.). The Jhils of Silhet are vividly and most accurately described (though the word is not used) in the following passage:

c. 1778. "I shall not therefore be disbelieved when I say that in pointing my boat towards Sylhet I had recourse to my compass, the same as at sea, and steered a straight course through a lake not less than 100 miles in extent, occasionally passing through villages built on artificial mounds: but so scanty was the ground that each house had a canoe attached to it."—Hon. Robert Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 166.

1824. "At length we . . . entered what might be called a sea of reeds. It was, in fact, a vast jeel or marsh, whose tall rushes rise above the surface of the water, having depth enough for a very large vessel. We sailed briskly on, rustling like a greyhound in a field of corn."—Heber, i. 101.

1850. "To the geologist the Jheels and Sunderbunds are a most instructive region, as whatever may be the mean elevation of their waters, a permanent depression of 10 to 15 feet would submerge an immense tract."—Hooker's Himalayan Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 265.

Jeetul, s. Hind. Jītal, s. A very old Indian denomination of copper coin, now entirely obsolete. It long survived on the western coast, and the name was used by the Portuguese for one of their small copper coins in the forms ceitils and zoitoles. The jītal of the Dehli coinage of Alā-ud-dīn (c. 1300) was, according to Mr. E. Thomas's calculations,  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the silver tanga, the coin called in later days rupee. It was therefore just the equivalent of our modern pie. But of course, like most modern denominations of coin, it has varied greatly.

c. 1193-4. "According to Kutb-ud-Din's command, Nizam-ud-Din Mōhammad, on his return, brought them [the two slaves] along with him to the capital, Dihli; and Malik Kutb-ud-Din purchased both the Turks for the sum of 100,000 jitals."—Raverty, Ṭabaḳāt-i-Nāṣiri, p. 603.

c. 1290. "In the same year . . . there was dearth in Dehli, and grain rose to a jital per sir."—Ẓihāb-ud-dīn Barnī, in Elliot, iii. 146.

c. 1340. "The dirhem sultānī is worth  $\frac{1}{3}$  of the dirhem shashṭānī . . . and is worth 3 fals, whilst the jital is worth 4 fals; and the dirhem hashtkānī, which is exactly the silver dirhem of Egypt and Syria, is worth 32 fals."—Shihābuddīn, in Notices et Extraits, xiii. 212.

1554. In Sunda. "The caṣh (caṣas) here go 120 to the tanga of silver; the which caṣas are a copper money larger than ceitils, and pierced in the middle, which they say have come from China for many years, and the whole place is full of them."—A. Nunes, 42.

c. 1590. "For the purpose of calculation the dam is divided into 25 parts, each of which is called a jētal. This imaginary division is only used by accountants."—Ain, i. 31.

1678. "48 Juttals, 1 Pagod, an Imaginary Coin."—Fryer (at Surat), 206.

c. 1750-60. "At Carwar 6 pices make the juttal, and 48 juttals a Pagoda."—Grose, i. 282.

Jehaud, s. Ar. Jihād, a sacred war of Musulmans against the infidel; which Sir Herbert Edwardes called, not very neatly, 'a crescentade.'

1880. "When the Athenians invaded Ephesus, towards the end of the Peloponnesian War, Tissaphernes offered a mighty sacrifice at Artemis, and raised the people in a sort of Jehad, or holy war, for her defence."—Sat. Review, July 17th, 84b.

Jelaabee, s. More properly H. jalebi. A rich sweetmeat made of sugar and ghee, with a little flour, melted and trickled into a pan so as to form a kind of interlaced work—when baked.

Jelly, s. In South India this is applied to vitrified brick refuse used as metal for roads. It would appear from a remark of C. P. Brown (MS. notes) to be Telugu zalli, which means properly 'shivers, bits, pieces.'

Jelum, n.p. The most westerly of the "Five Rivers" that give name to the Punjab, q.v. (among which the Indus itself is not usually included). Properly Jailam, or Jilam, now apparently written Jhilam, and taking this name from a town on the right bank. The Jhilam is the Ὑδάσπης of Alexander's historians, a name corrupted from the Skt. Vitastā, which is more nearly represented by Ptolemy's Βιδάσπης. A still further (Prakritic) corruption of the same is Behat (see Behut).

1037. "Here he (Mahmūd) fell ill, and remained sick for 14 days, and got no better. So in a fit of repentance he forswore wine, and ordered his servants to throw all his supply . . . into the Jailam . . ."—Baihaqi, in Elliot, ii. 139.

c. 1204. ". . . in the height of the conflict, Shams-ud-Din, in all his panoply, rode right into the water of the river Jilam . . . and his warlike feats whilst in that water reached such a pitch that he was despatching those infidels from the height of the waters to the lowest depths of Hell. . . ."—Tabakāt, by Raverty, 604-5.

"Hydaspes! often have thy waves run tuned
To battle music, since the soldier King,
The Macedonian, dipped his golden casque
And swam thy swollen flood, until the time
When Night the peace-maker, with pious hand, Unclasping her dark mantle, smoothed it soft O'er the pale faces of the brave who slept Cold in their clay, on Chillian's bloody field." The Banyan Tree.

Jemadars, Jemautdar, &c. Hind. from Arab.-Pers. jama'dār. Jama' meaning 'an aggregate,' the word indicates generally, a leader of a body of individuals. Technically, in the Indian army, it is the title of the second rank of native officer in a company of Sepoys, the subadār (q.v.) being the first. In this sense the word dates from the reorganisation of the army in 1768.

It is also applied to certain officers of police (under the darogha), of the customs, and of other civil departments. And in larger domestic establishments there is often a jemadar, who is over the servants generally, or over the stables and camp service. It is also an honorific title often used by the other household servants in addressing the bihishtī (see bheesty).

1752. "The English battalion no sooner quitted Trichinopoly than the regent set about accomplishing his scheme of surprising the City, and . . . endeavoured to gain 500 of the Nabob's best peons with firelocks. The jemautdars, or captains of these troops, received his bribes, and promised to join."—Orme, i. 257 (ed. 1803).

1817. ". . . Calliaud had commenced an intrigue with some of the jematdars, or captains of the enemy's troops, when he received intelligence that the French had arrived at Trichinopoly."—Mull, iii. 175.

1824. "'Abdullah' was a Mussulman convert of Mr. Corrie's, who had travelled in Persia with Sir Gore Ouseley, and accompanied him to England, from whence he was returning . . . when the Bishop took him into his service as a 'jemautdar,' or head officer of the peons."—Editor's Note to Heber, i. 65 (ed. 1844).

Jenny, n.p. H. Janañ. The name of a great river in Bengal, which is in fact a portion of the course of the Brahmaputra (see Burrampooter), and the conditions of which are explained in the following passage, written by one of the authors of this Glossary many years ago:—

"In Rennell's time, the Burrampooter, after issuing westward from the Assam valley, swept south-eastward, and forming with the Ganges a fluvial peninsula, entered the sea abreast of that river below Dacca. And so almost all English maps persist in representing it, though this eastern channel is now, unless in the rainy season, shallow and insignificant; the vast body of the Burrampooter cutting across the neck of the peninsula under the name of Jenai, and uniting with the Ganges near Pubna (about 150 miles N.E. of Calcutta), from which point the two rivers, under the name of Pudda (Padda) flow on in mighty union to the sea." (Blackwood's Magazine, March, 1852, p. 338.)

The river is indicated as an offshoot of the Burrampooter in Rennell's Bengal Atlas (Map No. 6) under the name of Jenni, but it is not mentioned in his Memoir of the Map of Hindostan. The great change of the river's course was palpably imminent at the beginning of this century; for Buchanan (c. 1809) says: "The river threatens to carry away all the vicinity of Dewangunj, and perhaps to force its way into the heart of Nator" (Eastern India, iii. 394; see also 377). Nator or Nattore was the territory now called Rajshahi District.

The real direction of the change has been further south.

The Janai is also called Jamunā; see under Jumna. Hooker (1850) calls it Jummāl (?) noticing that the maps still led him to suppose the Burrampooter flowed 70 miles further east (see Him. Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 259).

Jennyrickshaw, s. Read Capt. Gill's description below. Giles states the word to be taken from the Japanese pronunciation of three characters signifying 'Man—Strength—Cart.' The term is therefore, observes our friend E. C. Baber, an exact equivalent of "Pull-man Car!" The article has been introduced into India, and is now in use at Simla.

1876. "A machine called a jinnyrickshaw is the usual public conveyance of Shanghai. This is an importation from Japan, and is admirably adapted for the flat country, where the roads are good, and coolie hire cheap. . . . In shape they are like a buggy, but very much smaller, with room inside for one person only. One coolie goes into the shafts and runs along at the rate of 6 miles an hour; if the distance is long, he is usually accompanied by a companion who runs behind, and they take it in turn about to draw the vehicle."—W. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 10. See also p. 163.

1880. "The Kuruma or jin-ri-ki-sha consists of a light perambulator body, an adjustable hood of oiled paper, a velvet or cloth lining and cushion, a well for parcels under the seat, two high slim wheels, and a pair of shafts connected by a bar at the ends."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 18.

Jezya, s. Ar. jizya. The poll-tax which the Musulman law imposes on subjects who are not Moslem.

c. 1300. "The Kazi replied . . . 'No doctor but the great doctor (Hanifa) to whose school we belong, has assented to the imposition of Jizya on Hindus. Doctors of other schools allow of no alternative but 'Death or Islam.'"—Ziā-ud-dīn Barni, Elliot, iii. 184.

1683. "Understand what custome ye English paid formerly, and compare ye difference between that and our last order for taking custome and Jidgea. If they pay no more than they did formerly, they complain without occasion. If more, write what it is, and there shall be an abatement."—Vizier's Letter to Nabob, in Hedges, July 18.

1765. "When the Hindoo Rajahs . . . submitted to Tamarlane; it was on these capital stipulations: That . . . the emperors should never impose the jesserah (or poll tax) upon the Hindoos."—Holwell, Historical Events, i. 37.

Jhaump, s. A hurdle of matting and bamboo, used as a shutter or door. Hind. jhānp, Mahr. jhūnpa; in connexion with which there are verbs, H. jhānp-nā, jhāpnā, dhānpnā, to cover. See jhoprā, s.v. ak.

Jhoom, s. Jhūm. This is a word used on the eastern frontiers of Bengal for that kind of cultivation which is practised in the hill forests of India and Indo-China, under which a tract is cleared by fire, cultivated for a year or two, and then abandoned for another tract, where a like process is pursued. This is the kumri of S.W. India (see Coomry), the chena of Ceylon (see Emerson Tennent, ii. 463), the taung-gyan of Burma. It is also practised in the Ardennes, under the name of sartage, and in Sweden under the name of svedjande (see Marsh, Earth as Modified by Human Action, 346).

Jillmill, s. Venetian shutters, or as they are called in Italy, persiane. The origin of the word is not clear. The Hind. word 'jhilmila' seems to mean 'sparkling,' and to have been applied to some kind of gauze. Possibly this may have been used for blinds, and thence transferred to the shutters. Or it may have been an onomatopoeia, from the rattle of such shutters; or it may have been corrupted from a Portuguese word such as janella, 'a window.' All this is conjecture.

1874. "The front (of a Bengal house) is generally long, exhibiting a pillared verandah, or a row of French casements, and jillmilled windows."—Calc. Review, No. cxvii. 207.

Jocole, s. We know not what this word is; perhaps 'toys'?

1703. ". . . sent from the Patriarch to the Governor with a small present of jocols, oil, and wines."—In Wheeler, ii. 32.

Jogee, s. Hind. jogī. A Hindu ascetic; and sometimes a 'conjurer.' From Sansk. yogin, one who practises the yoga, a system of meditation combined with austerities, which is supposed to induce miraculous power over elementary matter. In fact the stuff which has of late been propagated in India by certain persons, under the names of theosophy and esoteric Buddhism, is essentially the doctrine of the Jogis.

1298. "There is another class of people called Chughi who . . . form a religious order devoted to the Idols. They are extremely long-lived, every man of them living to 150 or 200 years . . . there are certain members of the Order who lead the most ascetic life in the world, going stark naked."—Marco Polo, 2d ed. ii: 351.

1343. "We cast anchor by a little island near the main, Anchediva (q.v.), where there was a temple, a grove, and a tank of water. . . . We found a jogi leaning against the wall of a budkhāna or temple of idols" (respecting whom he tells remarkable stories).—Ibn Batuta, iv. 62-63, and see p. 275.

c. 1442. "The Infidels are divided into a great number of classes, such as the Bramins, the Joghis and others."—Abdurrazzāk, in India in XVth C., 17.

1498. "They went and put in at Angediva . . . there were good water-springs, and there was in the upper part of the island a tank built with stone, with very good water and much wood . . . there were no inhabitants, only a beggar-man whom they call joguedes."—Correa, by Lord Stanley, 239.

Compare Ibn Batuta above. After 150 years, tank, grove, and jogi just as they were!

1510. "The King of the Ioghe is a man of great dignity, and has about 30,000 people, and he is a pagan, he and all his subjects; and by the pagan Kings he and his people are considered to be saints, on account of their lives, which you shall hear. . . ."—Varthema, p. 111.

Perhaps the chief of the Goraknātha Gosains, who were once very numerous on the West Coast, and have still a settlement at Kadri, near Mangalore. See P. della Valle's notice below.

1516. "And many of them noble and respectable people, not to be subject to the Moors, go out of the Kingdom, and take the habit of poverty, wandering the world . . . they carry very heavy chains round their necks and waists, and legs; and they smear all their bodies and faces with ashes. . . . These people are commonly called jogues, and in their own speech they are called Zoame (see Swamy) which means Servant of God . . . These jogues eat all meats, and do not observe any idolatry."—Barbosa, 99-100.

1533. "Much of the general fear that affected the inhabitants of that city (Goa before its capture) proceeded from a Gentoo, of Bengal by nation, who went about in the habit of a Jogue, which is the straitest sect of their Religion . . . saying that the City would speedily have a new Lord, and would be inhabited by a strange people, contrary to the will of the natives."—De Barros, Dec. II., liv. v. cap. 3.

"For this reason the place (Adam's Peak) is so famous among all the Gentile-doms of the East yonder, that they resort thither as pilgrims from more than 1000 leagues off, and chiefly those whom they call Jogues, who are as men who have abandoned the world and dedicated themselves to God, and make great pilgrimages to visit the Temples consecrated to him."—Ib. Dec. III. liv. ii. cap. 1.

1563. ". . . to make them fight, like the cobras de capello which the jogues carry about asking alms of the people, and these jogues are certain heathen (Gentios) who go begging all about the country, powdered all over with ashes, and are venerated by all the poor heathen, and by some of the Moors also. . . ."—Garcia, i. 156v, 157.

1624. "Finally I went to see the King of the Jogis (Gioghi) where he dwelt at that time, under the shade of a cottage, and I found him roughly occupied in his affairs, as a man of the field and husbandman . . . and they told me his name was Batinata, and that the hermitage and the place generally was called Cadira."—P. della Valle, ii. 724.

1673. "Near the Gate in a Choultry sate more than Forty naked Jogies, or men united to God, covered with Ashes and pleited Turbats of their own Hair."—Fryer, 160.

1727. "There is another sort called Jogies, who . . . go naked except a bit of Cloth about their Loyns, and some deny themselves even that, delighting in Nastiness, and an holy Obscenity, with a great Show of Sanctity."—A. Ham., i. 152.

1809. "Fate work'd its own the while. A band Of Yogues, as they roamed the land Seeking a spouse for Jaga-Naut their God, Stray'd to this solitary glade."
Curse of Kehama, xiii. 16.

c. 1812. "Scarcely . . . were we seated when behold, there poured into the space before us, not only all the Yogees, Fakeers, and rogues of that description . . . but the King of the Beggars himself, wearing his peculiar badge."—Mrs. Sherwood (describing a visit to Henry Martyn at Cawnpore), Autobiog., 415.

"Apne gānw kā jogī ān gānw kā sidh." Hind. proverb: "The man who is a jogi in his own village is a deity in another."—Quoted by Elliot, ii. 207.

John Company, n.p. An old personification of the East India Company, by the natives often taken seriously, and so used, in former days.

1808. "However the business is pleasant now, consisting principally of orders to countermand military operations, and preparations to save Johnny Company's cash."—Lord Minto in India, 184.

1818-19. "In England the ruling power is possessed by two parties, one the King, who is Lord of the State, and the other the Honourable Company. The former governs his own country; and the latter, though only subjects, exceed the King in power, and are the directors of mercantile affairs."—Saditsukh, in Elliot, viii. 411.

1826. "He said that according to some accounts, he had heard the Company was an old Englishwoman . . . then again he told me that some of the Topee wallas say 'John Company,' and he knew that John was a man's name, for his master was called John Brice, but he could not say to a certainty whether 'Company' was a man's or a woman's name."—Pandurang Hari, 60.

1836. "The jargon that the English speak to the natives is most absurd. I call it 'John Company's English,' which rather affronts Mrs. Staunton."—Letters from Madras, 42.

1852. "John Company, whatever may be his faults, is infinitely better than Downing Street. If India were made over to the Colonial Office, I should not think it worth three years' purchase."—Mem. Col. Mountain, 293.

1880. "It fares with them as with the sceptics once mentioned by a South-Indian villager to a Government official. Some men had been now and then known, he said, to express doubt if there were any such person as John Company; but of such it was observed that something bad soon happened to them."—Sat. Review, Feb. 14th, p. 220.

Jompon, s. Hind. Jānpān, Japān. A kind of sedan, or portable chair used chiefly by the ladies at the Hill Sanitaria of Upper India. It is carried by two pairs of men (who are called Jomponnies, i.e. jānpāni or japāni), each pair bearing on their shoulders a short bar from which the shafts of the chair are slung. There is some perplexity as to the origin of the word. For we find in Crawford's Malay Dict. "Jam-puna (Jav. Jampona), a kind of litter." Also the Javanese Dict. of P. Jansz (1876) gives: "Djempānā—dragstoel (i.e. portable chair), or sedan of a person of rank." The word cannot, however, have been introduced into India by the officers who served in Java (1811—1815), for its use is much older in the Himalāya, as may be seen by the quotation from P. Desideri.

Wilson has the following: "Jhāmpān, Bengali. A stage on which snake-catchers and other juggling vagabonds exhibit; a kind of sedan used by travellers in the Himalāya, written Jāmpaun (?)."

It seems just possible that the name may indicate the thing to have been borrowed from Japan. But the fact that dp̄yān means 'hang' in Tibetan may indicate another origin.

1716. "The roads are nowhere practicable for a horseman, or for a Jampan, a sort of palankin."—Letter of P. Ipōlito Desideri, dated April 10th, in Lettres Edif., xv. 184.

1783 (after a description). "... by these central poles the litter, or as it is here called, the Sampan, is supported on the shoulders of four men."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 3.

1879. "The gondola of Simla is the 'jampan,' or 'jampot,' as it is sometimes called, on the same linguistic principle . . . as that which converts asparagus into sparrow-grass. . . . Every lady on the hills keeps her jāmpān and jāmpānees . . . just as in the plains she keeps her carriage and footmen."—Letter in Times, Aug. 17th.

Jool, Jhool, s. Hind. jhūl, supposed by Shakespear (no doubt correctly) to be a corrupt form of the Arab. jull, having much the same meaning. Housings, body clothing of a horse, elephant, or other domesticated animal; often a quilt, used as such. In colloquial use all over India. The modern Arabs use the plur. jūlāl as a singular. This Dozy defines as "couverture en laine plus ou moins ornée de dessins, très large, très chaude et enveloppant le poitrail et la croupe du cheval" (exactly the Indian jhāl)—also "ornement de soie qu'on étend sur la croupe des chevaux aux jours de fête."

1880. "Horse Jhools, &c., at shortest notice."—Advt. in Madras Mail, Feb. 13th.

Joola, s. Hind. jhūlā. The ordinary meaning of the word is 'a swing'; but in the Himalāya it is specifically applied to the rude suspension bridges used there.

1830. "Our chief object in descending to the Sutlej was to swing on a Joolah bridge. The bridge consists of 7 grass ropes, about twice the thickness of your thumb, tied to a single post on either bank. A piece of the hollowed trunk of a tree, half a yard long, slips upon these ropes, and from this 4 loops from the same grass rope depend. The passenger hangs in the loops, placing a couple of ropes under each thigh, and holds on by pegs in the block over his head; the signal is given, and he is drawn over by an eighth rope."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 114.

Joss, s. An idol. This is a corruption of the Portuguese Deos, 'God,' first taken up in the 'Pidgin' language of the Chinese ports from the Portuguese, and then adopted from that jargon by Europeans as if they had got hold of a Chinese word.

1639. "But the Devil (whom the Chinese commonly call Jossje) is a mighty and powerful Prince of the World."—Walter Schultz, 17.

"In a four-cornered cabinet in their dwelling-rooms, they have, as it were, an altar, and thereon an image . . . this they call Josin."—Saar, ed. 1672, p. 27.

1677. "All the Sinese keep a limning of the Devil in their houses. . . . They paint him with two horns on his head, and commonly call him Josie (Jossje)."—Gerret Vermeulen, Oost Indische Voyagie, 33.

1711. "I know but little of their Religion, more than that every Man has a small Joss or God in his own House."—Lockyer, 181.

1727. "Their Josses or Demi-gods some of human shape, some of monstrous Figure."—A. Ham., ii. 266.

c. 1790.

"Down with dukes, earls, and lords,
those pagan Josses,
False gods! away with stars and strings and crosses."

Peter Pindar, Ode to Kien Long.

Joss-house, s. An idol temple in China or Japan. From Joss, as just explained.

1840. "Every town, every village, it is true, abounds with Joss-houses, upon which large sums of money have been spent."—Mem. Col. Mountain, 186.

1876. ". . . the 'fantastic gables and tawdry ornaments of a large joss-house, or temple.'"—Fortnightly Review, No. cliii. 222.

1876.

"One Tim Wang he makee-tlavel, Makee stop one night in Joss-house."

Leland, Pidgin-English Sing-Song, p. 42.

Thus also in "pidgin," Joss-house-man or Joss-pidgin-man is a priest, or a missionary.

1750-52. "The sailors, and even some books of voyages . . . call the pagodas Joss-houses, for on enquiring of a Chinese for the name of the idol, he answers Grande Yoss, instead of Gran Dios."—Olof Toreen, 232.

1760-1810. "On the 8th, 18th, and 28th day of the Moon these foreign barbarians may visit the Flower Gardens, and the Honam Joss-House, but not in dyoves of over ten at a time."—"8 Regulations" at Canton, from The Fankwa at Canton (1882), p. 29.

Jostick or Joss-stick, s. A stick of fragrant tinder (powdered costus, sandalwood, &c.) used by the Chinese as incense in their temples, and formerly exported for use as cigar-lights. The name appears to be from the temple use. See Putchock.

1876. "Burnee joss-stick, talkee plitty."—Leland, p. 43.

1879. "There is a recess outside each shop, and at dusk the joss-sticks burning in these fill the city with the fragrance of incense."—Bird, Golden Chersonese, 49.

Jow, s. Hind. jhaw. The name is applied to various species of shrubby tamarisk which abound on the low alluvials of Indian rivers, and are useful in many ways, for rough basket making and the like. It is a usual material for gabions and fascines in Indian siege-operations.

Jowaula mookhee, n.p. (Skt. and) Hind. Jwālā-mukhī, 'flame-mouthed'; a generic name for quasi-volcanic phenomena, but particularly applied to a place in the Kangra district of the Punjab mountain country, near the Biās River, where jets of gas issue from the ground and are kept constantly burning. There is a shrine of Devī, and it is a place of pilgrimage famous all over the Himālaya as well as in the plains of India. The famous fire-jets at Baku are sometimes visited by more adventurous Indian pilgrims, and known as the Great Jwālā-mukhī. The author of the following passage was evidently ignorant of the phenomenon worshipped, though the name indicates its nature.

c. 1360. Sultān Fīroz . . . marched with his army towards Nagarkot (see Nugercote) . . . the idol Jwālā-mukhī, much worshipped by the infidels, was situated on the road to Nagarkot. . . . Some of the infidels have reported that Sultān Fīroz went specially to see this idol, and held a golden umbrella over its head. But . . . the infidels slandered the Sultān. . . . Other infidels have said that Sultān Muhammad Shāh bin Tughlik Shāh held an umbrella over this same idol, but this also is a lie. . . ."—Shams-i-Sirāj Afīf, in Elliot, iii. 318.

1783. "At Taullah Mhokee (sic) a small volcanic fire issues from the side of a mountain, on which the Hindoos have raised a temple that has long been of celebrity, and favourite resort among the people of the Punjab."—G. Forster's Journey, ed. 1798, i. 308.

1799. "Prason Poory afterwards travelled . . . to the Maha or Buree (i.e. larger) Jowalla Mookhi or Juāla Mūchi, terms that mean a 'Flaming Mouth,' as being a spot in the neighbourhood of Bakee (Baku) on the west side of the (Caspian) Sea . . . whence fire issues: a circumstance that has rendered it of great veneration with the Hindus."—Jonathan Duncan, in As. Res. v. 41.

Jowaur, Jowarree, s. Hind. javār,

Sorghum vulgare, Pers. (Holcus sorghum, L.). One of the best and most frequently grown of the tall millets of southern countries. It is grown nearly all over India in the unflooded tracts; it is sown about July and reaped in November. The reedy stems are 8 to 12 feet high. It is the cholam of the Tamil regions. See Kurby.

The Ar. dura or dhura is perhaps the same word ultimately as javvar; for the old Semitic name is dokn, from the smoky aspect of the grain.

It is an odd instance of the looseness which used to pervade dictionaries and glossaries that R. Drummond (Illns. of the Gram. Parts of Guzerattee, &c., Bombay, 1808) calls "Jooar, a kind of pulse, the food of the common people."

1800. "... my industrious followers must live either upon jowarry, of which there is an abundance everywhere, or they must be more industrious in procuring rice for themselves."—Wellington, i. 175.

1813. Forbes calls it "juarree or cush-cush" (?).—Or. Mem., ii. 406.

1819. "In 1797-8 joiwaree sold in the Muchoo Kaunta at six rupees per culsee (see culsey) of 24 maunds."—Macmurdo, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo., i. 287.

Joy, s. This seems from the quotation to have been used on the west coast for jewel (Port. joia).

1810. "The vanity of parents sometimes leads them to dress their children, even while infants, in this manner, which affords a temptation . . . to murder these helpless creatures for the sake of their ornaments or joys."—Maria Graham, 3.

Juttee, Juptee, &c., s. Guz. japti, &c. Corrupt forms of zabt. See Zabt.

1808. "The Sindias as Sovereigns of Broach used to take the revenues of Moaj moodars and Desoys (see dessaye) of that district every third year, amounting to Rs. 38,390, and called the periodical confiscation Juptee."—E. Drummond.

Judea, Odia, &c., n.p. These are names often given in old writers to the city of Ayuthia, or Ayodhya, or Yuthia (so called apparently after the Hindu city of Rāmā, Ayodhya, which we now call Oudh), which was the capital of Siam from the 14th century down to about 1767, when it was destroyed by the Burmese, and the Siamese royal residence was transferred to Bangkok.

1522. "All these cities are constructed like ours, and are subject to the King of Siam, who is named Siri Zacabedera, and who inhabits India."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 150.

c. 1546. "The capitall City of all this Empire is Odiaa, whereof I haue spoken heretofore: it is fortified with walls of brick and mortar, and contains, according to some, foure hundred thousand fires, whereof an hundred thousand are strangers of diuers countries."—Pinto (in Cogan's E. T.), p. 285; orig. cap. clxxxix.

1553. "For the Realm is great, and its Cities and Towns very populous; inasmuch that the city Hudia alone, which is the capital of the Kingdom of Siam (Sido), and the residence of the King, furnishes 50,000 men of its own."—Barros, III. ii. 5.

1614. "As regards the size of the City of Odia . . . it may be guessed by an experiment made by a curious engineer with whom we communicated on the subject. He says that . . . he embarked in one of the native boats, small, and very light, with the determination to go all round the City (which is entirely compassed by water), and that he started one day from the Portuguese settlement, at dawn, and when he got back it was already far on in the night, and he affirmed that by his calculation he had gone more than 8 leagues."—Couto, VI. vii. 9.

1617. "The merchants of the country of Lan John, a place joining to the country of Jangama (see Jangomai) arrived at 'the city of Judea' before Eaton's coming away from thence, and brought great store of merchandize."—Sainsbury, ii. p. 90.

1727. "... all are sent to the City of Siam or Odia for the King's Use. . . . The City stands on an Island in the River Memnon, which by Turnings and Windings, makes the Distance from the Bar about 50 Leagues."—A. Ham. ii. 160.

Jugboolak, s. Marine Hind. for jack-block (Ræbuck).

Juggurnaut, n.p. A corruption of the Sansk. Jagunnātha, 'Lord of the Universe,' a name of Krishna worshipped as Vishnu at the famous shrine of Puri in Orissa. The image so called is an amorphous idol, much like those worshipped in some of the South Sea Islands, and it has been plausibly suggested (we believe first by Gen. Cunningham) that it was in reality a Buddhist symbol, which has been adopted as an object of Brahminical worship, and made to serve as the image of a god. The idol was, and is, annually dragged forth in procession on a monstrous car, and as masses of excited pilgrims crowded round to drag or accompany it, accidents occurred. Occasionally also persons, sometimes sufferers from painful disease, cast themselves before the advancing wheels. The testimony of Mr. Stirling, who was for some years Collector of Orissa in the second decade of this century, and that of Dr. W. W. Hunter, who states that he has gone through the MS. archives of the province since it became British, show that the popular impression in regard to the continued frequency of immolations on these occasions, —a belief which has made Juggurnaut a standing metaphor,—was greatly exaggerated. The belief indeed in the custom of such immolation had existed for centuries, and the rehearsal of these or other cognate religious suicides at one or other of the great temples of the Peninsula, founded partly on fact, and partly on popular report, finds a place in almost every old narrative relating to India.

The really great mortality from hardship, exhaustion, and epidemic disease which frequently ravaged the crowds of pilgrims on such occasions, doubtless aided in keeping up the popular impressions in connexion with the Juggurnaut festival.

c. 1321. "Annually on the recurrence of the day when that idol was made, the folk of the country come and take it down, and put it on a fine chariot; and then the King and Queen, and the whole body of the people, join together and draw it forth from the church with loud singing of songs, and all kinds of music . . . and many pilgrims who have come to this feast cast themselves under the chariot, so that its wheels may go over them, saying that they desire to die for their god. And the car passes over them, and crushes them, and cuts them in sunder, and so they perish on the spot."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c. i. 83.

c. 1430. "In Bizenegalia (see Bisnagar) also, at a certain time of the year, this idol is carried through the city, placed between two chariots . . . accompanied by a great concourse of people. Many, carried away by the fervour of their faith, cast themselves on the ground before the wheels, in order that they may be crushed to death,—a mode of death which they say is very acceptable to their god."—N. Conti, in India in XVth Cent., 28.

c. 1581. "All for devotion attach themselves to the trace of the car, which is drawn in this manner by a vast number of people . . . and on the annual feast day of the Pagod this car is dragged by crowds of people through certain parts of the city (Negapatam) some of whom from devotion, or the desire to be thought to make a devoted end, cast themselves down under the wheels of the cars, and so perish, remaining all ground and crushed by the said cars."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 84.

The preceding passages refer to scenes in the south of the Peninsula.

c. 1590. "In the town of Pursotem on the banks of the sea stands the temple of Jagnaut, near to which are the images of Kishen, his brother, and their sister, made of Sandal-wood, which are said to be 4,000 years old. . . . The Brahmins . . . at certain times carry the image in procession upon a carriage of sixteen wheels, which in the Hindoo language is called Rahth; and they believe that whoever assists in drawing it along obtains remission of all his sins."—Gladwin's Ayeen, ii. 13-15.

1632. "Vnto this Pagod or house of Sathen . . . doe belong 9,000 Brammines or Priests, which doe dayly offer sacrifice vnto their great God Jaggarnat, from which Idoll the City is so called . . . . And when it (the chariot of Jaggarnat) is going along the city, there are many that will offer themselves a sacrifice to this Idoll, and desperately lye downe on the ground, that the Chariott wheelies may runne over them, whereby they are killed outright; some get broken armes, some broken legges, so that many of them are destroyed, and by this means they thinke to merit Heauen."—W. Bruton, in Hakluyt, v. 57.

1667. "In the Town of Jagannat, which is seated upon the Gulf of Bengala, and where is that famous Temple of the Idol of the same name, there is yearly celebrated a certain Feast. . . . The first day that they shew this Idol with Ceremony in the Temple, the Crowd is usually so great to see it, that there is not a year, but some of those poor Pilgrims, that come afar off, tired and harassed, are suffocated there; all the people blessing them for having been so happy. . . . And when this Hellish Triumphant Chariot marcheth, there are found (which is no Fable) persons so foolishly credulous and superstitious as to throw themselves with their bellies under those large and heavy wheels, which bruise them to death. . . ."—Bernier, a Letter to Mr. Chaplain, in Eng. ed. 1684, 97.

1682. " . . . We lay by all last night till 10 o'clock this morning, ye Captain being desirous to see ye Jagernot Pagodas for his better satisfaction. . . ."—Hedges, Journal, July 16.

1727. "His (Jagarynat's) Effigy is often carried abroad in Procession, mounted on a Coach four stories high . . . they fasten small Ropes to the Cable, two or three Fathoms long, so that upwards of 2,000 People have room enough to draw the Coach, and some old Zealots, as it passes through the Street, fall flat on the Ground, to have the Honour to be crushed to Pieces by the Coach Wheels."—A. Ham. i. 387.

"A thousand pilgrims strain Arm, shoulder, breast, and thigh, with night and main,

To drag that sacred wain,
And scarce can draw along the enormous load.

Prone fall the frantic votaries on the road,
And calling on the God

Their self-devoted bodies there they lay
To pave his chariot way.

On Jaga-Naut they call,

The ponderous car rolls on, and crushes
all,

Through flesh and bones it ploughs its dreadful path.

Groans rise unheard; the dying cry.

And death, and agony

Are trodden under foot by yon mad throng,

Who follow close and thrust the deadly wheels along."

Curse of Kehama, xiv. 5.

1814. "The sight here beggars all description. Though Juggernaut made some progress on the 19th, and has travelled daily ever since, he has not yet reached the place of his destination. His brother is ahead of him, and the lady in the rear. One woman has devoted herself under the wheels, and a shocking sight it was. Another also intended to devote herself, missed the wheels with her body, and had her arm broken. Three people lost their lives in the crowd."—In Asiatic Journal—quoted in Beveridge, Hist. of India, ii. 54, without exact reference.

c. 1818. "That excess of fanaticism which formerly prompted the pilgrims to court death by throwing themselves in crowds under the wheels of the car of Jagannāth has happily long ceased to actuate the worshippers of the present day. During 4 years that I have witnessed the ceremony, three cases only of this revolting species of immolation have occurred, one of which I may observe is doubtful, and should probably be ascribed to accident; in the other the victims had long been suffering from some excruciating complaints, and chose this method of ridding themselves of the burthen of life in preference to other modes of suicide so prevalent with the lower orders under similar circumstances."—A. Stirling, in As. Res. xv. 324.

1827. March 28th in this year, Mr. Poynder, in the E. I. Court of Proprietors, stated that "about the year 1790 no fewer than 28 Hindus were crushed to death at Ishera on the Ganges, under the wheels of Juggernaut."—As. Journal, 1821, vol. xxiii. p. 702.

1871. "... poor Johnny Tetterby staggering under his Moloch of an infant, the Juggernaut that crushed all his enjoyments."—Forster's Life of Dickens, ii. 415.

1876. "Le monde en marchant n'a pas beaucoup plus de souci de ce qu'il écrase que le char de l'idole de Jagannāta."—E. Renan, in Revue des Deux Mondes, 3<sup>e</sup> Série, xviii., p. 504.

Julibdar, s. Pers. jālabdār, lit. a 'bridle-holder'; also the superintendents of the mules, &c. in a cafila. This word occurs in puzzling distortions in the MS. Journal of William Hedges. In his day it must have been commonly used in Bengal, but it is now quite obsolete.

1673. "In the heart of this Square is raised a place as large as a Mountebank's Stage, where the Gelabdar, or Master Muliteer, with his prime Passengers or Servants, have an opportunity to view the whole Cuphala."—Fryer, 341.

1683. "Your Jylibdar, after he had received his letter would not stay for the Genl, but stood upon departure."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 15th.

"We admire what made you send peons to force our Gyllibdar back to your Factory, after he had gone 13 coses on his way, and dismiss him again without any reason for it."—Ibid. Sept. 26th.

1754. "100 Gilodar; those who are charged with the direction of the couriers and their horses."—Hamway's Travels, i. 171.

Jumbëea, s. Ar. Janbiya, probably from janb, 'the side'; a kind of dagger worn in the girdle, so as to be drawn across the body. It is usually in form slightly curved. Capt. Burton (Cambs, Commentary, 413) identifies it with the agomia and gomio of the quotations below, and refers to a sketch in his Pilgrimage, but this we cannot find, though the janbiyah is several times mentioned, e.g. i. 347, iii. 72. The term occurs repeatedly in Mr. Egerton's catalogue of arms in the India Museum. Janbwa occurs as the name of a dagger in the Āin (orig. i. 119); why Blochmann in his translation spells it janbwah we do not know. See also Dozy and Eng. s.v. jamiette. It seems very doubtful if the latter French word has anything to do with the Arabic word.

c. 1328. "Taki-ud-din refused roughly and pushed him away. Then the maimed man drew a dagger (khanjar) such as is called in that country janbiya, and gave him a mortal wound."—Ibn Bat. i. 534.

1498. "The Moors had erected palisades of great thickness, with thick planking, and fastened so that we could not see them within. And their people paraded the shore with targets, azagays, agomias, and bows and slings from which they slung stones at us."—Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, 32.

1516. "They go to fight one another bare from the waist upwards, and from the waist downwards wrapped in cotton cloths drawn tightly round, and with many folds, and with their arms, which are swords, bucklers, and daggers (gomios)."—Barbosa, p. 80.

Jumdud, s. H. jamdad, and jam-dhar. A kind of dagger; broad at base and slightly curved, the hilt formed with a cross-grip like that of the Katar (see Kuttaur).

F. Johnson's Dictionary gives jam-dar as a Persian word with the suggested etymology of janb-dar, 'flank-render.' But in the Āin the word is spelt jamdhar, which seems to indicate Hind. origin; and its occurrence in the poem of Chand Bardāi (see Indian Antiquary, i. 281) corroborates this. Mr. Beames there suggests the etymology Yama-dant, 'Death's Tooth.' The drawings of the jamdhad or jamdhar in the Āin illustrations show several specimens with double and triple toothed points, which perhaps favours this view; but Yama-dhāra, 'death-wielder,' appears in the Sanskrit dictionaries as the name of a weapon.

See passage from Baber quoted under Kuttaur.

Jumma, s. Hind. from Arab. jamā'. The total assessment (for land revenue) from any particular estate, or division of country. The Arab. word signifies 'total,' or 'aggregate.'

1781. "An increase of more than 26 lacks of rupees (was) effected on the former jumma."—Fifth Report, p. 8.

Jummabundee, s. Hind. from Pers. Arab. jamā'bandi. A settlement (q.v.) i.e. the determination of the amount of land revenue due for a year, or period of years, from a village, estate, or parcel of land.

Jumna, n.p. The name of a famous river in India which runs by Delhi and Agra. Skt. Yamunā, Hind. Jamunā and Jamnā, the Ἀμαμόνα of Ptolemy, the Ἰαμόνας of Arrian, the Jomanes of Pliny. The spelling of Ptolemy almost exactly expresses the modern Hind. form Jamunā.

The name Jamunā is also applied to what was in the last century an unimportant branch of the Brahmaputra R. which connected it with the Ganges, but which has now for many years been the main channel of the former great river. See Jenny.

Jamunā is the name of several other rivers of less note.

Jungeera, n.p., i.e. Janjīrā. The name of a native state on the coast, south of Bombay, from which the Fort and chief place is 44 m. distant. This place is on a small island, rising in the entrance to the Rājpurī inlet, to which the name Janjīrā properly pertains, believed to be a local corruption of the Arab. Jazīra, 'Island.' The state is also called Habsān, meaning 'Hubshee's land,' from the fact that for 3 or 4 centuries its chief has been of that race. This was not at first continuous, nor have the chiefs, even when of African blood, been always of one family; but they have apparently been so for the last 200 years. 'The Sidī,' and 'The Habsī,' are titles popularly applied to this chief.

The old Portuguese writers call this harbour Danda (or as they write it Damda), e.g. Joao de Castro in Primeiro Roteiro, p. 48. His rude chart shows the island-fort.

Jungle, s. Hind. and Mahr. jangal, from Sansk. jaṅgala (a word which occurs chiefly in medical treatises). The native word means in strictness only waste, uncultivated ground; then, such ground covered with shrubs, trees, or long grass; and thence again the Anglo-Indian application is to the forest, or other wild growth, rather than to the fact that it is not cultivated. A forest; a thicket; a tangled wilderness.

The word seems to have passed at a rather early date into Persian, and also into use in Turkestan. From Anglo-Indian it has been adopted in French as well as in English. The word does not seem to occur in Fryer, which rather indicates that its use was not so extremely common among foreigners as it now is.

c. 1200. "... Now the land is humid, jungle (jaṅgala), or of the ordinary kind."—Susruta, i. ch. 35. 11

c. 1370. "Elephants were numerous as sheep in the jangal round the Rāī's dwelling."—Tārīkh-i-Fīroz-Shāhi, in Elliot, iii. 314.

c. 1450. "The Kings of India hunt the elephant. They will stay a whole month or more in the wilderness, and in the jungle jungal)—Abdurrazzāk, in Not. et Ext. xiv. 51.

1474. "... Bicheneger. The vast city is surrounded by three ravines, and intersected by a river, bordering on one side on a dreadful Jungle."—Ath. Nikitin, in India in XVth Cent. 29.

1776. "Land waste for five years . . . is called Jungle."—Halhed's Gentoo Code, 190.

1809. "The air of Calcutta is much affected by the closeness of the jungle around it."—Ld. Valentia, i. 207.

"They built them here a bower of jointed cane,
Strong for the needful use, and light and long
Was the slight framework rear'd, with little pain;
Lithe creepers then the wicker sides supply,
And the tall jungle grass fit roofing gave Beneath the genial sky."

C. of Kehama, xiii. 7.

c. 1830. "C'est là que je rencontraï les jungles . . . j'avoue que je fus très désappointé."—Jaquemont, Correspond. i. 134.

c. 1833-38.

"L'Hippotame au large ventre
Habite aux Jungles de Java,
Où gronde, au fond de chaque antrée
Plus de monstres qu'on ne rêva."

Theoph. Gautier, in Poésies Complètes, ed. 1876, i. 325.

1848. "But he was as lonely here as in his jungle at Boggleywala."—Thackeray, Vanity Fair, ch. iii.

c. 1858.

"La bête formidable, habitante des jungles S'endort, le ventre en l'air, et dilate ses ongles."—Leconte de Lisle.

"Des jungles du Pendj-Ab Aux sables du Karnate."—Id.

1865. "To an eye accustomed for years to the wild wastes of the jungle, the whole country presents the appearance of one continuous well-ordered garden."—Waring, Tropical Resident at Home, 7.

1867. "... here are no cobwebs of plea and counterplea, no jungles of argument and brakes of analysis."—Swinburne, Essays and Studies, 133.

1873. "Jungle, derived to us, through the living language of India, from the Sanskrit, may now be regarded as good English."—Fitz-Edward Hall, Modern English, 306.

1878. "Cet animal est commun dans les forêts, et dans les djengles."—Marre, Kata-Kata-Malayou, 83.

1879. "The owls of metaphysic hooted from the gloom of their various jungles."—Fortnightly Review, No. clxv., N.S., 19.

Jungle-fever, s. A dangerous remittent fever arising from the malaria of forest or jungle tracts.

1808. "I was one day sent to a great distance, to take charge of an officer who had been seized by jungle-fever."—Letter in Morton's Life of Lyden, 43.

Jungle-fowl, s. The popular name of more than one species of those birds from which our domestic poultry are supposed to be descended; especially Gallus Sonneratii, Temminck, the Grey Jungle-fowl, and Gallus ferrugineus, Gmelin, the Red Jungle-fowl. The former belongs only to Southern India; the latter from the Himalaya, south to the N. Circars on the east, and to the Rajpipla Hills south of the Nerbudda on the west.

1800. "... the thickets bordered on the village, and I was told abounded in jungle-fowl."—Symes, Embassy to Ava, ii. 96.

1868. "The common jungle-cock . . . was also obtained here. It is almost exactly like a common game-cock, but the voice is different."—Wallace, Malay Archip., 108.

The word jungle is habitually used adjectively, as in this instance, to denote wild species, e.g. jungle-cat, jungle-dog, jungle-fruit, &c.

Jungle-Mahals, n.p. H. Jangul-Mahāl. This, originally a vague name of sundry tracts and chieftainships lying between the settled districts of Bengal and the hill country of Chutiā Nāg-pūr, was constituted a regular district in 1805, but again broken up and re-distributed among adjoining districts in 1833 (see Imperial Gazetteer, s.v.).

Jungle-Terry, n.p. Hind. Jangaltarāi (see Terye). A name formerly applied to a border-tract between Bengal and Behar, including the inland parts of Monghyr and Bhāgalpūr, and what are now termed the Santāl Pargāns. Hodges, below, calls it to the "westward" of Bhāgalpūr; but Barkope, which he describes as near the centre of the tract, lies, according to Rennell's map, about 35 m. S.E. of Bhāgalpūr town; and the Cleveland inscription shows that the term included the tract occupied by the Rajmahāl hill-people.

The Map No. 2 in Rennell's Bengal Atlas (1779) is entitled "the Jungle-terry District, with the adjacent provinces of Birbhoom, Rajemal, Bogli-pour, &c., comprehending the countries situated between Moorshedabad and Bahar." But the map itself does not show the name Jungle Terry anywhere.

1781. "Early in February we set out on a tour through a part of the country called the Jungle-Terry, to the westward of Bauglepor . . . after leaving the village of Barkope, which is nearly in the centre of the Jungle Terry, we entered the Hills . . . In the great famine which raged through Indostan in the year 1770 . . . the Jungle Terry is said to have suffered greatly."—Hodges, pp. 90-95.

c. 1788.

"To the Memory of
AUGUSTUS CLEVELAND, Esq.,
Late Collector of the Districts of Bhaugulpore and Rajamahall, Who without Bloodshed or the Terror of Authority,
Employing only the Means of Conciliation, Confidence, and Benevolence, Attempted and Accomplished
The entire Subjection of the Lawless and Savage Inhabitants of the Jungleterry of Rajamahall . . ." (etc).
Inscription on the Monument erected by Government to Cleveland, who died in 1784.

1824. "This part, I find, (he is writing at Monghyr,) is not reckoned either in Bengal or Bahar, having been, under the name of the Jungleterry district, always regarded, till its pacification and settlement, as a sort of border or debateable land."—Heber, i. 131.

Junglo, s. Guz. janglo. This term, we are told by R. Drummond, was used in his time (the beginning of this century) by the less polite, to distinguish Europeans; "wild men of the woods," that is, who did not understand Guzerati!

1808. "Joseph Maria, a well-known scribe of the order of Topeewallas . . . was actually mobbed, on the first circuit of 1806, in the town of Pitland, by parties of curious old women and young, some of whom gazing upon him put the question, Are Jungla, too munne pirnceesh? 'O wild one, wilt thou marry me?' He knew not what they asked, and made no answer, whereupon they declared that he was indeed a very Jungla, and it required all the address of Kripram (the worthy Brahmin who related this anecdote to the writer, uncontradicted in presence of the said Senhor) to draw off the dames and damsels from the astonished Joseph."—R. Drummond, Illus. s. v.

Junk, s. A large Eastern ship; especially (and in later use exclusively) a Chinese ship. This indeed is the earliest application also; any more general application belongs to an intermediate period.

This is one of the oldest words in the Europeo-Indian vocabulary. It occurs in the travels of Friar Odorico, written down in 1331, and a few years later in the rambling reminiscences of John de' Marignolli. The great Catalan World-map of 1375 gives a sketch of one of those ships with their sails of bamboo matting, and calls them fucti, no doubt a clerical error for fucti. Dobner, the original editor of Marignolli, in the last century, says of the word (junkos): "This word I cannot find in any medieval glossary. Most probably we are to understand vessels of platted reeds (a juncis texta) which several authors relate to be used in India." It is notable that the same erroneous suggestion is made by Amerigo Vespucci in his curious letter to one of the Medici, giving an account of the voyage of Da Gama, whose squadron he had met at C. Verde on its way home.

The French translators of Ibn Batuta derive the word from the Chinese tchouen (chwen), and Littré gives the same etymology (s.v. jonque). It is possible that the word may be eventually traced to a Chinese original, but not very probable. The old Arab traders must have learned the word from Malay pilots, for it is certainly the Javanese and Malay jong and ajong, 'a ship or large vessel.' In Javanese the Great Bear is called Lintang jong, 'The Constellation Junk.'

c. 1300. "Large ships called in the language of China 'Junks' bring various sorts of choice merchandize and cloths from Chin and Machin, and the countries of Hind and Sind."—Rashiduddin in Elliot, i. 69.

1331. "And when we were there in harbour at Polumbum, we embarked in another ship called a Junk (aliam navim nomine Zuncum) . . . Now on board that ship there were good 700 souls, what with sailors and with merchants . . ."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 73.

c. 1343. "They make no voyages on the China Sea except with Chinese vessels . . . of these there are three kinds; the big ones which are called junk, in the plural junk. . . . Each of these big ships carries from three up to twelve sails. The sails are made of bamboo slips, woven like mats; they are never hauled down, but are shifted round as the wind blows from one quarter or another."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 91.

The French translators write the words as gonk (and gonodk). Ibn Batuta really indicates chunk (and chunāk); but both must have been quite wrong.

c. 1348. "Wishing then to visit the shrine of St. Thomas the Apostle . . . we embarked on certain Junks (ascendentes Junkos) from Lower India, which is called Minubar."—Marignoli, in Cathay, &c., 356.

1459. "About the year of Our Lord 1420, a Ship or Junk of India, in crossing the Indian Sea, was driven . . . in a westerly and south-westerly direction for 40 days, without seeing anything but sky and sea. . . . The ship having touched on the coast to supply its wants, the mariners beheld there the egg of a certain bird called chrocho, which egg was as big as a butt . . ."—Rubric on Fra Mauro's Great Map at Venice.

"The Ships or junks (Zonchi) which navigate this sea, carry 4 masts, and others besides that they can set up or strike (at will); and they have 40 to 60 little chambers for the merchants, and they have only one rudder. . . ."—Ibid.

1516. "Many Moorish merchants reside in it (Malacca), and also Gentiles, particularly Chetis, who are natives of Choldmendel; and they are all very rich, and have many large ships which they call jungos."—Barbosa, 191.

1549. "Exclusus isto concilio, applicavit animum ad navem Sinensis formae, quam Incuncum vocant."—Sedi. Franc. Xaverii Epist. 337.

1563. "Juncos are certain long ships that have stern and prow fashioned in the same way."—Garcia, i. 58 b.

1591. "By this Negro we were advertised of a small Barke of some thirtie tunnes (which the Moors call a Juncoc)."—Barker's Acc. of Lancaster's Voyage, Hakl. ii. 589.

1616. "And doubtless they had made havock of them all, had they not presently been relieved by two Arabian Junks (for so their small ill-built ships are named. . . ."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 342.

1630. "So repairing to Iasques, a place in the Persian Gulph, they obtained a flettee of Seaven Iuncks, to convey them and theirs as Merchantmen bound for the Shores of India."—Lord, Religion of the Perses, 3.

1673. Fryer also speaks of "Portugal Junks." The word had thus come to mean any large vessel in the Indian Seas. Barker's use for a small vessel (above) is exceptional.

Junkameer, s. This word occurs in Wheeler, i. 300. It was long a perplexity, and as it was the subject of one of Dr. Burnell's latest, if not the very last, of his contributions to this work, I transcribe the words of his communication:

"Working at improving the notes to v. Linschoten, I have accidentally cleared up the meaning of a word you asked me about long ago, but which I was then obliged to give up—'Jonkamir.' It = 'a collector of customs:'"

"(1745). 'Notre Supérieur qui scaivoit qu'à moitié chemin certains Jonquaniens * mettoient les passans à contribution, nous avoit donné un ou deux fanons (see fanam) pour les payer en allant et en revenant, au cas qu'ils l'exigeassent de nous.'—P. Norbert, Memoires, pp. 159-160.

"The original word is in Malayālam chungakāran, and do. in Tamil. I have often heard it in Tamil, though it does not occur in the Dictionaries of that language; but chungam (= 'Customs') does.

"I was much pleased to settle this curious word; but I should never have thought of the origin of it, had it not been for that rascally old Capuchin P. Norbert's note."

My friend's letter (from West Stratton) has no date, but it must have been written in July or August, 1882.—[H. Y.] See Junkeon.

Junk-Ceylon, n.p. The popular name of an island off the west coast of the Malay Peninsula. Forrest (Voyage to Mergui, pp. iii. and 29-30) calls it Jan-Sylan, and says it is properly Ujong (i.e., in Malay, 'Cape') Sylang. This appears to be nearly right. The name is, according to Crawford (Malay Dict. s.v. Salang, and Dict. Ind. Archip. s.v. Ujung) Ujung Salang, 'Salang Headland.'

1539. "There we crost over to the firm Land, and passing by the Port of Juncalan (Juncaldo) we sailed two days and a' half with a favorable wind, by means whereof we got to the River of Parles in the Kingdom of Queda . . ."—Pinto (orig. cap. xix.) in Cogan, p. 22.

1592. "We departed thence to a Baie in the Kingdom of Junsalaom, which is betweene Malacca and Pegu, 8 degrees to the Northward."—Barker, in Hakluyt, ii. 591.

1727. "The North End of Jonk Ceyloan lies within a Mile of the Continent."—A. Ham, 69.

Junkeon, s. This word occurs as below. It is no doubt some form of the word chungam, mentioned under Junkameer. Wilson gives Telugu Sunkam, which might be used in Orissa; where Bruton was.

"Ce sont des Maures qui exigent de l'argent sur les grands chemins, de ceux qui passent avec quelques marchandises; souvent ils en demandent à ceux mêmes qui n'en portent point. On regarde ces gens-là à peu près comme des voleurs."

1638. "Any Iunkeon or Custome."—Bruton's Narrative, in Hakl. v. 53.

Juribasso, s. This word, meaning 'an interpreter,' occurs constantly in the Diary of Richard Cocks, of the English Factory in Japan, admirably edited for the Hakluyt Society by Mr. Edward Maunde Thompson (1883). The word is really Malayo-Javanese jurubahāsa, lit. 'language-master,' juru being an expert, a master of a craft, and bahāsa the Sansk. bhāṣā, 'speech.'

1613. "(Said the Mandarin of Ancão) . . . 'Captain-major, Auditor, residents, and jerubacas, for the space of two days you must come before me to attend to these instructions (capitulos), in order that I may write to the Ailão' . . ."

"These communications being read in the Chamber of the city of Macau, before the Vereadores, the people, and the Captain-Major then commanding in the said city, João Serrão da Cunha, they sought for a person who might be charged to reply, such as had knowledge and experience of the Chinese, and of their manner of speech, and finding Lourenço Carvalho . . . he made the reply in the following form of words ' . . . To this purpose we the Captain-Major, the Auditor, the Vereadores, the Padres, and the Jurubaca, assembling together and hearing our foreheads before God . . .'"—Bocarro, pp. 725-729.

"The fourteenth, I sent M. Cokes, and my Jurebasso to both the Kings to entreat them to provide me of a dozen Sea-men."—Capt. Saris, in Purchas, 378.

1615. ". . . his desire was that, for his sake, I would geve over the pursute of this matter against the sea bongew, for that yf it were followed, of force the said bongew must cut his bellie, and then my jurebasso must do the lyke. Unto which his request I was content to agree . . ."—Cocks's Diary, i. 33.

Jute, s. The fibre (Gunny-fibre) of the bark of Corchorus capsularis, L., and Corchorus olitorius, L., which in the last 30 years has become so important an export from India, and a material for manufacture in Great Britain as well as in India.

"At the last meeting of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, Professor Skeat commented on various English words. Jute, a fibrous substance, he explained from the Sanskrit jāta, a less usual form of jaṭa, meaning 1st, the matted hair of an ascetic; 2ndly, the fibrous roots of a tree such as the banyan; 3rdly, any fibrous substance." (Academy, Dec. 27th, 1879.) The secondary meanings attributed here to jaṭa are very doubtful.* The term jute appears to have been first used by Dr. Roxburgh in a letter dated 1795, in which he drew the attention of the Court of Directors to the value of the fibre "called jute by the natives."

The name in fact appears to be taken from the vernacular name in Orissa. This is stated to be properly jhōṭṭ, but jhūtṭ is used by the uneducated.†

Jutka, s. From Dak. Hind., jhātka, 'quick.' The native cab of Madras, and of Mofussil towns in that Presidency; a conveyance only to be characterised by the epithet rani-shackle, though in that respect equalled by the Calcutta Cranchie (q.v.). It consists of a sort of box with venetian windows, on two wheels, and drawn by a miserable pony. It is entered by a door at the back. See Shigram, with like meanings.

Juzail, s. This word jazāil is generally applied to the heavy Afghan rifle, fired with a forked rest. If it is Arab. it must be the plural of jazil, 'big,' used as a substantive. Jazil is often used for a big, thick thing, so it looks probable. See Binjaul.

Jyedad, s. P.-H.- jāidād. Territory assigned for the support of troops.

Jyshe. This term (Ar. Jaish, an army, a legion) was applied by Tippoo to his regular infantry, the body of which was called the Jaish Kachuri (see under Cutcherry).

c. 1782. "About this time the Bar or regular infantry, Kutcheri, were called the Jysh Kutcheri."—Hist. of Tippu Sultan, by Hussein Ali Khan Kermani, p. 32.

1786. "At such times as new levies or recruits for the Jyshe and Piadehs are to be entertained, you two and Syed Peer assembling in Kuchurry are to entertain none but proper and eligible men."—Tippoo's Letters, 256.

K.

Kajee, s. This is a title of Ministers of State used in Nepal

* This remark is from a letter of Mr. Burnell's dd. Tanjore, 16th March, 1880.

† See Report of the Jute Commission by Balu Hemchandra Kerr, Calcutta, 1874; also a letter from Mr. J. S. Cotton in the Academy, Jan'y. 17th 1880.

and Sikkim. It is no doubt the Arabic word (see Cazee). Kāṛi is the pronunciation of this last word in various parts of India.

1848. "Kajeas, Counsellors, and mitred Lamas were there, to the number of twenty, all planted with their backs to the wall, mute and motionless as statues."—Hooker's Himalayan Journals, ed. 1855, i. 286.

1868. "The Durbar (of Nepal) have written to the four Kajeas of Thibet enquiring the reason."—Letter from Col. R. Lawrence, dd. 1st April, regarding persecution of R. C. Missions in Thibet.

"Ho lamas, get ye ready!
Ho Kazis clear the way!
The chief will ride in all his pride
To the Rungeet Stream to-day."
Wilfrid Heeley, A Lay of Modern Darjeeling.

Kalinga, n.p. See Kling.

Kalla-nimmack, s. Hind. Kālā-namak, 'black salt,' a common mineral drug, used especially in horse-treatment. It is muriate of soda, having a mixture of oxide of iron, and some impurities (Royle).

Kapal, s. Kāpāl, the Malay word for 'ship,' "applied to any square-rigged vessel, with top and top-gallant masts" (Marsden, in Memoirs of a Malay Family, 57).

Karcanna, s. Hind. from Pers. kār-khāna, 'business-place.' We cannot improve upon Wilson's definition: "An office, or place where business is carried on; but it is in use more especially applied to places where mechanical work is performed; a workshop, a manufactory, an arsenal; also, fig., to any great fuss or bustle." The last use seems to be obsolete.

Kareeta, s. H. from A. kharīṭa, and in India also kharīṭa. The silk bag (described by Mrs. Parkes below) in which is enclosed a letter to or from a native noble; also, by transfer, the letter itself. In 2 Kings, v. 23, the bag in which Naaman bound the silver is kharīṭ; also in Isaiah iii. 22, the word translated 'crisping-pins' is kharīṭīm, rather 'purses.'

c. 1350. "The Sherif Ibrāhīm, surnamed the Khārītādār, i.e. the Master of the Royal Paper and Pens, was governor of the territory of Hānsī and Sarsatī."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 337.

1838. "Her Highness the Bāiza Bā'i

did me the honour to send me a Kharīṭa, that is a letter enclosed in a long bag of Kimkhwāb (see Kincob), crimson silk brocaded with flowers in gold, contained in another of fine muslin: the mouth of the bag was tied with a gold and tasseled cord, to which was appended the great seal of her Highness."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim (Parkes), ii. 250.

In the following passage the thing is described (at Constantinople):

1673. "... le Visir prenant un sachet de beau brocard d'or à fleurs, long tout au moins d'une demi aulne et large de cinq ou six doigts, lié et scellé par le haut avec une inscription qui y estoit attachée, et disant que c'estoit une lettre du Grand Seigneur..."—Journal d'Ant. Galland, ii. 94.

Karkollen, s. (see Caracoa).

1627. "They have Gallies after their manner, formed like Dragons, which they row very swiftly, they call them Karkollen."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 606.

Kaul, s. H. Kāl, properly, 'Time,' then a period, death, and popularly the visitation of famine. Under this word we read:

1808. "Scarcity, and the scourge of civil war, embittered the Mahratta nation in A.D. 1804, of whom many emigrants were supported by the justice and generosity of neighbouring powers, and (a large number) were relieved in their own capital by the charitable contributions of the English at Bombay alone. This and opening of Hospitals for the sick and starving, within the British settlements, were gratefully told to the writer afterwards by many Mahrattas in the heart, and from distant parts, of their own country."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

Kaunta, Caunta, s. This word, Mahr., and Guz. kāṇṭhā, 'coast or margin,' is used in the northern part of the Bombay Presidency in composition to form several popular geographical terms, as Mahī Kāṇṭhā, for a group of small states on the banks of the Mahī River; Kewā-Kāṇṭhā, south of the above; Sindhū Kāṇṭhā, the Indus Delta, &c. The word is no doubt the same which we find in Ptolemy for the Gulf of Kachh, Kāvṭi κόλπος. Kāṇṭh-Kot was formerly an important place in Eastern Kachh, and Kāṇṭhi was the name of the southern coast district (see Ritter, vi. 1038).

Kebulee. See Myrobalans.

Keddah, s. Hind. Khedā (khednā, 'to chase'). The term used in Bengal for the enclosure constructed to entrap elephants (see Corral).

1780-90. "The party on the plain below have, during this interval, been completely occupied in forming the Keddah or enclosure."—Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 191.

1810. "A trap called a Keddah."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 436.

1860. "The custom in Bengal is to construct a strong enclosure (called a Keddah) in the heart of the forest."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 342.

Kedgerree, Kitchery, s. Hind. khichrī, a mess of rice, cooked with butter and dāl (see Dholl), and flavoured with a little spice, shred onion, and the like; a common dish all over India, and often served at Anglo-Indian breakfast tables, in which very old precedent is followed, as the first quotation shows.

The word appears to have been applied metaphorically to mixtures of sundry kinds (see Fryer below), and also to mixt jargon or lingua franca.

In England we find the word is often applied to a mess of re-cooked fish, served for breakfast; but this is inaccurate. Fish is frequently eaten with kedgerree, but is no part of it.

c. 1340. "The munj* is boiled with rice, and then buttered and eaten. This is what they call Kishri, and on this dish they breakfast every day."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 131.

c. 1443. "The elephants of the palace are fed upon Kitchri."—Abdurrazzāk, in India in XV. Cent., 27.

c. 1475. "Horses are fed on pease; also on Kichris, boiled with sugar and oil; early in the morning they get shisheniro" (?).—Athan. Nikitin, in do., p. 10.

The following recipe for Kedgerree is by Abu'l Fazl:—

c. 1590. "Khichri, Rice, split dāl, and ghī, 5 ser of each;  $\frac{1}{2}$  ser salt; this gives 7 dishes."—Āin, i. p. 59.

1648. "Their daily gains are very small, . . . and with these they fill their hungry bellies with a certain food called Kitserye."—Van Twist, 57.

1653. "Kicheri est une sorte de legume dont les Indiens se nourrissent ordinairement."—Dela Boullaye-le Gouz, 545, ed. 1657.

1672. Baldaeus has Kitzery, Tavernier Quicheri.

1673. "The Diet of this Sort of People admits not of great Variety or Cost, their delightfulest Food being only Cutcherry, a sort of Pulse and Rice mixed together, and boiled in Butter, with which they grow fat."—Fryer, 81.

Again, speaking of pearls in the Persian Gulf, he says, "Whatever is of any Value is very dear. Here is great Plenty of what they call Ketchery, a mixture of all together, or Refuse of Rough, Yellow, and Unequal, which they sell by Bushels to the Russians."—Ibid. 320.

1727. "Some Doll and Rice, being mingled together and boiled, make Kitcheree, the common Food of the Country. They eat it with Butter and Atchar."—A. Ham. i. 161.

1750-60. "Kitcharee is only rice stewed, with a certain pulse they call Dholl, and is generally eaten with salt-fish, butter, and pickles of various sorts, to which they give the general name of Atchar."—Grose, i. 150.

1880. A correspondent of the Indian Mirror, writing of the annual religious fair at Ajmere, thus describes a curious feature in the proceedings:—"There are two tremendous copper pots, one of which is said to contain about eighty maunds of rice and the other forty maunds. To fill these pots with rice, sugar, and dried fruits requires a round sum of money, and it is only the rich who can afford to do so. This year His Highness the Nawab of Tonk paid Rs. 3,000 to fill up the pots. . . . After the pots filled with khichri had been inspected by the Nawab, who was accompanied by the Commissioner of Ajmere and several Civil Officers, the distribution, or more properly the plunder, of khichri commenced, and men well wrapped up with clothes, stuffed with cotton, were seen leaping down into the boiling pot to secure their share of the booty."—Pioneer Mail, July 8th.

Kedgerree, n.p. Khijiri, or Kijari, a village and police station on the low lands near the mouth of the Hoogly, on the west bank, and 68 miles below Calcutta. It was formerly well known as a usual anchorage of the larger Indiamen.

1683. "This morning early we weighed anchor with the tide of Ebb, but having little wind, got no further than the Point of Kegeria Island."—Hedges, Jan. 26.

1684. "Signr Nicolo Pareres, a Portuguese Merchant, assured me their whole community had wroth y<sup>e</sup> Vice King of Goa . . . to send them 2 or 3 Frigates with . . . Soldiers to possess themselves of ye Islands of Kegeria and Ingellee."—Hedges, Dec. 17.

1727. "It is now inhabited by Fishers, as are also Ingellie and Kidgerie, two neighbouring Islands on the West Side of the Mouth of the Ganges."—A. Ham. vi. 2. See Hidgelee.

Kedgerree-pot, s. A vulgar expression for a round pipkin such as is in common Indian use, both for holding water and for cooking purposes. See Chatty.

* Vide Moong.

1811. "As a memorial of such misfortunes they plant in the earth an ear bearing a cudgeri, or earthen pot."—Solvyns, Les Hindous, iii.

1830. "Some natives were in readiness with a small raft of Kedgerree-pots, on which the palkee was to be ferried over."—Mem. Col. Mountain, 110.

Kennery, n.p. The site of a famous and very extensive group of cave-temples on the Island of Salsette, near Bombay, properly Kāṇhēri.

1602. "Holding some conversation with certain very aged Christians, who had been among the first converts there of Padre Fr. Antonio do Porto, . . . one of them, who alleged himself to be more than 120 years old, and who spoke Portuguese very well, and read and wrote it, and was continually reading the Mos Sanctorum, and the Lives of the Saints, assured me that without doubt the work of the Pagoda of Canari was made under the orders of the father of Saint Josafat the Prince, whom Barlaam converted to the Faith of Christ . . . ."—Couto, VII. iii. cap. 10.

1673. "Next Morn before Break of Day we directed our Steps to the anciently famed, but now ruin'd City of Canorein . . . all cut out of a Rock, &c."—Fryer, 71-72.

1825. "The principal curiosities of Salsette . . . are the cave temples of Kennery. These are certainly in every way remarkable, from their number, their beautiful situation, their elaborate carving, and their marked connection with Buddha and his religion."—Heber, ii. 130.

Kerseymere, s. This is an English draper's term, and not Anglo-Indian. But it is, through forms like cassimere (also in English use), a corruption of cashmere, though the corruption has been shaped by the previously-existing English word kersey, for a kind of woollen cloth, as if kersey were one kind and kerseymere another, of similar goods. Kersey is given by Minshew (2d ed. 1627), without definition, thus: "Kersey cloth, G. (i.e., French) carizé." The only word like the last given by Littré is "CARISIL, sorte de canevas" . . . This does not apply to kersey, which appears to be represented by "CRESEAU—Terme de Commerce; étoffe de laine croisée à deux envers; etym. croiser." Both words are probably connected with croiser or with carré. Planché indeed (whose etymologies are generally worthless) says: "made originally at Kersey, in Suffolk, whence its name." And he adds, equal to the occasion, "Kerseymere, so named from the position of the original factory on the mere, or water which runs through the village of Kersey" (!)

Mr. Skeat, however, we see, thinks that Kersey, in Suffolk, is perhaps the origin of the word Kersey.

1495. "Item the xv day of Februar, bocht fra Jhonne Andersoun x ellis of quhit Caresay, to be tua coitis, ane to the King, and ane to the Lord of Ballyony; price of ellne rjs. : summa . . . ii. li."—Acts. of the Ld. H. Treasurer of Scotland, 1877, p. 225.

1583. "I think cloth, Kerseys and tinne have never bene here at so lowe prices as they are now."—Mr. John Newton, from Babylon (i.e. Bagdad) 20 July, in Hakl. 378.

1603. "I had as lief be a list of an English kersey, as be pil'd as thou art pil'd, for a French velvet."—Measure for Measure, i. 2.

1625. "Ordanet the thesaurer to tak aff to ilk ane of the officeris and to the drummer and pyper, ilk ane of thame, fyve elne of reid Kairsie claithe."—Exts. from Recds. of Glasgow, 1876, p. 347.

1626. In a contract between the Factor of the King of Persia and a Dutch "Oppeer Koopman" for goods we find: "2000 Persian ellis of Carsay at 1 eocri (?) the ell."—Valentijn, v. 295.

1784. "For sale—superfine cambrics and edgings . . . scarlet and blue Kassimeres."—In Seton-Karr, i. 47.

c. 1880 (no date given). "Kerseymere. Cassimere. A finer description of kersey . . . (then follows the absurd etymology as given by Planché). . . It is principally a manufacture of the west of England, and except in being tweeled (sic) and of narrow width it in no respect differs from superfine cloth."—Draper's Dicty, s. v.

Khadir, s. H. Khādar; the recent alluvial bordering a large river. See under Bangur.

Khakee, s. or adj. Hind. khākī, 'dusty, or dust-coloured,' from Pers. khāk, 'earth,' or 'dust,' applied to a kind of light drab or chocolate-coloured cloth. This was the colour of the uniform worn by some of the Punjab regiments at the siege of Delhi, and became very popular in the army generally during the campaigns of 1857-58, being adopted as a convenient material by many other corps. The original khakee was a stout cotton cloth, but the colour was also used in broadcloth. It is said that it is about to be introduced into the army generally.

1878. "The Amir, we may mention wore a khaki suit, edged with gold, and the well-known Herati cap."—Sat. Review, Nov. 30, 683.

Khalsa. H. from Ar. khālṣa (properly khālīṣa) 'pure, genuine.' It has various technical meanings, but, as we introduce the word, it is applied by the Sikhs to their community and church (so to call it) collectively.

1783. "The Sieges salute each other by the expression Wah Gooroo, without any inclination of the body, or motion of the hand. The Government at large, and their armies, are denominated Khalsa, and Khalsajee."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, i. 307.

"And all the Punjab knows me, for my father's name was known In the days of the conquering Khalsa, when I was a boy half grown."
Attar Singh loquitur, by Sowar, in an Indian paper, name and date lost.

Khan, s. a. Turki through Pers. Khān. Originally this was a title, equivalent to Lord or Prince, used among the Mongol and Turk nomade hordes. Besides this sense, and an application to various other chiefs or nobles, it has since become in Persia, and still more in Afghanistan, a sort of vague title like "Esq.," whilst in India it has become a common affix to, or in fact part of, the name of Hindustanis out of every rank, properly, however, of those claiming a Pathān descent. The tendency of swelling titles is always thus to degenerate, and when the value of Khān had sunk, a new form, Khān-khānān (Khān of Khāns) was devised at the Court of Dehli, and applied to one of the high officers of state.

b. Pers. khān. A public building for the accommodation of travellers, a caravanseraī.

Khanna, Connah, &c., s. This term (Pers. khāna, 'a house, a compartment, apartment, department, receptacle,' etc.) is used almost ad libitum in India in composition, sometimes with most incongruous words, as bobachee (for bāwarchī) connah, 'cook-house,' buggy-connah, 'buggy, or coach-house,' bottle-khanna, toshakhāna (q.v.), &c., &c.

1784. "The house, cook-room, bottle-connah, godown &c., are all pukka built."—In Seton-Karr, i. 41.

Khansama; see Consumah.

khānum and khānim, a lady of rank; the feminine of the title khān, q.v.

1404. "... la mayor delles avia nõbre Cañon, que quiere dezir Reyna, o Señora grande."—Clavijo, f. 52 v.

1505. "The greatest of the Begs of the Sagharichi was then Shir Haji Beg, whose daughter, Ais-doulet Begum, Yunis Khan married. . . . The Khan had three daughters by Ais-doulet Begum. . . . The second daughter, Kullūk Nigar Khānum, was my mother. . . . Five months after the taking of Kābul she departed to God's mercy, in the year 911" (1505).—Baber, p. 12.

1619. "The King's ladies, when they are not married to him . . . and not near relations of his house, but only concubines or girls of the Palace, are not called begum, which is a title of queens and princesses, but only canum, a title given in Persia to all noble ladies."—P. della Valle, ii. 13.

Khass, Kauss, &c., adj. Hind. from Arab. khāṣṣ, 'special, particular, Royal.' It has many particular applications, one of the most common being to estates retained in the hands of government, which are said to be held khāṣṣ. The khāṣṣ-mahāl again, in a native house, is the women's apartment.

Many years ago, a white-bearded khānsamān (see Consuma), in the service of one of the present writers, indulging in reminiscences of the days when he had been attached to Lord Lake's camp, in the beginning of this century, extolled the sahibs of those times above their successors, observing (in his native Hindustani): "In those days I think the Sahibs all came from London khāṣṣ; now a great lot of Liverpoolwāls come to the country!"

There were in the Palaces of the Great Mogul and other Mahomedan Princes of India always two Halls of Audience, or Durbār, the Devān-i-'Am, or Hall of the Public, and the Devān-i-Khāṣṣ, the Special or Royal Hall, for those who had the entrée, as we say.

In the Indian Vocabulary, 1788, the word is written Coss.

Khāsya, n.p. A name applied to the oldest existing race in the cis-Tibetan Himalāya, between Nepal and the Ganges, i.e., in the British Districts of Kumāun and Garhwāl, and the native state of Garhwāl. The *Khāsya*s are Hindu in religion and customs, and probably are substantially Hindu also in blood; though in their aspect there is some slight suggestion of that of their Tibetan neighbours. There can be no ground for supposing them to be connected with the Mongoloid nation of Kasias (see Cossyas) in the mountains south of Assam.

1790. "The Vakeel of the rajāh of Comanh (i.e. Kumtūn) or Almora, who is a learned Pandit, informs me that the greater part of the zemindars of that country are Chasas. . . . They are certainly a very ancient tribe, for they are mentioned as such in the Institutes of MENU; and their great ancestor CHASA or CHASYA is mentioned by Sanchoniathon, under the name of CASSIUS. He is supposed to have lived before the Flood, and to have given his name to the mountains he seized upon."—Wilford (Wilfordizing!) in As. Res. vi. 456.

1824. "The Khasya nation pretend to be all Rajpoots of the highest caste . . . . they will not even sell one of their little mountain cows to a stranger . . . . They are a modest, gentle respectful people, honest in their dealings."—Heber, i. 264.

Khelāt, n.p. The capital of the Bilūch state upon the western frontier of Sind, which gives its name to the State itself. The name is in fact the Ar. kal'a, 'a fort.' See under Killadar. The terminal t of the Arabic word (written kal'at) has for many centuries been pronounced only when the word is the first half of a compound name meaning 'Castle of —'. No doubt this was the case with the Bilūch capital, though in its case the second part has been entirely dropt out of use. Khelāt (Kal'at) -i-Ghilji is an example where the second part remains, though sometimes dropt.

Khirāj s. Ar. kharāj (usually pron. in India khirāj), is properly a tribute levied by a Musliman lord upon conquered unbelievers, also land-tax; in India it is almost always used for the land-revenue paid to Government; whence a common expression (also Arabic) la khirāj, treated as one word, lākhirāj, 'rent-free.'

1784. ". . . 136 beegahs, 18 of which are Lackherage land, or land paying no rent."—In Seton-Karr, i. 49.

Khoa, s. Beng. khoā, a kind of concrete, of broken brick, lime, &c., used for floors and terrace-roofs.

Khoti, s. The holder of a peculiar tenure in the Bombay Presidency: see Suppl.

Khubber, s. Ar. Pers. Hind. khabar, 'news,' and especially as a sporting term, news of game, e.g. "There is pucka (q.v.) khubber of a tiger this morning."

1878. "Khabar of innumerable black partridges had been received."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 159.

1879. "He will not tell me what khabar has been received."—Vanity Fair, Nov. 29, p. 290.

Khudd, Kudd, s. This is apparently a term peculiar to the Himalāya, khadd, meaning a precipitous hill-side, also a deep valley. It is not in the dictionaries, but is probably allied to the Hind. klāh, 'a pit,' Dakh. Hind. khadda.

The word is in constant Anglo-Indian colloquial use at Simla and other Himalāyan stations.

1837. "The steeps about Mussoori are so very perpendicular in many places, that a person of the strongest nerve would scarcely be able to look over the edge of the narrow footpath into the Khud, without a shudder."—Dawson, First Impressions, ii. 146.

1838. "On my arrival I found one of the ponies at the estate had been killed by a fall over the precipice, when bringing up water from the khud."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 240.

1879. "The commander-in-chief . . . is perhaps alive now because his horse so judiciously chose the spot on which suddenly to swerve round that its hind hoofs were only half over the chud." (sic).—Times letter from Simla, Aug. 15.

Khutput, s. This is a native slang term in Western India for a prevalent system of intrigue and corruption. The general meaning of khatpat in Hind. and Mahr. is rather 'wrangling' and 'worry,' but it is in the former sense that the word became famous (1850-1854) in consequence of Sir James Outram's struggles with the rascality, during his tenure of the Residency of Baroda.

Khuttry, Khettry, s. H. Khatrī; Sansk. Kshatriya. The second, or military, caste, in the theoretical or fourfold division of the Hindus.

The Xarpatōi whom Ptolemy locates apparently towards Rājputānā are probably Kshatriyas.

1638. "Les habitans . . . . sont la plupart Benjans et Ketteris, tisserans, teinturiers, et autres ouvriers en coton."—Mandelsto, ed. 1639, 130.

1726. "The second generation in rank among these heathen is that of the Settre'as."—Valentijn, Chorem, 87.

1782. "The Chittery occasionally betakes himself to traffic, and the Sooder has become the inheritor of principalities."—G. Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, i. 64.

1836. "The Banians are the mercantile caste of the original Hindoos . . . They call themselves Shudderies, which signifies innocent or harmless," (1)—Sir R. Phillips, Million of Facts, 322.

Kil, s. Pitch or bitumen. Tam. and Mal. kīl, Ar. ķīr, Pers. ķīr and ķīl.

c. 1330. "In Persia are some springs, from which flows a kind of pitch which is called kie (read ķīr) (pix dico seu pegua), with which they smear the skins in which wine is carried and stored."—Friar Jordanus, p. 10.

c. 1560. "These are pitched with a bitumen which they call quill, which is like pitch."—Correa, Hak. Soc. 240.

Killadar, s. Pers.-Hind. ķīl'adār, from Ar. ķal'a, 'a fort.' The commandant of a fort, castle, or garrison. The Arab. ķal'a is always in India pronounced ķīl'a. And it is possible that in the first quotation Ibn Batuta has misinterpreted an Indian title; taking it as from Persian ķīl'id, 'a key.'

c. 1340. ". . . Kādhi Khān, Sadr-al-Jihān, who became the chief of the Amirs, and had the title of Kalit-dār, i.e. Keeper of the keys of the Palace. This officer was accustomed to pass every night at the Sultan's door, with the body-guard."—Ibn Bat. iii. 196.

1757. "The fugitive garrison . . . returned with 500 more, sent by the Kellidar of Vandiwash."—Orme (ed. 1803), ii. 217.

1817. "The following were the terms. . . that Arni should be restored to its former governor or Killedar."—Mill, iii. 340.

1829. "Among the prisoners captured in the Fort of Hattrass, search was made by us for the Keeledar."—Mem. of John Shipp, ii. 210.

Killa-kote, s.pl. A combination of Arabo-Persian and Hindi words for a fort (ķīl'a for ķal'a, and ķōt) used in Western India to imply the whole of the fortifications of a territory. (R. Drummond.)

Killut, Killaut, &c., s. Ar.-Hind. ķhīl'at. A dress of honour presented by a superior on ceremonial occasions; but the meaning is often extended to the whole of a ceremonial present of that nature, of whatever it may consist.

The word has in Russian been degraded to mean the long loose gown which forms the most common dress in Turkestan, called generally by Schuyler 'a dressing-gown' (Germ. Schlafröck). See Fraehn, Wolga Bulgaren, p. 43.

1411. "Several days passed in sumptuous feasts. Khil'ats and girdles of royal magnificence were distributed."—Abdurazāk, in Not. et Ect., xiv. 209.

1673. "Sir George Oxenden held it . . . He defended himself and the Merchants so bravely, that he had a Collat or Seerpaw (q.v.), a Robe of Honour from Head to Foot, offered him from the Great Mogul."—Fryer, 87.

1676. "This is the Wardrobe, where the Royal Garments are kept; and from whence the King sends for the Calaa, or a whole Habit for a Man, when he would honour any Stranger . . ."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 46.

1774. "A flowered satin gown was brought me, and I was dressed in it as a khilat."—Bogle in Markham's Tibet, 25.

1786. "And he the said Warren Hastings did send kellauts, or robes of honour (the most public and distinguished mode of acknowledging merit known in India) to the said ministers in testimony of his approbation of their services."—Articles of Charge against Hastings, in Burke's Works, vii. 25.

1809. "On paying a visit to any Asiatic Prince, an inferior receives from him a complete dress of honour, consisting of a khelaut, a robe, a turban, a shield and sword, with a string of jewels to go round the neck."—Ld. Valentia, i. 99.

1813. "On examining the khelauts . . . from the great Maharajah Madajee Sindia, the serpeych (q.v.) . . . presented to Sir Charles Malet, was found to be composed of false stones."—Forbes, Or. Mem., iii. 50.

Kincob, s. Gold brocade. Pers.-Hind. ķimķhwāb. The English is perhaps from the Gujarātī, as in that language the last syllable is short.

This word has been twice imported from the East. For it is only another form of the medieval name of an Eastern damask or brocade, cammocca. This was taken from the medieval Persian and Arabic forms ķamķhā or ķimķhwā, 'damasked silk,' and seems to have come to Europe in the 13th century. F. Johnson's Dict. distinguishes between ķamķhā, 'damask silk of one colour,' and ķimķhā, 'damask silk of different colours.' And this again, according to Dozy, quoting Hoffmann, is originally a Chinese word ķin-kha; in which doubtless ķin, 'gold,' is the first element. Kim is the Fuhkien form of this word; qu, kim-hou, 'gold-flower'?

We have seen kimkhwāb derived from Pers. ham-khwāb, 'less sleep,' because such cloth is rough and prevents sleep! This is a type of many etymologies.

Ducange appears to think the word survived in the French mocade (or moquette); but if so the application of the term must have degenerated in England. (See in Draper's Dicty. mockado, the form of which has suggested a sham stuff.)

c. 1300. "Παιδὸς γὰρ εὐδαιμονοῦντος, καὶ τὸν πατέρα δεῖ συνευδαιμονεῖν" κατὰ τὴν ὑμνουμένην ἀντιπελοδωρῶσιν. 'Ἐσθῆτα πηγουφῇ πεπομφῶς ἦν καμχᾶν ἡ Περσῶν φησι γλῶττα, δράσων ἐδ' ἴσθι, οὐ δῖπλακα μὲν οὐδὲ μαριμαρῆν οἶαν 'Ελένη ἐξῆβαινε, ἀλλ' ἡρεῖδῃ καὶ ποικίλῃν."—Letter of Theodorus the Hyrtacencian to Lucites, Protonotary and Protovestiary of the Trapezuntians. In Notices et Extraits, vi. 38.

1330. "Their clothes are of Tartary cloth, and camocas, and other rich stuffs, ofttimes adorned with gold and silver and precious stones."—Book of the Estate of the Great Kaan. In Cathay, 246.

c. 1340. "You may reckon also that in Cathay you get three or three and a half pieces of damasked silk (cammocca) for a sonmo."—Pegolotti, ib. 295.

(2) "In kirtle of Cammaaka am I clad." Coventry Mystery, p. 72. From Planché's Dict. of Costume.

1342. "The King of China had sent to the Sultan 100 slaves of both sexes, for 500 pieces of kamkhā, of which 100 were made in the City of Zaitūn. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 1.

c. 1375. "Thei setten this Ydole upon a Chare with gret reverence, wel arrayed with Clothes of Gold, of riche Clothes of Tartarye, of Camacaa, and other precious Clothes."—Sir John Maundeveill, ed. 1866, p. 175.

1404. "... é quando se del quisieron partir los Embajadores, fizo vestir al dicho Ruy Gonzalez una ropa de camocan, e dióle un sombrero, e dixole, que aquello tomase en señal del amor que el Tamurbec tenia al Señor Rey."—Clavijo, § lxxxviii.

1411. "We have sent an ambassador who carries you from us kimkhā."—Letter from Emp. of China to Shah Rukh, in Not. et Ext., xiv. 214.

1474. "And the King gave a signe to him that wayted, comaunding him to give to the dauncer a peece of Camocato. And he taking this peece threwe it about the heade of the dauncer, and of the men and women: and useing certain wordes in praiseng the King, threwe it before the mynstrells."—Josafa Barbaro, Travels in Persia, E. T., Hak. Soc., p. 62.

1688. "Καμουχᾶς, Χαμουχᾶς, Pannus sericus, sive ex bombyce confectus, et more Damasceno contextus, Italis Damasco, nostris olim Camocas, de qua voce diximus in Gloss. Mediae Latinit. hodie etiamnum Mocade." This is followed by several quotations from Medieval Greek MSS.—Die Cange, Gloss. Med. et Inf. Graecitatis, s. v.

1712. In the Spectator under this year see an advertisement of an "Isabella-coloured Kincob gown, flowered with green and gold."—Cited in Malcolm's Anecdotes of Manners, &c., 1808, p. 429.

1733. "Dieser mal waren von Seiten des Bräutigams ein Stück rother Kamka . . . und eine rothe Pferdehaut; von Seiten der Braut aber ein Stück violet Kamka."—u. s. w.—Gmelin, Reise durch Sibirien, i. 137-138.

1786. "... but not until the nabob's mother aforesaid had engaged to pay for the said change of prison, a sum of £10,000 . . . and that she would ransack the zenanah . . . for Kincobs, muslins, cloths, &c. &c., &c. . . ."—Articles of Charge against Hastings, in Burke's Works, 1852, vii. 23.

1809. "Twenty trays of shawls, kheenkaubs . . . were tendered to me."—Ld. Valentia, i. 117.

1829. "Tired of this service we took possession of the town of Muttra, driving them out. Here we had glorious plunder—shawls, silks, satins, khemkaubs, money, &c."—Mem. of John Shipp, i. 124.

King-Crow, s. A glossy black bird, otherwise called Drongo shrike, about as large as a small pigeon, with a long forked tail, Dicrurus macrocercus, Vieillot, found all over India. "It perches generally on some bare branch, whence it can have a good look-out, or the top of a house, or post, or telegraph-wire, frequently also on low bushes, hedges, walks, or ant-hills." (Jerdon.)

1883. "... the King-crow . . . leaves the whole bird and beast tribe far behind in originality and force of character. . . . He does not come into the house, the telegraph wire suits him better. Perched on it he can see what is going on . . . drops, beak foremost, on the back of the kite . . . spies a bee-eater capturing a goodly moth, and after a hot chase, forces it to deliver up its booty. . . ."—The Tribes on My Frontier, 143.

Kiosque, s. From the Turki and Pers. kushk or kushk, a pavilion, a villa, &c. This word is not Anglo-Indian, nor is it now a word, we think, at all common in modern native use.

c. 1350. "When he was returned from his expedition, and drawing near to the capital, he ordered his son to build him a palace, or as these people call it a kushk, by the side of a river which runs at that place, which is called Afghanpūr."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 212.

1623. "There is (in the garden) running water which issues from the entrance of a great kiosck, or covered place, where one may stay to take the air, which is built at the end of the garden over a great pond which adjoins the outside of the garden, so that, like the one at Surat, it serves also for the public use of the city."—P. della Valle, i. 535.

Kirbee, s. Hind. (karbī or kirbī). The stalks of jawār (see Jowaur), used as food for cattle.

Kishm, n.p. The largest of the islands in the Persian Gulf, called by the Portuguese Queisome and the like, and sometimes by our old travellers, Kishmish. It is now more popularly called Jazīrat-āl-tawīla, in Pers. Jaz. darūz, 'the Long Island' (like the Lewes), and the name of Kishm is confined to the chief town, at the eastern extremity, where still remains the old Portuguese fort taken in 1622, before which William Baffin the Navigator fell. But the oldest name is the still not quite extinct Brokhit, which closely preserves the Greek Oaracta.

B.C. 325. "And setting sail (from Har-mozeia), in a run of 300 stadia they passed a desert and bushy island, and moored beside another island which was large and inhabited. The small desert island was called Organa*; and the one at which they anchored Οἰακτρα, planted with vines and date-palms, and with plenty of corn."—Arrian, Voyage of Nearchus, ch. xxxvii.

1538. "... so I hasted with him in the company of divers merchants for to go from Babylon (orig. Babylonia) to Caixem, whence he carried me to Ormuz..."—F. M. Pinto, chap. vi. (Cogan, p. 9).

1553. "Finally, like a timorous and despairing man . . . he determined to leave the city (Ormuz) deserted, and to pass over to the Isle of Queixome. That island is close to the mainland of Persia, and is within sight of Ormuz at 3 leagues distance."—Barros, III. vii. 4.

1554. "Then we departed to the Isle of Kais or Old Hormuz, and then to the island of Brakhta, and some others of the Green Sea, i.e. in the Sea of Hormuz, without being able to get any intelligence."—Sidi Ali, 67.

1673. "The next morning we had brought Loft on the left hand of the Island of Kismash, leaving a woody Island uninhabited between Kismash and the Main."—Fryer, 320.

"... Vases filled with Kishmee's golden wine
And the red weepings of the Shiraz vine."—Mokanna.

* No doubt Gerun, afterwards the site of N. Hormuz.

1821. "We are to keep a small force at Kishmi, to make descents and destroy boats and other means of maritime war, whenever any symptoms of piracy reappear."—Elphinstone in Life, ii. 121.

See also Bassadore, supra, and Suppt.

Kishmish, s. Pers. Small stoneless raisins imported from Persia. Perhaps so called from the island just spoken of. Its vines are mentioned by Arrian, and by T. Moore! (see under Kishm).

1673. "We refreshed ourselves an entire Day at Gerom, where a small White Grape, without any Stone, was an excellent Cordial . . . they are called Kismas Grapes, and the Wine is known by the same Name farther than where they grow."—Fryer, 242.

1711. "I could never meet with any of the Kishmishes before they were turned. These are Raisins, a size less than our Malagas, of the same Colour, and without Stones."—Lockyer, 233.

1883. "Kishmish, a delicious grape, of white elongated shape, also small and very sweet, both eaten and used for wine-making. When dried this is the Sultana raisin. . . ."—Wills, Modern Persia, 171.

Kissmiss, s. Native servant's word for Christmas. But that festival is usually styled Barā dīn, 'the great day.'

Kist, s. Arab. kist. The yearly land revenue in India is paid by instalments which fall due at different periods in different parts of the country; each such instalment is called a kist, or quota.

1809. "Force was always requisite to make him pay his Kists or tribute."—Ld. Valentia, i. 347.

1810. "The heavy Kists or collections of Bengal are from August to September."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 498.

1817. "'So desperate a malady,' said the President, 'requires a remedy that shall reach its source. And I have no hesitation in stating my opinion that there is no mode of eradicating the disease, but by removing the original cause; and placing these districts, which are pledged for the security of the Kists, beyond the reach of his Highness's management.'"—Mill, vi. 55.

Kitmutgar, s. Hind. Khidmatgār, from Ar. Pers. khidmat, 'service,' therefore 'one rendering service.' The Anglo-Indian use is peculiar to the Bengal Presidency, where the word is habitually applied to a Musulman servant, whose duties are connected with serving meals and waiting at table, under the Khānsamān if there is one.

Kismutgar is a vulgarism, now perhaps obsolete. The word is spelt by Hadley in his Grammar (see under Moors) hkuzmutgār.

In the word khidmat, as in khil'at (see Killut) the terminal t in uninflected Arabic has long been dropt, though retained in the form in which these words have got into foreign tongues.

1759. The wages of a Khedmutgar appear as 3 Rupees a month.—In Long, p. 182.

Kittysol, Kitsol, s. This word survived till lately in the Indian Tariff, but it is otherwise long obsolete. It was formerly in common use for 'an umbrella,' and especially for the kind, made of bamboo and paper, imported from China, such as the English fashion of to-day (1878) has adopted to screen fire-places in summer. The word is Portuguese, quita-sol, 'bar-

Kling, n.p. This is the name (Kāling) applied in the Malay countries, including our Straits Settlements, to the people of Continental India who trade thither, or are settled in those regions, and to the descendants of such settlers.

The name is a form of Kalinga, a very ancient name for the region known as the "Northern Circars" (q.v.), i.e. the Telugu coast of the Bay of Bengal, or, to express it otherwise in general terms, for that coast which extends from the Kistna to the Mahānadi. "The Kalingas" also appear frequently, after the Pauranic fashion, as an ethnic name in the old Sanskrit lists of races. Kalinga appears in the earliest of Indian inscriptions, viz. in the edicts of Asoka, and specifically in that famous edict (XIII.) remaining in fragments at Gīrnār and at Kapurdi-giri, and more completely at Khālsī, which preserves the link, almost unique from the Indian side, connecting the histories of India and of the Greeks, by recording the names of Antiochus, Ptolemy, Antigonos, Magas, and Alexander.

Kalinga is a kingdom constantly mentioned in the Buddhist and historical legends of Ceylon; and in various copper grants we find commemoration of the Kingdom of Kalinga and of the capital city of Kalinganagara (e.g. in Indian Antig. iii. 152; x. 243). It was from the daughter of a King of Kalinga that sprang, according to the Mahāwanso, the famous Wijayo, the civilizer of Ceylon and the founder of its ancient royal race.

Kalingapatam, a port of the Ganjam district, still preserves the ancient name of Kalinga, though its identity with the Kalinganagara of the inscriptions is not to be assumed.

The name in later, but still ancient, inscriptions appears occasionally as Tri-Kalinga, "the Three Kalingas"; and this probably, in a Telugu version Mādu-Kalinga, having that meaning, is the original of the Modogalinga of Pliny in one of the passages quoted from him. (The possible connection which obviously suggests itself of this name Tri-kalinga with the names Tilinga and Tilingāna, applied, at least since the middle ages, to the same region, will be noticed under Telinga).

The coast of Kalinga appears to be that part of the continent whence commerce with the Archipelago at an early date, and emigration thither, was most rife; and the name appears to have been in great measure adopted in the Archipelago as the designation of India in general, or of the whole of the Peninsular part of it. Throughout the book of Malay historical legends called the Sijara Malayu the word Kaling or Kling is used for India in general, but more particularly for the southern parts (see Journ. Ind. Archip., v. 133). And the statement of Forrest* that in Macassar "Indostan" was called "Neegree Telinga" (i.e. Nagara Telinga) illustrates the same thing and also the substantial identity of the names Telinga, Kalinga.

The name Kling, applied to settlers of Indian origin, makes its appearance in the Portuguese narratives immediately after the conquest of Malacca (1511).

At the present day most, if not all of the Klings of Singapore come, not from the "Northern Circars," but from Tanjore, a purely Tamil district. And thus it is that so good an authority as Roorda van Eijnsinga translates Kaling by "Coromandel people." They are either Hindūs or Labbais (see Lubbye). The latter class in British India never take domestic service with Europeans, whilst they seem to succeed well in that capacity at Singapore.† The Hindu Klings appear to be chiefly drivers of hackney carriages and keepers of eating-houses. There is a Śiva temple in Singapore, which is served by Pandārāms (q. v.). The only Brahmans there in 1876 were certain convicts.

Koël, s. This is the common name in northern India of Eudynamys orientalis, L. (Fam. of Cuckoos), also called Kokila and Kokla. The name Koël is taken from its cry during the breeding season, “ku-il, ku-il,” increasing in vigour and intensity as it goes on.

The male bird has also another note, which Blyth syllables as Ho-who-ho, or Ho-a-o, or Ho-y-o. When it takes flight it has yet another somewhat melodious and rich liquid call; all thoroughly cuculine” (Jerdon).

c. 1526. “Another is the Koel, which in length may be equal to the crow, but is much thinner. It has a kind of song, and is the nightingale of Hindustan. It is respected by the natives of Hindustan as much as the nightingale is by us. It inhabits gardens where the trees are close planted.”—Baber, p. 323.

c. 1590. “The Koyil resembles the myneeh, but is blacker, and has red eyes and a long tail. It is fabled to be enamoured of the rose, in the same manner as the nightingale.”—Ayeen, ii. 381.

There is a difference however in its song * * * when it gets to the very top of its pitch, its voice cracks and there is an end of it, or rather there is not, for the persevering musician begins again * * * Does not the Maratha novelist, dwelling on the delights of a spring morning in an Indian village, tell how the air was filled with the dulcet melody of the Koel, the green parrot, and the peacock?”—Tribes on My Frontier, 156.

Kohinor, n.p. Pers. Koh-i-nār, ‘Mountain of Light’; the name of one of the most famous diamonds in the world. It was an item in the Deccan booty of Alāuddin Khilji (dd. 1316), and was surrendered to Baber (or more precisely to his son Humāyūn) on the capture of Agra (1526). It remained in the possession of the Moghul dynasty till Nādir extorted it at Delhi from the conquered Mahommed Shāh (1739). After Nādir’s death it came into the hands of Ahmed Shāh, the founder of the Afghan Monarchy. Shāh Shujā’, Ahmed’s grandson, had in turn to give it up to Ranjit Singh when a fugitive in his dominions. On the annexation of the Punjab in 1849 it passed to the English, and is now among the Crown jewels of England. Before it reached that position it ran through strange risks, as may be read in a most diverting story told by Bosworth Smith in his Life of Lord Lawrence (i. 327-8).

In 1830-51, before it was shown at the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, it went through a process of cutting which, for reasons unintelligible to ordinary mortals, reduced its weight from 186 $\frac{1}{16}$  carats to 106 $\frac{1}{16}$ .

1526. "In the battle in which Ibrāhīm was defeated, Bijermājīt (Raja of Gwalior) was sent to hell. Bijermājīt's family . . . were at this moment in Agra. When Hūmājūn arrived . . . (he) did not permit them to be plundered. Of their own free will they presented to Hūmājūn a peshkesh (see pesh-cush), consisting of a quantity of jewels and precious stones. Among these was one famous diamond which had been acquired by Sultān Alāeddin. It is so valuable that a judge of diamonds valued it at half the daily expense of the whole world. It is about eight mishkals. . . ."—Baber, p. 308.

1876. (With an engraving of the stone.) "This diamond belongs to the Great Mogul . . . and it weighs 319 Ratis (see ruttee) and a half, which make 279 and nine 16ths of our Carats; when it was rough it weigh'd 407 Ratis, which make 793 carats."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 148.

Koshoon, s. This is a term which was affected by Tippoo Sahib in his military organisation, for a brigade, or a regiment in the larger Continental use of that word. His Piādah 'askar or Regular Infantry, was formed into 5 Kachahris, composed in all of 27 Kushūns.

A MS. note on the copy of Kirkpatrick's Letters in the India Library says that Kushoon was properly Sansk. Kshuni or Kshauni, 'a grand division of the force of an Empire,' as used in the Mahābhārat. But the word adopted by Tippoo appears to be Turki. Thus we read in Quatremère's transl. from Abdurrazzāk: "He (Shah Rukh) distributed to the emirs who commanded the tomāns (corps of 10,000), the Koshūn (corps of 1000), the sadeh (of 100), the deheh (of 10), and even to the private soldiers, presents and rewards." (Notes. et Exts., xiv. 91; see also p. 89.) Again: "The soldiers of Istāhan having heard of the amnesty accorded them, arrived, Koshūn by Koshūn" (Ib. 130). Vámbéry gives Koshūn as Or. Turki for an army, a troop (literally whatever is composed of several parts).

c. 1782. "In the time of the deceased Nawab, the exercises . . . of the regular troops were . . . performed, and the word given according to the French system . . . but now, the Sultan (Tippoo) . . . changed the military code . . . and altered the technical terms or words of command . . . to words of the Persian and Turkish languages. . . . From the regular infantry 5000 men being selected, they were named Kushoon, and the officer commanding tha body was called a Sipahdar. . . .”—Hist. of Tipu Sultan, p. 31.

Kowtow, Kotow, s. From the Chinese k'o-t'ou, lit. 'knock-head'; the salutation used in China before the Emperor, his representatives, or his symbols, made by prostrations repeated a fixed number of times, the forehead touching the ground at each prostration. It is also used as the most respectful form of salutation from children to parents, and from servants to masters on formal occasions, &c.

This mode of homage belongs to old Pan-Asiatic practice. It was not, however, according to M. Pauthier,* of indigenous antiquity at the Court of China, for it is not found in the ancient Book of Rites of the Chou Dynasty, and he supposes it to have been introduced by the great destroyer and reorganiser, Tsin shi Hwangti, the Builder of the Wall. It had certainly become established by the 8th century of our era, for it is mentioned that the Ambassadors who came to Court from the famous Hārūn-al-Rashid (A.D. 798) had to perform it. Its nature is mentioned by Marco Polo, and by the ambassadors of Shāh Rukh (see below). It was also the established ceremonial in the presence of the Mongol Khans, and is described by Baber under the name of kornish. It was probably introduced into Persia in the time of the Mongol Princes of the house of Hulākū, and it continued to be in use in the time of Shāh 'Abbās. The custom indeed in Persia may possibly have come down from time immemorial, for, as the classical quotations show, it was of very ancient prevalence in that country. But the interruptions to Persian monarchy are perhaps against this. In English the term, which was made familiar by Lord Amherst's refusal to perform it at Peking in 1816, is frequently used for servile acquiescence or adulation.

K'o-tou, k'o-tou! is often colloquially used for 'Thank you' (E. C. Baber).

c. B.C. 484. "And afterwards, when they were come to Susa in the king's presence, and the guards ordered them to fall down and do obeisance, and went so far as to use force to compel them, they refused, and said they would never do any such thing, even were their heads thrust down to the ground, for it was not their custom to worship men, and they had not come to Persia for that purpose. So they fought off the ceremony; and having done so addressed the king."—Herodotus (by Rawlinson), vii. 136.

c. B.C. 464. "Themistocles . . . first meets with Artabanus the Chiliarh, and tells him that he was a Greek, and wished to have an interview with the king. . . . But quoth he; 'Stranger, the laws of men are various. . . . You Greeks, 'tis said, most admire liberty and equality, but to us of our many and good laws the best is to honour the king, and adore him by prostration, as the Image of God, the Preserver of all things' . . . Themistocles, on hearing these things, says to him: 'But I, O Artabanus, . . . will myself obey your laws' . . ."—Plutarch, Themistocles, xxvii.

c. B.C. 390. "Conon, being sent by Pharnabazus to the king, on his arrival, in accordance with Persian custom, first presented himself to the Chiliarh Tithraustes who held the second rank in the empire, and stated that he desired an interview with the king; for no one is admitted without this. The officer replied: 'It can be at once; but consider whether you think it best to have an interview, or to write the business on which you come. For if you come into the presence you must needs worship the king (what they call προσκυνέειν). If this is disagreeable to you, you may commit your wishes to me, without doubt of their being as well accomplished.' Then Conon says: 'Indeed it is not disagreeable to me to pay the king any honour whatever. But I fear lest I bring discredit on my city, if belonging to a state which is wont to rule over other nations I adopt manners which are not her own but those of foreigners.' Hence he delivered his wishes in writing to the officer."—Corn. Nepos, Conon, c. iv.

b.c. 324. "But he (Alexander) was now downhearted, and beginning to be despairing towards the divinity, and suspicious towards his friends. Especially he dreaded Antipater and his sons. Of these Iolas was the Chief Cupbearer, whilst Kasander was come but lately. So the latter, seeing certain Barbarians prostrating themselves (προσκυνούντας), a sort of thing which he, having been brought up in Greek fashion, had never witnessed before, broke into fits of laughter. But Alexander in a rage gript him fast by the hair with both hands, and knocked his head against the wall."—Plutarch, Alexander, lxxiv.

A.D. 798. "In the 14th year of Tchinyuan, the Khalif Galun (Hārūn) sent three ambassadors to the Emperor; they performed the ceremony of kneeling and beating the forehead on the ground, to salute the Emperor. The earlier ambassadors from the Khalifs who came to China had at first made difficulties about performing this ceremony. The Chinese history relates that the Mahomedans declared that they knelt only to worship Heaven. But eventually, being better informed, they made scruple no longer."—Gaubil, Abrégé de l'Histoire des Thangs, in Amyot, Mémoires conc. les Chinois, xvi. 144.

c. 1245. "Tartari de mandato ipsius principes suos Baiochonoy et Bato violenter ab omnibus nunciis ad ipsos venientibus faciunt adorari cum triplici genuum flexione, triplici quoque caput suorum in terram allisione."—Vincent. Bellovacensis, Spec. Historiale, l. xxix. cap. 74.

1298. "And when they are all seated, each in his proper place, then a great prelate rises and says with a loud voice: 'Bow and adore!' And as soon as he has said this, the company bow down until their foreheads touch the earth in adoration towards the Emperor as if he were a god. And this adoration they repeat four times."—Marco Polo, Bk. ii. ch. 15.

1404. "E fciéronle vestir dos ropas de camocan (see Kincoob), é la usanza era, quando estas roupat ponian por el Señor, de facer un gran yantar, é despues de comer de les vestir de las ropas, é entonces de fincar los finojos tres veces in tierra por reverencia del gran Señor."—Clavijo, § xcii.

1421. "His worship Hajji Yusuf the Kazi, who was . . . chief of one of the twelve Imperial Councils, came forward accompanied by several Mussulmans acquainted with the languages. They said to the ambassadors: 'First prostrate yourselves, and then touch the ground three times with your heads.'"—Embassy from Shāh Rukh, in Cathay, p. ccvi.

1502. "My uncle the elder Khan came three or four farsangs out from Tashkend, and having erected an awning, seated himself under it. The younger Khan advanced . . . and when he came to the distance at which the kornish is to be performed, he knelt nine times . . ."—Baber, 106.

c. 1590. The kornish under Akbar had been greatly modified:

"His Majesty has commanded the palm of the right hand to be placed upon the forehead, and the head to be bent downwards. This mode of salutation, in the language of the present age, is called Kornish."—Āin, i. 158.

But for his position as the head of religion in his new faith he permitted, or claimed prostration (sūda) before him:

"As some perverse and dark-minded men look upon prostration as blasphemous man-worship, His Majesty, from his practical wisdom, has ordered it to be discontinued by the ignorant, and remitted it to all ranks. . . . However, in the private assembly, when any of those are in waiting, upon whom the star of good fortune shines, and they receive the order of seating themselves, they certainly perform the prostration of gratitude by bowing down their foreheads to the earth."—Ibid. p. 159.

1618. "The King (Shah 'Abbās) halted and looked at the Sultan, the latter on both knees, as is their fashion, near him, and advanced his right foot towards him to be kissed. The Sultan having kissed it, and touched it with his forehead . . . made a circuit round the king, passing behind him, and making way for his companions to do the like. This done the Sultan came and kissed a second time, as did the other, and this they did three times . . ."—P. della Valle, i. 646.

1816. "Lord Amherst put into my hands . . . a translation . . . by Mr. Morrison of a document received at Tongchow with some others from Chang, containing an official description of the ceremonies to be observed at the public audience of the Ambassador . . . The Ambassador was then to have been conducted by the Mandarins to the level area, where kneeling . . . he was next to have been conducted to the lower end of the hall, where facing the upper part . . . he was to have performed the ko-tou with 9 prostrations; afterwards he was to have been led out of the hall, and having prostrated himself once behind the row of Mandarins, he was to have been allowed to sit down; he was further to have prostrated himself with the attendant Princes and Mandarins when the Emperor drank. Two other prostrations were to have been made, the first when the milk-tea was presented to him, and the other when he had finished drinking."—Ellis's Journal of Lord Amherst's Embassy to China, 213–214.

1824. "The first ambassador, with all his following, shall then perform the ceremonial of the three kneelings and the nine prostrations; they shall then rise and be led away in proper order."—Ceremonial observed at the Court of Peking for the Reception of Ambassadors, ed. 1824, in Paulhier, 192.

1855. ". . . The spectacle of one after another of the aristocracy of nature making the kotow to the aristocracy of the accident."—H. Martineau, Autobiog., ii. 377.

1860. "Some Seiks, and a private in the Buffs having remained behind with the grog-carts, fell into the hands of the Chinese. On the next morning they were brought before the authorities, and commanded to perform the kotou. The Seiks obeyed; but Moyses, the English soldier, declaring that he would not prostrate himself before any Chinaman alive, was immediately knocked upon the head, and his body thrown upon a dunghill" (see China Correspondent of the Times). This passage prefaces some noble lines by Sir F. Doyle, ending:

'Vain mightiest fleets, of iron framed;
Vain those all-shattering guns;
Unless proud England keep, untamed,
The strong heart of her sons.
So let his name through Europe ring—
A man of mean estate,
Who died, as firm as Sparta's king,
Because his soul was great.'

Macmillan's Mag. iii. 130.

1876. "Nebba more kowtow big people."
—Leland, 46.

1879. "We know that John Bull adores a lord, but a man of Major L'Estrange's social standing would scarcely kowtow to every shabby little title to be found in stuffy little rooms in Mayfair."—Sat. Review, April 19, 1879, p. 505.

Kubberdaur. An interjectional exclamation, "Take care!" Pers. Khabar-dār! take heed! It is the usual cry of chokidārs to show that they are awake.

c. 1664. "Each omrah causeth a guard to be kept all the night long, in his particular camp, of such men that perpetually go the round, and cry Kaber-dar, have a care."—Bernier, E. T., 119.

c. 1665. "Les archers orient ensuite a pleine tête, Caberdar, c'est-à-dire, prends garde."—Thevenot, v. 58.

Kuhār, s. Hind. Kahār. The name of a Śūdra caste of cultivators, numerous in Bahār and the N.-W. Provinces, whose specialty is to carry palankins. The name is, therefore, in many parts of India synonymous with 'palankin-bearer,' and the Hindu body-servants called 'bearers' (q.v.) in the Bengal Presidency are generally of this caste.

c. 1350. "It is the custom for every traveller in India . . . also to hire kahārs, who carry the kitchen furniture, whilst others carry himself in the palankin, of which we have spoken, and carry the latter when it is not in use."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 415.

c. 1550. "So saying he began to make ready a present, and sent for bulbs, roots, and fruit, birds and beasts, with the finest of fish . . . which were brought by kahārs in basketsful."—Ramāyanu of Tulsi Dās, by Growse, 1878, ii. 101.

1673. "He (the President of Bombay) goes sometimes in his Coach, drawn by large Milk-white Oxen, sometimes on Horseback, other times in Palenkenes, carried by Cohors, Musslemen Porters."—Fryer, 68.

1810. "The Cahar, or palanquin-bearer, is a servant of peculiar utility in a country where, for four months, the intense heat precludes Europeans from taking much exercise."—Williamson, V.M., i. 299.

1873. "Bhūi Kahār. A widely spread caste of rather inferior rank, whose occupation is to carry palkis, dolis, water-skins, &c.; to act as porters . . . they eat flesh and drink spirits: they are an ignorant but industrious class. Buchanan describes them as of Telinga descent. . . ."—Dr. H. V. Carter's Notices of Castes in Bombay Pry., quoted in Ind. Antiq., ii. 154.

Kulā, or Klā, n.p. Burmese name of a native of Continental India; and hence misapplied also to the English and other Westerns who have come to Burma from India; in fact used generally for a Western foreigner.

The origin of this term has been much debated. Some have supposed it to be connected with the name of the Indian race, the Kōls; another suggestion has connected it with Kalinga (see Kling); and a third with the Skt. kula, 'a caste or tribe'; whilst the Burmese popular etymology renders it from kū, 'to cross over,' and la, 'to come,' therefore 'the people that come across (the sea).' But the true history of the word has for the first time been traced by Professor Forchhammer, to Gōla, the name applied in old Pegu inscriptions to the Indian Buddhist immigrants, a name which he identifies with the Skt. Gauda, the ancient name of northern Bengal, whence the famous city of Gauṛ (v. Gour).

14th cent. "The Heroes Sona and Uttara were sent to Rāmañña, which forms a part of Suvannabhūmi, to propagate the holy faith . . . This town is called to this day Golamattikanagara, because of the many houses it contained made of earth in the fashion of the houses of the Gola people."—Inscr. at Kalyāni near Pegu, in Forchhammer, ii. 5.

1795. "They were still anxious to know why a person consulting his own amusement, and master of his own time, should walk so fast; but on being informed that I was a 'Colar,' or stranger, and that it was the custom of my country, they were reconciled to this . . ."—Symes, Embassy, p. 290.

1855. "His private dwelling was a small place on one side of the court, from which the women peeped out at the Kalās; . . ."—Mission to the Court of Ava (Phayré) p. 5.

"By a curious self-delusion, the Burmans would seem to claim that in theory at least they are white people. And what is still more curious, the Bengalees appear indirectly to admit the claim; for our servants in speaking of themselves and their countrymen, as distinguished from the Burmans, constantly made use of the term kūla admi—'black-man,' as the representative of the Burmese kālā, a foreigner."—Id. p. 37.

Kumpáss, s. Hind. Kampass, corruption of English compass, and hence applied not only to a marine or a surveying compass, but also to theodolites, levelling instruments, and other elaborate instruments of observation. Thus the sextant used to be called tikunta kampäss, 'the 3-cornered compass.'

Kunkur, Conker, &c. s. Hind. kankar, gravel. As regards the definition of the word in Anglo-Indian usage it is impossible to improve on Wilson: "a coarse kind of limestone found in the soil, in large tabular strata, or interspersed throughout the superficial mould, in nodules of various sizes, though usually small."

Nodular kunkur, wherever it exists, is the usual material for road metalling, and as it binds when wetted and rammed into a compact, hard, and even surface, it is an admirable material for the purpose.

c. 1781. "Etaya is situated on a very high bank of the river Jumna, the sides of which consist of what in India is called concha, which is originally sand, but the constant action of the sun in the dry season forms it almost into a vitrification." (!)—Hodges, 110.

1794. "Konker" appears in a Notification for tenders in Calcutta Gazette.—In Seton-Karr, ii. 135.

c. 1809. "We came within view of Cawnpore. Our long, long voyage terminated under a high konkur bank."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 381.

1810. "... a weaker kind of lime is obtained by burning a substance called kunkur, which, at first, might be mistaken for small rugged flints, slightly coated with soil."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 13.

Kureef, Khurreef, s. Hind. adopted from Arab. kharif ('autumn'). The crop sown just before, or at the beginning of, the rainy season, in May or June, and reaped after the rains in November—December. This includes rice, maize, the tall millets, &c. See Rubbee.

Kurnool, n.p. The name of a city and territory in the Deccan, Karnul of the Imp. Gazetteer; till 1838 a tributary Nawabship; then resumed on account of treason; and now since 1858 a collectorate of Madras Presidency. Properly Kandanūr; Canoul of Orme.

Kirkpatrick says that the name Kurnool, Kunnool, or Kundnool (all which forms seem to be applied corruptly to the place) signifies in the language of that country 'fine spun, clear thread,' and according to Meer Husain it has its name from its beautiful cotton fabrics. But we presume the town must have existed before it made cotton fabrics? This is a specimen of the stuff that men, even so able as Kirkpatrick, sometimes repeat after those native authorities who "ought to know best," as we are often told.

Kuttaur, s. Hind. from Sansk. katār, 'a dagger,' especially a kind of dagger peculiar to India, having a solid blade of diamond-section, the handle of which consists of two parallel bars with a cross-piece joining them. The hand grips the cross-piece, and the bars pass along each side of the wrist. Ibn Batuta's description is vivid, but much exaggerates the size, at least of the weapon of the last three centuries.

c. 1343. "The villagers gathered round him, and one of them stabbed him with a kattāra. This is the name given to an iron weapon resembling a plough-share; the hand is inserted into it so that the forearm is shielded; but the blade beyond is two cubits in length, and a blow with it is mortal."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 31–32.

1442. "The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked. . . . In one hand they hold an Indian poignard (katārah-i-Hindī), and in the other a buckler of ox-hide. . . . this costume is common to the king and the beggar."—Abdurrazzāk, in India in the XVth Cent., p. 17.

c. 1526. "On the whole there were given one tipchāk horse with the saddle, two pairs of swords with the belts, 25 sets of enamelled daggers (Khanjar, see hanger), 16 enamelled kitārehs, two daggers (jandher—see jumdhur) set with precious stones."—Baber, 338.

1638. "Les personnes de qualité portēt dans la ceinture vne sorte d'armes, ou de poignards, courte et large, qu'ils appellent ginda (?) ou Catarre, dont la garde et la gaine sont d'or."—Mandelstō, Paris, 1659, 223.

1673. "They go rich in Attire, with a Poniard, or Catarre, at their girde."—Fryer, 93.

1813. "After a short silent prayer, Lullabhy, in presence of all the company waved his catarra, or short dagger, over the bed of the expiring man. . . . The patient continued for some time motionless: in half an hour his heart appeared to beat, circulation quickened, . . . at the expiration of the third hour Lullabhy had effected his cure."—Forbes, Or. Mem., iii. 249.

1856. "The manners of the bardic tribe are very similar to those of their Rajpoot clients; their dress is nearly the same, but the bard seldom appears without the 'Kutār,' or dagger, a representation of which is scrawled beside his signature, and often rudely engraved upon his monumental stone, in evidence of his death in the sacred duty of Trāgā' (q.v.).—Rās Mālā, ed. 1878, pp. 559–560.

Kuzzilbash, n.p. From Turki kizil-bāsh, 'red-head.' This title has been since the days of the Safavi dynasty (see Sophy) in Persia, applied to the Persianized Turks who form the ruling class in that country, from the red caps which they wore. The class is also settled extensively over Afghanistan. Many of them used to take service with the Delhi emperors; and not a few do so now in our frontier cavalry regiments.

1559. "Beyond the desert above Corasam, as far as Samarkand and the idolatrous cities, the Yeshilbas (Iesculbas) or 'Green-caps,' are predominant. These Green-caps are certain Musulman Tartars who wear pointed caps of green felt, and they are so called to distinguish them from their chief enemies the Soffians, who are predominant in Persia, who are indeed also Musulmans, but who wear red caps."—Hajji Mahomed, in Ramusio, ii. f. 16 v.

1574. "These Persians are also called Red Turks, which I believe is because they have behind on their Turbants, Red Marks, as Cotton Ribbands &c. with Red Brims, whereby they are soon discerned from other Nations."—Rauwolf, 173.

1606. "Cocelbaxas, who are the soldiers whom they esteem most highly."—Gouvea, f. 143.

1653. "Je visité le keselbache qui y commande vne petite forteresse, duquel ie receu beaucoup de civilitez."—Dela Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, pp. 284-5.

1673. "Those who compose the Main Body of the Cavalry, are the Cusle-Bashees, or with us the Chevaliers."—Fryer, 356.

Fryer also writes Cusselbash (Index).

1815. "The seven Turkish Tribes, who had been the chief promoters of his (Ismail's) glory and success, were distinguished by a particular dress; they wore a red cap, from which they received the Turkish name of Kuzelbash, or 'golden-heads,' which has descended to their posterity."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, ii. 502-3.

1828. "The Kuzzilbash, a Tale of Khorasan. By James Baillie Fraser."

1883. "For there are rats and rats, and a man of average capacity may as well hope to distinguish scientifically between Ghilzais, Kuki Kheyls, Logar Maliks, Shigwals, Ghazis, Jezailchis, Hazaras, Logaris, Wardaks, Mandozais, Lepel-Griffin, and Kizilbashes, as to master the division of the great race of rats."—Tribes on My Frontier, 15.

Kyfe, n. One often meets with this word (Ar. kaif) in books about the Levant, to indicate the absolute enjoyment of the dolce far niente. Though it is in the Hindustāni dictionaries we never remember to have heard it used in India; but the quotation below shows that it is or has been in use in Western India, in something like the Turkish sense. The proper meaning of the Arabic word is 'how?' in what manner?' the secondary is 'partial intoxication.' This looks almost like a parallel to the English vulgar slang of 'how comed you so?' But in fact a man's kaif is his 'howness,' i.e. what pleases him, his humour; and this passes into the sense of gaiety caused by hashish, &c.

1808. "... a kind of confectio Japonica loaded with opium, Ganja or Bang, and causing keif, or the first degree of intoxication, lulling the senses and disposing to sleep."—R. Drummond.

Kythee, s. Hind. Kaithi. A form of cursive Nagari character, used by bunyas, &c., in Gangetic India. It is from Kayath (Skt. Kāyastha), a member of the writer-caste.

L.

Lac, s. Hind. lākḥ, from Skt. lākṣhā for rakṣhā. The resinous incrustation produced on certain trees (of which the dhāk is one,—see dhawk, but chiefly peepul (q.v.) and khossum i.e. Schleichera bijuga) by the puncture of the Lac insect (Coccus Lacca, L.). See Roxburgh, in Vol. III. of Asiatic Researches, 384, seqq. The incrustation contains 60 to 70 per cent. of resinous lac, and 10 per cent. of dark red colouring matter from which is manufactured lac-dye. The material in its original crude form is called stick-lac; when boiled in water it loses its red colour, and is then termed seed-lac; the melted clarified substance after the extraction of the dye is turned out in thin irregular laminæ called shell-lac. This is used to make sealing-wax, and in the fabrication of varnishes, &c.

Though lāk bears the same sense in Persian, and lak or luk are used in modern Arabic for sealing-wax, it would appear from Dozy (Glos., pp. 295-6, and Oosterlingen, 57), that identical or approximate forms are used in various Arabic-speaking regions for a variety of substances giving a red dye, including the coccus

ilicis or Kermes. Still, we have seen no evidence that in India the word was applied otherwise than to the lac of our heading.* And this the term in the Periplus seems unquestionably to indicate; whilst it is probable that the passage quoted from Aelian is a much misconceived account of the product. It is not nearly so absurd as De Monfart's account below.

The English word lake for a certain red colour is from this. So also are lacquer and lackered ware, because lac is used in some of the varnishes with which such ware is prepared.

c. A.D. 80-90. These articles are imported (to the ports of Barbaricē, on the W. of the Red Sea) from the interior parts of Ariakē :—

Σίδηρος Ἰνδικὸς καὶ στίβωμα
(Indian iron and steel)

Δάκκος χρωμάτων (Lac-dye)."

c. 250. "There are produced in India animals of the size of a beetle, of a red colour, and if you saw them for the first time you would compare them to cinnabar. They have very long legs, and are soft to the touch; they are produced on the trees that bear electrum, and they feed on the fruit of these. The Indians catch them and crush them, and with these dye their red cloaks, and the tunics under these, and everything else that they wish to turn to this colour, and to dye. And this kind of clothing is carried also to the King of Persia."—Aelian, de Nat. Animal. iv. 46.

c. 1343. The notice of lacca in Pegolotti is in parts very difficult to translate, and we do not feel absolutely certain that it refers to the Indian product, though we believe it to be so. Thus, after explaining that there are two classes of lacca, the matūra and acerba, or ripe and unripe, he goes on: "It is produced attached to stalks, i.e. to the branches of shrubs, but it ought to be clear from stalks, and earthy dust, and sand, and from costiere (?). The stalks are the twigs of the wood on which it is produced, the costiere or figs, as the Catalans call them, are composed of the dust of the thing, which when it is fresh heaps together and hardens like pitch; only that pitch is black, and these costiere or figs are red and of the colour of unripe lacca. And more of these costiere is found in the unripe than the ripe lacca," and so on.—Della Decima, III. 365.

1510. "There also grows a very large quantity of lacca (or lavra) for making red colour, and the tree of this is formed like our trees which produce walnuts."—Varthema, 238.

* Garcia says that the Arabs called it loc-amantri, 'lac of Sumatra'; probably because the Pegu lac was brought to the ports of Sumatra, and purchased there.

1516. "Here (in Pegu) they load much fine laqar, which grows in the country."—Barbosa, Lisbon Acad., 366.

1519. "And because he had it much in charge to get all the lac (alacre) that he could, the governor knowing through information of the merchants that much came to the Coast of Choromandel by the ships of Pegu and Martaban that frequented that coast . . . ."—Correa, ii. 567.

1563. "Now it is time to speak of the laque, of which so much is consumed in this country in closing letters, and for other seals, in the place of wax."—Garcia, f. 112 v.

1582. "Laker is a kinde of gum that procedeth of the ant."—Castañeda, tr. by N. L., f. 33.

c. 1590. (Recipe for Lac varnish) "Lac used for chighs (see chik). If red, 4 ser of lac, and 1 s. of vermillion; if yellow, 4 s. of lac, and 1 s. zarnikh."—Ain, i. 226.

1615. "In this lland (Goa) is the hard Waxe made (which we call Spanish Waxe), and is made in manner following. They inclose a large plotte of ground, with a little trench filled with water; then they sticke vpon a great number of small stauces vpon the sayd plot, that being done they bring thither a sort of pismires, farre bigger than ours, which beeing debar'd by the water to issue out, are constrained to retire themselves vpon the said stauces, where they are kil'd with the heate of the Sunne, and thereof it is that Lacka is made."—De Monfart, 35-36.

c. 1610. "... Vne manière de boete ronde, vernie, et lacrée, qui est vne ourage de ces isles."—Pyrrard de Laval, i. 127.

1727. "Their lact or japon'd Ware is without any Doubt the best in the World."—A. Ham, ii. 305.

Laccadive Islands, n.p. Probably Laksadvipā, '100,000 Islands'; a name however which would apply much better to the Maldives. For the former are not really very numerous. There is not, we suspect, any ancient or certain native source for the name as specifically applied to the northern group of islands. Barbosa, the oldest authority we know as mentioning the group (1516), calls them Malandiva, and the Maldives Palandiva. Several of the individual islands are mentioned in the Tuhfat-al-Majidih (E.T. by Rowlandson, pp. 150-152), the group itself being called "the islands of Malabar."

Lack, s. One hundred thousand; and especially in the Anglo-Indian colloquial 100,000 Rupees, in the days of better exchange the equivalent of £10,000. Hind. lākh, lak, &c., from Sansk. laksha, used (see below) in the same sense, but which appears to have originally meant "a mark."

The word has also been adopted in the Malay and Javanese, and other languages of the Archipelago. But it is remarkable that in all of this class of languages which have adopted the word it is used in the sense of 10,000 instead of 100,000, with the sole exception of the language of the Lampungs of Sumatra, who use it correctly (Cravfurd). See Cröre.

It is necessary to explain that the term does not occur in the earlier Sanskrit works. Thus in the Talavakāra Brāhmaṇā, a complete series of the higher numeral terms is given. After śata (100), sahasra (1000), comes ayuta (10,000), prayuta (now a million), niyuta (now also a million), arbuda (100 millions), nyarbuda (not now used), nikharṇa (do.) and padma (now 10,000 millions). Laksha is therefore a modern substitute for prayuta, and the series has been expanded. This was probably done by the Indian astronomers between the Vth and Xth centuries A.D.

We should observe that though a lack, used absolutely for a sum of money, in modern times always implies rupees, this has not always been the case. Thus in the time of Akbar and his immediate successors the revenue was settled and reckoned in laks of dams (q. v.). Thus:

c. 1594. "In the 40th year of his majesty's reign (Akbar's), his dominions consisted of 105 Sircars, subdivided into 2737 Kusbaḥs (see Cusba), the revenue of which he settled for ten years, at the annual rent of 3 Arṇibs, 62 Cröre, 97 Lacks, 55,246 Dams. . . ."—Ayeen, by Gladwin, ii. 1.

At Ormuz again we find another lack in vogue, of which the unit was apparently the dīnār, not the old gold coin, but a degenerate dīnār of small value. Thus:

1554. "(Money of Ormuz).—A leque is equivalent to 50 pardaos of ḡadis, which is called 'bad money,' (and this leque is not a coin but a number by which they reckon at Ormuz); and each of these pardaos is equal to 2 azares, and each azar to 100 ḡadis, each ḡadi to 100 dīnars, and after this fashion they calculate in the books of the Custom-house. . . ."—Nunez, Lyvro dos Pesos &c., in Subsidios, 25.

Here the azar is the Persian hazār or 1000 (dīnars); the ḡadi Pers. sad or 100 (dīnars); the leque or lāk, 100,000 (dīnars); and the tomān, which does not appear here, is 10,000 (dīnars).

c. 1800. "They went to the Kāfir's tent, killed him, and came back into the town, whence they carried off money belonging to the Sultan amounting to 12 laks. The lak is a sum of 100,000 (silver) dīnars, equivalent to 10,000 Indian gold dīnars."—In Batuta, iii. 106.

c. 1340. "The Sultan distributes daily two lāks in alms, never less; a sum of which the equivalent in money of Egypt and Syria would be 160,000 pieces of silver."—Shihābuddīn Dimishkī, in N. & E., xiii. 192.

In these examples from Pinto the word is used apart from money, in the Malay form, but not in the Malay sense of 10,000:

c. 1540. "The old man desiring to satisfy Antonio de Faria's demand, Sir, said he . . . the chronicles of those times affirm, how in only four years and an half sixteen Lacazaas (accas) of men were slain, every Lacazaa containing an hundred thousand."—Pinto, (orig. cap. xlv.) in Cogan, p. 53.

c. 1546. ". . . he ruined in 4 months space all the enemies countries, with such a destruction of people as, if credit may be given to our histories . . . there died fifty Laquesaas of persons."—Ibid. p. 224.

1615. "And the whole present was worth ten of their Leakes, as they call them; a Leake being 10,000 pounds sterling; the whole 100,000 pounds sterling."—Coryat's Letters from India (Crudities, iii. f. 25 v.).

1616. "He received twenty leaks of roupies towards his charge (two hundred thousand pounds sterling)."—Sir T. Roe, reprint, p. 35.

1651. "Yeder Lac is hondert duysend."—Rogierius, 77.

c. 1665. "Il faut cent mille rroupies pour faire un lek, cent mille leks pour fair un courou, cent mille courous pour faire un padan, et cent mille padan pour faire un mil."—Therenoit, p. 54.

1673. "In these great solemnities, it is usual for them to set it around with Lamps to the number of two or three Leagues, which is so many hundred thousand in our account."—Fryer.

1684. "They have by information of the servants dug in several places of the house, where they have found great summes of money. Under his bed were found Lacks 43. In the House of Office two Lacks. They in all found Ten Lacks already, and make no doubt but to find more."—Hedges, Jan. 2.

1692. ". . . a lack of Pagodas. . . ."—In Wheeler, i. 262.

1778. "Sir Matthew Mite will make up the money already advanced in another name, by way of future mortgage upon his estate, for the entire purchase, 5 lacks of rupees."—Foots, The Nabob, Act i. Sc. i.

1785. "Your servants have no Trade in this country; neither do you pay them high wages, yet in a few years they return to England with many lacs of pagodas."—Nabob of Arcot, in Burke's Speech on his Debts, Works, iv. 18.

1833. "Tout le reste (et dans le reste il y a des intendants riches de plus de vingt laks) s'assied par terre."—Jacquemont, Correspond. ii. 120.

1879. "In modern times the only numbers in practical use above 'thousands' are laks ('lac' or 'lakh') and koṭi ('crore'); and an Indian sum is wont to be pointed thus: 123, 45, 67, 890, to signify 123 crores, 45 lakhs, + 67 thousand, eight hundred and ninety."—Whitney, Sansk. Gram. 161.

The older writers it will be observed (c. 1600–1620) put the lakh at £10,000; Hamilton (c. 1700) puts it at £12,500; Williamson (c. 1810) at the same; then for many years it stood again as the equivalent of £10,000; now (1880) it is little more than £8000.

Lackorage. See Khiraḡ.

Lall-shraub, s. Englishman's Hind. lāl-shrāb, 'red wine.' The universal name of claret in India.

Lalla, s. P.—H.—lālā. In Persia this word seems to be used for a kind of domestic tutor; now for a male nurse, or as he would be called in India, 'child's bearer.' In N. India it is usually applied to a native clerk writing the vernacular.

Lama, s. A Tibetan Buddhist monk. Tibet. bLama (b being silent). The word is sometimes found written Llama; but this is nonsense. In fact it seems to be a popular confusion, arising from the name of the S. American quadruped which is so spelt. See quotation from Times below.

c. 1590. "Fawning Court doctors . . . said it was mentioned in some holy books that men used to live up to the age of 1000 years . . . and in Thibet there were even now a class of Lāmahs or Mongolian devotees, and recluses, and hermits that live 200 years and more. . . ."—Bādaoni, quoted by Blochmann, Āin, i. 201.

1664. "This Ambassador had in his suit a Physician, which was said to be of the Kingdom of Lassa, and of the Tribe Lamy or Lama, which is that of the men of the Law in that country, as the Brahmans are in the Indies . . . he related of his great Lama that when he was old, and ready to die, he assembled his council, and declared to them that now he was passing into the Body of a little child lately born. . . ."—Bernier, E. T. 135.

c. 1818.

"The Parliament of Thibet met—

The little Lama, called before it,
Did there and then his whipping get,
And, as the Nursery Gazette
Assures us, like a hero bore it."

T. Moore, The Little Grand Lama.

1876. ". . . Hastings . . . touches on the analogy between Tibet and the high valley of Quito, as described by De la Condamine, an analogy which Mr. Markham brings out in interesting detail. . . . But when he enlarges on the wool which is a staple of both countries, and on the animals producing it, he risks confirming in careless readers that popular impression which might be expressed in the phraseology of Fluelen—"Tis all one; 'tis alike as my fingers is to my fingers, and there is Lamas in both."—Rev. of Markham's Tibet, in Times, May 15th.

The passage last quoted is in jesting vein, but the following is serious and delightful:—

1879. "The landlord prostrated himself as reverently, if not as lowly, as a Peruvian before his Grand Llama."—Patty's Dream, a novel reviewed in the Academy, May 17th.

Lamballie, Lomballie, Lombardie, Lumbanah, &c., s. Dakh. Hind. Lāmbārā, Mahr. lāmbān, with other forms in the languages of the Peninsula. A wandering tribe of dealers in grain, salt, &c., better known as Banjārās (see Brinjarry). As an Anglo-Indian word this is now obsolete. It was perhaps a corruption of Lubhāna, the name of one of the great clans or divisions of Banjārās.

1756. "The army was constantly supplied . . . by bands of people called Lamballis, peculiar to the Deccan, who are continually moving up and down the country, with their flocks, and contract to furnish the armies in the field."—Orme, ii. 102.

1785. "What you say of the scarcity of grain in your army, notwithstanding your having a cutwāl, and so many Lumbānehs with you, has astonished us."—Letters of Tippoo, 49.

Lanchara, s. A kind of small vessel often mentioned in the Portuguese histories of the 16th and 17th centuries. The derivation is probably Malay lanchār, "quick, nimble."

c. 1535. "In questo paese di Cambaia (read Camboja) vi sono molti fiumi, nelli quali vi sono li nauili detti Lancharas, cō li quali vanno nauigando la costa di Siam. . . ."—Sommario de' Regni, etc., in Ramusio, i. f. 336.

c. 1539. "This King (of the Batas) understanding that I had brought him a letter and a Present from the Captain of Malaca, caused me to be entertained by the Xabundar. . . . This General, accompanied with five Lanchares and twelve Ballons, came to me to the Port where I rode at anchor."—Pinto, E. T., p. 81.

Landwind, s. Used in the south of India. A wind which blows seaward during the night and early morning. In Port. Terrenho.

1561. ". . . Correndo a costa com terrenhos."—Correa, Lendas, I. i. 115.

1644. "And as it is between monsoon and monsoon (monsam) the wind is quite uncertain only at the beginning of summer. The N.W. prevails more than any other wind . . . and at the end of it begin the land winds (terrenhos) from midnight to about noon, and these are E. winds."—Bocarro, MS.

1673. ". . . we made for the Land, to gain the Land Breezes. They begin about Midnight, and hold till Noon, and are by the Portugals named Terrhenoes."—Fryer, 23.

1838. "We have had some very bad weather for the last week; furious land-wind, very fatiguing and weakening. . . . Everything was so dried up, that when I attempted to walk a few yards towards the beach, the grass crunched under my feet like snow."—Letters from Madras, 199-200.

Langasaque, n.p. The most usual old form for the Japanese city which we now call Nagasaki (see Sainsbury, passim).

1611. "After two or three dayes space a Iesuite came vnto vs from a place called Langesacke, to which place the Carake of Macao is yeerely wont to come."—W. Adams, in Purchas, i. 126.

1613. The Journal of Capt. John Saris has both Nangasaque and Langasaque.—Id. 366.

1614. "Geve hym counsell to take heed of one Pedro Guzano, a papist Christian, whose is his hoste at Miaco; for a lyinge fryre (or Jesuit) tould Mr. Peacock at Langasaque that Capt. Adams was dead in the howse of the said Guzano, which now I know is a lye per letters I received. . . ."—Cocks to Wickham in Diary, &c. ii. 264.

1618. "It has now com to passe, which before I feared, that a company of rich usurers have gotten this sentence against us, and com doune together every yeare to Langasaque and this place, and have allwais byn accustomed to buy by the pancado

(as they call it), or whole sale, all the goodes which came in the carick from Amacan, the Portingales having no prevelegese as we have."—The same to the E. I. Co., ii. 297-8.

Two years later Cocks changes his spelling and adopts Nangasaque (Id. 300 and to the end).

Lan John, Langianne, &c., n.p. Such names are applied in the early part of the 17th century to the Shan or Laos state of Luang Prabang on the Mekong. Lan-chan is one of its names, signifying in Siamese, it is said, 'a million of elephants.' It is known to the Burmese by the same name (Len-Shen). It was near this place that the estimable French traveller Henri Mouhot died, in 1861.

1587. "I went from Pegu to Iamahey (see Jangomay), which is the cuntry of the Langiannes; it is fve and twentie dayes journey North-east from Pegu."—Fitch in Hakluyt, ii.

c. 1598. "Thus we arrived at Lanchan, the capital of the Kingdom (Lao) where the King resides. It is a Kingdom of great extent, but thinly inhabited, because it has been frequently devastated by Pegu."—De Morga, 98.

1617. "The merchants of the country of Lan John, a place joining to the country of Jangoma, arrived at the city of Judea . . . and brought great store of merchandize."—Sainsbury, ii. p. 90.

1663. "Entre tant et de si puissans Royaumes du dernier Orient, desquels on n'a presque iamais entendu parler en Europe, il y en a vn qui se nomme Lao, et plus proprement le Royaume des Langiens . . . le Royaume n'a pris son nom que du grand nombre d'Elephants qui s'y rencontrent: de vray ce mot de Langiens signifie proprement, milliers d'Elephants."—Marini, H. Nouvelle et Curieuse des Royaumes de Tunquin et de Lao (Fr. Tr., Paris, 1666), 329 and 337.

1608. Lanchang appears in the Map of Siam in De la Loubère's work, but we do not find it in the book itself.

c. 1692. "Laos est situé sous le même Climat que Tonquin; c'est un royaume grand et puissant, separé des États voisins par des forets et par des deserts. . . . Les principales villes sont Landjamet Tsiamaja."—Kaempfer, H. du Japon, i. 22-23.

Lanteas, s. A swift kind of boat frequently mentioned by F. M. Pinto and some early writers on China; but we are unable to identify the word.

c. 1540. "... that ... they set sail from Lumpoo for Malacca, and that being advanced as far as the Isle of Sumbor they had been set upon by a Pyrat, a Guzarat by Nation, called Coia Asem, who had three Junks, and four Lanteas. . ."—Pinto, E. T., p. 69.

c. 1560. "There be other lesser shipping than Tunkes, somewhat long, called Bancones, they place three Oares on a side, and rowe very well, and load a great deal of goods; there be other lesse called Lanteas, which doe rowe very swift, and beare a good burthen also: and these two sorts of Ships, viz., Bancones and Lanteas, because they are swift, the theues do commonly vse."—Caspar da Cruz in Purchas, iii. 174.

Laos, n.p. A name applied by the Portuguese as a plural to the civilised people who occupied the inland frontier of Burma and Siam, between those countries on one hand and China and Tongking on the other; a people called by the Burmese Shans, a name which we have in recent years adopted. They are of the race of Thai to which the Siamese belong, and which extends with singular identity of manners and language, though broken into many separate communities, from Assam to the Malay Peninsula. The name has since been frequently used as a singular, and applied as a territorial name to the region occupied by this people immediately to the North of Siam. There have been a great number of separate principalities in this region, of which now one and now another predominated and conquered its neighbours. Before the rise of Siam the most important was that of which Sakotai was the capital, afterwards represented by Xieng-mai, the Zimmé of the Burmese and the Jangoma (q.v.) of some old English documents. In later days the chief states were Muang Luang Prabang (see Lan John) and Vien-shan, both upon the Mekong.

It would appear from Lieut. Mauleod's narrative, and from Garnier, that the name of Lao is that by which the branch of these people on the Lower Mekong, i.e., of those two states, used to designate themselves. Muang Prabang is still quasi independent; Vien-shan was annexed by Siam with great cruelties, c. 1828.

1553. "Of silver of 11 dinheiros alloy he (Albuquerque) made only a kind of money called Malaquizes, which silver came thither from Pegu, whilst from Siam came a very pure silver of 12 dinheiros, assay, procured from certain people called Laos, lying to the north of those two kingdoms."—Barros, II. vi. 6.

1553. "... certain very rugged mountain ranges, like the Alps, inhabited by the people called Gueos who fight on horseback, and with whom the King of Siam is continually at war. They are near him only on the north, leaving between the two the people called Laos, who encompass this Kingdom of Siam, both on the North, and on the East along the river Mecon . . . and on the south adjoin these Laos the two Kingdoms of Camboja and Choampa (see Champa), which are on the sea-board. These Laos . . . though they are lords of so great territories, embracing three Kingdoms, are all subject to this King of Siam, though often in rebellion against him. . ."—Ib. III. ii. 5.

"Three Kingdoms at the upper part of these, are those of the Laos, who (as we have said) obey Siam through fear: the first of these is called Jangoma (q.v.), the chief city of which is called Chiamay . . . the second Chancray Chencran: the third Lanchaa (see Lan John) which is below the others, and adjoins the Kingdom of Cacho, or Cauchichina. . . ."—Ib.

c. 1560. "These Laos came to Camboia, downe a River many daies Iournie, which they say to have his beginning in China as many others which runne into the Sea of India; it hath eight, fiftene, and twentie fathome water, as myselfe saw by experience in a great part of it; it passeth through manie vnknowne and desert Countries of great Woods and Forests where there are innumerable Elephants, and many Buffes . . . and certayne beastes which in that Countrie they call Badas." (see Abada).—Caspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 169.

c. 1598. "... I offered to go to the Laos by land, at my expense, in search of the King of Cambodia, as I knew that that was the road to go by. . ."—Blas de Herman Gonzalez in De Morga, (E. T. by Hon. H. Stanley, Hak. Soc.), p. 97.

1641. "Concerning the Land of the Louwen, and a Journey made therunto by our Folk in Anno 1641" (etc.).—Valentijn, III. Pt. ii. pp. 30 seqq.

1663. "Relation Nouvelle et Curieuse du Royavme de Lao.—Traduite de l'Italien du F. de Marini, Romain. Paris, 1666."

1766. "Les peuples de Lao, nos voisins, n'admettent ni la question ni les peines arbitraires . . . ni les horribles supplices qui sont parmi nous en usage; mais aussi nous les regardons comme de barbares. . . . Toute l'Asie convient que nous dansons beaucoup mieux qu'eux."—Voltaire, Dictonne XXII, André des Couches à Siam.

Lār, n.p. This name has had several applications.

(a). To the region which we now call Guzerat, in its most general application. In this sense the name is now quite obsolete; but it is that used by most of the early Arab geographers. It is the Λαρυκή of Ptolemy; and appears to represent an old Sanskrit name Laṭa, adj. Laṭaka, or Laṭika.

c. A.D. 150. "Τῆς δὲ Ἰνδοσκυθίας τὰ ἀπὸ ἀνατολὸν τὰ μὲν ἀπὸ θαλάσσης κατέχει ἡ Λαρυκή χώρα, ἐν ᾗ μεσάζονται ἀπὸ μὲν δύσεως τοῦ Ναμάδου ποταμοῦ πόλις ἦδρα . . . Βαρύραζα ἐμπόριον."—Ptolemy, VII. ii. 62.

c. 940. "On the coast, e.g. at Šaimūr, at Sūbāra, and at Tāna, they speak Lārī; these provinces give their name to the Sea of Lār (Lārāwī) on the coast of which they are situated."—Masūdī, i. 381.

c. 1330. "A certain Traveller says that Tāna is a city of Guzerat (Jusrāt) in its eastern part, lying west of Malabar (Munibār); whilst Ibn Sa'yid says that it is the furthest city of Lār (Al-Lār), and very famous among traders."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, p. 188.

c. 1020. ". . . to Kach the country producing gum (mokil, i.e. bdellium, q.v.), and ūdardūd (?) . . . to Somnāt, fourteen (parasangs); to Kambāya, thirty . . . to Tāna five. There you enter the country of Lārān, where is Jaimūr" (i. q. Šaimūr, see Choul).—Al-Burūnī, in Elliot, i. 66.

(b). To the Delta region of the Indus, and especially to its western part. Sir H. Elliot supposes the name in this use, which survived till recently, to be identical with the preceding, and that the name had originally extended continuously over the coast, from the western part of the Delta to beyond Bombay (see his Historians, i. 378). We have no means of deciding this question (see Larry-Bunder.)

c. 1820. "Diwal . . . was reduced to ruins by a Muhammedan invasion, and another site chosen to the eastward. The new town still went by the same name . . . and was succeeded by Lārī Bandar or the port of Lār, which is the name of the country forming the modern delta, particularly the western part."—M'Murdo in J. R. As. Soc., i. 29.

(c). To a Province on the north of the Persian Gulf, with its capital.

c. 1220. Lār is erroneously described by Yakūt as a great island between Sirāf and Kish. But there is no such island.* It is an extensive province of the continent. See Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, p. 501.

* It is possible that the island called Shaikh Shu'āib, which is off the coast of Lār, and not far from Sirāf, may be meant. Barbosa also mentions Lār among the islands in the Gulf subject to the K. of Ormuz (p. 37).

c. 1330. "We marched for three days through a desert . . . and then arrived at Lār, a big town, having springs, considerable streams, and gardens, and fine bazars. We lodged in the hermitage of the pious Shaikh Abu Dulaf Muḥammad. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 240.

c. 1487. "Returning along the coast, forneaagainst Ormuz there is a towne called Lār, a great and good towne of merchandise, about ij<sup>m</sup>l. houses. . . ."—Josafa Bar-baro, old E. T. (Hak. Soc.), 80.

1553. "These benefactions the Kings of Ormuz . . . pay to this day to a mosque which that Caciz (see Casis) had made in a district called Hongez of Sheikh Doniar, adjoining the city of Lāra, distant from Ormuz over 40 leagues."—Barros, II. ii. 2.

1602. "This man was a Moor, a native of the Kingdom of Lāra, adjoining that of Ormuz; his proper name was Cufu, but as he was a native of the Kingdom of Lāra he took a surname from the country, and called himself Cufu Larym."—Couto, IV. vii. 6.

1622. "Lār, as I said before, is capital of a great province or kingdom, which till our day had a prince of its own, who rightfully or wrongfully reigned there absolutely; but about 23 years since, for reasons rather generous than covetous, as it would seem, it was attacked by Abbas K. of Persia, and the country forcibly taken. . . . Now Lār is the seat of a Sultan dependent on the Khan of Shiraz. . . ."—P. della Valle, ii. 322.

1727. "And 4 Days Journey within Land, is the City of Laar, which according to their fabulous tradition is the Burying-place of Lot. . . ."—A. Ham, i. 92.

Lārāi, s. This Hind. word, meaning 'fighting,' is by a curious idiom applied to the biting and annoyance of fleas and the like. There is a similar idiom (jang kardān) in Persian.

Larek, n.p. Lārak; an island in the Persian Gulf, not far from the island of Jerun or Ormuz.

1685. "We came up with the islands of Ormuz and Arack . . ." (called Larek afterwards).—Hedges, May 23.

Larin, s. Pers. lārī. A peculiar kind of money formerly in use on the Persian Gulf, on the W. Coast of India, and in the Maldivé Islands, in which last it survived to the present century. The name is there retained still, though coins of the ordinary form are used. It is sufficiently described in the quotations, and representations are given by De Bry and Tavernier. The name appears to have been derived from the territory of Lār on the Persian Gulf, (see under that word).

1525. "As tamgas larys valem cada hũa sesênta reis. . . ."—Lembrança das Cousas da India, 38.

c. 1563. "I have seen the men of the Country that were Gentiles take their children, their sonnes and their daughter, and have desired the Portugalls to buy them, and I have seene them sold for eight or ten larinês apiece, which may be of our money x.s. or xiii.s. iiiii d."—Master Caesar Frederike in Hak. ii. 343.

1583. Gasparo Balbi has an account of the Larino, the greater part of which seems to be borrowed literatim by Fitch in the succeeding quotation. But Balbi adds: "The first who began to strike them was the King of Lar, who formerly was a powerful King in Persia, but is now a small one."—f. 35.

1587. "The said Larine is a strange piece of money, not being round, as all other current money in Christianitie, but is a small rod of silver, of the greatnesse of the pen of a goose feather . . . which is wrested so that the two endes meet at the just half part, and in the head thereof is a stamp Turkesco, and these be the best current money in all the Indias, and 6 of these Larinês make a ducket."—R. Fitch, in Hak. ii. 407.

1598. "An Oxe or a Cowe is there to be bought for one Larijn, which is as much as halfe a Gilderne."—Linschoten, 28.

c. 1610. "La monnoye du Royaume n'est que d'argent et d'une sorte. Ce sont des pieces d'argent qu'ils appellent larins, de valeur de huit sols ou environ de nostre monnoye . . . longues comme le doigt mais redoublées. . ."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 163.

1613. "We agreed with one of the Governor's kinned fortytwo laries (twenty shillings) to conduct us. . ."—N. Whithington, in Purchas, i. 484.

1622. "The lari is a piece of money that I will exhibit in Italy, most eccentric in form, for it is nothing but a little rod of silver of a fixed weight, and bent double unequally. On the bend it is marked with some small stamp or other. It is called Lari because it was the peculiar money of the Princes of Lar, invented by them when they were separated from the Kingdom of Persia. . . . In value every 5 lari are equal to a piastre or patacca of reals of Spain, or 'piece of eight' as we choose to call it."—P. della Valle, ii. 434.

Larkin, s. (obsolete). A kind of drink—apparently a sort of punch, (q. v.)—which was popular in the Company's old factories. We know the word only on the authority of Pietro della Valle; but he is the most accurate of travellers.

We are in the dark as to the origin of the name. On the one hand its form suggests an eponymus among the old servants of the Company, such as

Robert Larkin, whom we find to have been engaged for the service in 1610, and to have died chief of the Factory of Patani, on the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula, in 1616. But again we find in a Vocabulary of "Certaine Wordes of the Naturall Language of Iaua" in Drake's Voyage (Hak. iv. 246): "Larnike=Drink." Of this word we can trace nothing nearer than (Javan.) 'larik,' to pledge, or invite to drink at an entertainment,' and (Malay), larik-larahan, 'mutual pledging to drink.' It will be observed that della Valle assigns the drink especially to Java.

1623. "Meanwhile the year 1622 was drawing near its close, and its last days were often celebrated of an evening in the House of the English, with good fellowship. And on one of these occasions I learned from them how to make a beverage called Larkin, which they told me was in great vogue in Java, and in all those other islands of the Far East. This said beverage seemed to me in truth an admirable thing,—not for use at every meal (it is too strong for that),—but as a tonic in case of debility, and to make tasty possets, much better than those we make with Muscatel vines or Cretan malmseys. So I asked for the recipe; and am taking it to Italy with me. . . . It seemed odd to me that in those hot southern regions, as well as in the environs of Hormuz here, where also the heat is great, they should use both spice in their food and spirits in their drink, as well as sundry other hot beverages like this larkin."—P. della Valle, ii. 475.

Larry-bunder, n. p. The name of an old seaport in the Delta of the Indus, which succeeded Daibul (see Diul) as the chief haven of Sind. We are doubtful of the proper orthography. It was in latter Mahomedan times called Lāhori-bandar, probably from presumed connexion with Lahore as the port of the Punjab (Elliot, i. 378). At first sight, McMurdo's suggestion that the original name may have been Lāri-bandar, from Lār, the local name of the southern part of Sind (see Lar), seems probable. McMurdo, indeed, writing about 1820, says that the name Lāri-bandar was not at all familiar to natives; but if accustomed to the form Lāhori-bandar they might not recognize it in the other. The shape taken however by what is apparently the same name in our first quotation is adverse to McMurdo's suggestion.

c. 1030. "This stream (the Indus) after passing (Alor) . . . divides into two streams; one empties itself into the sea in the neighbourhood of the city of Lūharāni, and the other branches off to the East, to the borders of Kach, and is known by the name of Sind Sāgar, i.e. Sea of Sind."—Al-Birūnī in Elliot, i. 49.

c. 1333. "I travelled five days in his company with Alā-ul-Mulk, and we arrived at the seat of his Government, i.e. the town of Lāhari, a fine city situated on the shore of the great Sea, and near which the River Sind enters the sea. Thus two great waters join near it; it possesses a grand haven, frequented by the people of Yemen, of Fārs (etc). . . . The Amir Alā-ul-Mulk . . . told me that the revenue of this place amounted to 60 laks a year."—In Batuta, iii. 112.

1813. "Laribunder. This is commonly called Scindy River, being the principal branch of the Indus, having 15 feet water on the bar, and 6 or 7 fathoms inside; it is situated in latitude about 24° 30' north. . . . The town of Laribunder is about 5 leagues from the sea, and vessels of 200 tons used to proceed up to it."—Milburn, i. 146.

1831. "We took the route by Durajee and Meerpoor. . . . The town of Lahory was in sight from the former of these places, and is situated on the same, or left bank of the Pitte."—A. Burnes, 2nd ed., i. 22.

Lascar, s. The word is originally from the Pers. lashkar, 'an army,' 'a camp,' whence lashkarī, 'one belonging to an army, a soldier.' The word lascār or lāscār (both these pronunciations are in vogue) appears to have been corrupted, through the Portuguese use of lashkarī in the forms lasquarin, lascari, etc., either by the Portuguese themselves, or by the Dutch and English who took up the word from them, and from these laskār has passed back again into native use in this corrupt shape.

The early Portuguese writers have the forms we have just named in the sense of 'soldier;' but lascar is never so used now. It is in general the equivalent of khalāṣī, in the various senses of that word (v. Classy), viz. (1) an inferior class of artilleryman ('gun-lascar'); (2) a tent-pitcher, doing other work which the class are accustomed to do; (3) a sailor. The last is the most common Anglo-Indian use, and has passed into the English language.

The use of lascar in the modern sense by Pyrard de Laval shows that this use was already general on the west coast at the beginning of the 17th century, whilst the curious distinction which Pyrard makes between Lascaran and Lascari, and Dr. Fryer makes between Luscar and Lascar (accenting probably Lūscar and Lāscār) shows that lashkarī for a soldier was still also in use.

In Ceylon the use of the word lascareen for a kind of local or civil soldier long survived; perhaps is not extinct.

The word lashkarī does not seem to occur in the Āin. The original word lashkar is used in its proper sense by Sir T. Roe below, for 'a camp.'

1541. "It is a proverbial saying over all India (i.e. Portuguese India, see s. v.) that the good Lasquarin, or 'soldier' as we should call him, must be an Abyssinian."—Castro, Roteiro, 73.

1546. "Besides these there were others (who fell at Diū) whose names are unknown, being men of the lower rank, among whom I knew a lascarym (a man getting only 500 reis of pay!) who was the first man to lay his hand on the Moorish wall, and shouted aloud that they might see him, as many have told me. And he was immediately thrown down wounded in five places with stones and bullets, but still lived; and a noble gentleman sent and had him rescued and carried away by his slaves. And he survived, but being a common man he did not even get his pay!"—Correa, iv. 567.

1807. "A large open boat formed the van, containing his excellency's guard of lascorreens, with their spears raised perpendicularly, the union colours flying, and Ceylon drums called tomtoms beating."—Cordiner's Ceylon, 170.

1872. "The lascars on board the steamers were insignificant looking people."—The Dilemma, ch. ii.

Lāt, Lāt Sāhib, s. This, a popular corruption of Lord Sāhib or Lārū Sāhib, as it is written in Hind, is the usual form from native lips, at least in the Bengal Presidency, of the title by which the Governor-General has long been known in the vernaculars. The term also extends nowadays to Lieutenant-Governors, who in contact with the higher authority become Chotā ('Little') Lāt, whilst the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief are sometimes discriminated as the Mulkī Lāt Sāhib and the Jangī Lāt Sāhib ('territorial' and 'military'), the Bishop as the Lāt Pādre Sāhib, and the Chief Justice as the Lāt Justy Sāhib. The title is also sometimes, but very incorrectly, applied to minor dignitaries of the supreme Government.

1824. "He seemed, however, much puzzled to make out my rank, never having heard (he said) of any 'Lord Sāhib' except the Governor-General, while he was still more perplexed by the exposition of 'Lord Bishop Sāhib', which for some reason or other my servants always prefer to that of Lord Pādre."—Heber, i. 69.

1837. "The Arab, thinking I had purposely stolen his kitten, ran after the buggy at full speed, shouting as he passed Lord Auckland's tents, 'Dohā'ī, dohā'ī, Sāhib! dohā'ī, Lord Sāhib!' * 'Mercy, mercy, si! mercy, Governor-General!' The faster the horse rushed on, the faster followed the shouting Arab."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 142.

1868. "The old barber at Roorkee, after telling me that he had known Strachey when he first began, added, 'Ab Lat-Sekretur hai! Ah! hum bhi boodda hogya!' (Now he is Lord Secretary! Ah! I too have become old!)."—Letter from the late M.-Gen. W. W. H. Greathed.

1877. " . . . in a rare but most valuable book ('Galloway's Observations on India,' 1825, pp. 254-8), in which the author reports, with much quiet humour, an aged native's account of the awful consequences of contempt of an order of the (as he called the Supreme Court) 'Shubrem Koorut,' the order of Impey being 'Lord Justey Sahib-ka-hookm,' the instruments of whose will were 'abidavis' or affidavits."—Letter from Sir J. F. Stephen in Times, May 31.

Lat. s. Hind. lāt, used as a corruption of the English lot, in reference to an auction (Carnegie).
